- pressing for the extradition to Iraq of senior Ba'athists suspected of criminal activity; and
- publication of a final report by the Commission, indicating that its work was complete.

247. Attached to the Embassy's message was a minute written by the IPU for Mr Patey earlier in December.[199]

248. The IPU set out more information about the composition and operation of the DBC. Its six serving Commissioners were all from the Shia community as two positions allotted to the Kurdish parties had never been filled. The DBC did not hold formal meetings, and its only active members were Dr Chalabi, Mr Maliki and Sheikh Jalal al-Din al-Sagheer.

249. The IPU also described Article 7 of the new Constitution, which banned the glorification and promotion of the Ba'ath Party in Iraq and its symbols. Although the text had been "continually watered down", the final text specified that its provisions would be regulated by a law. The IPU judged:

> "The regulating law will be a yardstick testing attitudes towards de-Ba'athification – on the one hand it could be an opportunity to seek concrete reform and repeal of CPA Order No.1 (the de-Ba'athification Law). But on the other hand, it could be used as an opportunity to widen and deepen de-Ba'athification, or restrict the activities of political groups which contain former Ba'athists. That said, because it [sic] such a political hot potato, it may not be one of the laws prioritized as important in the new parliament."

A new government

250. Evidence seen by the Inquiry confirms that in January and February 2006 the UK stepped up its efforts to encourage Iraq to form a broad and inclusive government of national unity through high-level visits and rounds of phone calls.[200]

251. Mr Straw visited Basra and Baghdad in early January.[201] He met representatives of political parties from all the main communities, reinforcing the UK's message on the need for a unity government. In his view, achieving that mattered more than who became Prime Minister.

252. Some Sunni representatives told Mr Straw that they had been "cheated out of seats". He responded that "they must accept the election results once confirmed or they will be pitting themselves against the whole international community".

253. Vice President Adel Abdul Mehdi, a potential candidate for Prime Minister, told Mr Patey on 1 January that "he would be ready to look at the possibility of appointing a judge to head the de-Ba'athification Commission" and to reduce the role of politicians within it.[202]

254. Prime Minister Ja'afari told Mr Patey on 3 January that, although the Ba'ath Party and its ideology should remain outlawed, "the half-million former Ba'ath members Ja'afari saw as his 'children' should not and the de-Ba'athification Commission and its procedures should be reviewed".[203]

255. On 3 January, Mr Ayad Allawi told Mr Blair that in forming the new government "the key bridge to the Sunnis would be revision of the de-Ba'athification process".[204]

256. An IPU brief for Mr Straw's visit to Baghdad in early April listed "participation by all (including former Ba'athists) who are committed to furthering the political process and can run government effectively" as one of the main issues for the new Iraqi Government to address.[205]

257. After the announcement of Mr Nuri al-Maliki as the nominee for Prime Minister, the British Embassy Baghdad's pen picture of him recorded that he had been Deputy Chair of the de-Ba'athification Commission and "a driving force for that body's work".[206] The Embassy wrote that Mr Maliki was "opposed to the participation of any former Ba'athists in government institutions and public life".

258. When Prime Minister Designate Maliki met Mr Patey and Sir Nigel Sheinwald on 24 April, he said he was "proud to be known as a hardliner" on de-Ba'athification but acknowledged that the de-Ba'athification Commission had made some mistakes.[207]

259. Mr Maliki planned to propose a "radical overhaul" that would transform the de-Ba'athification Commission into a "Truth and Reconciliation Commission, sending Ba'athists who had committed crimes to the courts and rehabilitating those who had not". He was most concerned about Ba'athist military officers. The establishment of a "Commission for Equality of Employment" would reassure Sunnis that they would get a fair share of government jobs and that dismissals would not be sectarian.

260. On 10 May, the JIC assessed how the Sunni insurgency was evolving.[208] It concluded:

> "The strength of the insurgency is in part affected by Sunni participation in the political process. If Sunni confidence is to be bolstered, respected Sunnis will need to gain some major ministries. Even then, Sunni participation will remain fragile. Much will depend on the actions of the new government in addressing broader Sunni concerns: federalism, de-Ba'athification, reform of the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF), MNF withdrawal, security and detainees, and improvement in the quality of life."

261. On 19 July, the JIC assessed that:

> "Little has changed in the nature and intensity of the Sunni Arab insurgency since our last assessment in May. We continue to judge that the strength of the insurgency is in part affected by Sunni participation in the political process. Prime Minister Maliki's government includes Sunnis in Ministerial and executive positions, and some key Sunni demands have been partially met; for example, limited release of detainees. Maliki has announced a National Reconciliation Plan aimed at addressing wider Sunni concerns, but there has been no substantive progress as yet. Some Sunni politicians have voiced their scepticism at Maliki's offer of amnesty (on current proposals most insurgents need not apply), plans to relax de-Ba'athification, and his lack of reference to an MNF withdrawal timetable."[209]

262. On 27 July, the IPU reported to the British Embassy Baghdad that the Iraq Strategy Group had agreed:

> "… the review Maliki has promised of de-Ba'athification needs to happen urgently. This is not only important to operationalising his national reconciliation plan: but also to stopping the crippling, continuing purges of middle-ranking managers in key public services."[210]

263. In August 2006, the British Embassy Bagdad reported to the FCO some changes at the de-Ba'athification Commission.[211] A new Acting Chair, Sheikh Jalal al-Din al-Sagheer, had been appointed and the Commission's Legal Department had begun work on a new law for the structure and administration of the Commission, including the process for appointing its Chair. Sheikh Sagheer told the Embassy:

"He was aware that both the policy and the structure of the Commission had been subject to heavy criticism from many quarters and expected the new legislation to address those concerns. He asked for HMG's input on how the current system could be improved."

264. Mr Ali Faisal Alami, the Director General of the Commission's Follow-Up and Implementation Department, told Embassy officials that 10,924 orders had been issued by the Commission, of which 6,788 had been implemented.

265. When the Iraq Strategy Group met on 15 September, Ms Bridget Brind, Deputy Head of the IPU, gave an update on reconciliation work by the Iraqi Government.[212] She reported that:

"A conference with tribal leaders had taken place in August, and future conferences were scheduled with civil society, party leaders and armed groups. As yet, there were no firm plans on the big issues of de-Ba'athification and detainees."

266. In an Interim Progress Report on Prime Minister Maliki's Government, in October 2006, the JIC judged that:

"In the current political and security climate, key Sunni concerns are not being addressed. There has been no significant change in de-Ba'athification policies, they remain highly suspicious of SCIRI's federalist aspirations, little action has been taken against the Shia militias, and the total number of detainees has not significantly changed."[213]

267. On 8 November, the British Embassy Baghdad reported "Indications that the door may be opening to a less stringent de-Ba'athification process" and sent "proposals for how we engage" to the FCO in London.[214]

268. The message explained that, on 6 November, the Director General of the de-Ba'athification Commission had announced that a draft law on de-Ba'athification, consistent with Prime Minister Maliki's National Reconciliation Plan, had been prepared and would be sent to the Council of Representatives soon.

269. The new law would mean that only 1,500 of the 10,302 Senior Ba'athists currently affected would lose their jobs. Of those, only the top tier of party members would be denied a pension. The cases of those further down the ranks would be reviewed and those who had not been convicted of a crime would have the option of reinstatement or retirement with a pension.

270. UK officials explained that they would "seek to agree a few components of a 'fair law' with the US and UN and lobby hard for those changes". They would "focus on reinforcing the underlying principle that de-Ba'athification should be an independent judicial process rather than a political process".

271. UK officials subsequently discussed five changes with US officials, who raised the first four with Dr Chalabi.[215] The proposals, which received a mixed response, were:

- The de-Ba'athification Commission should review the cases of all de-Ba'athified individuals.
- The Commission should have a purely investigative role, passing all evidence to a judge for criminal proceedings where justified.
- The new law should not extend the remit of the Commission to civil society, press and the media.
- The Commission should produce a report for the Council of Representatives, which would then consider its dissolution.
- The article that prohibited the passing of legislation in breach of the de-Ba'athification Law should be removed.

272. In November 2006, Mr John Sawers, FCO Director General, Political, wrote to Mr Blair from Baghdad, where he had just spent three days:

> "… the pace of the insurgency hasn't slackened. The Shia put the blame squarely on Ba'athists/Saddamists, who they think we under-estimate. They are convinced that the former regime's security and intelligence officials are the driving force behind the attacks on the coalition, the Shia, and government officials, with the aim of creating mayhem and an opportunity for them to return to power as the only ones capable of restoring order. The level of concern has gone up sharply, with reports of Ba'athist intimidation on the streets of Baghdad … The relative weight of the Ba'athists in the insurgency isn't easy to divine, but it is clear that both the Shia and the Kurds still fear them above all."[216]

273. On 15 November, the JIC judged that:

> "The Iraqi Government's response to deteriorating security remains ineffective. Many Shia politicians blame all violence on 'Ba'athists'. There has been no progress on national reconciliation …"[217]

274. The Iraq Forward Plan developed by UK officials in November 2006 (see Section 9.5) said that the UK should encourage Iraqi political leaders to sign up to a Declaration of Principles/National Compact which included a commitment to prevent the return of a Ba'athist government "while reviewing de-Ba'athification to allow all those who have not committed crimes to participate in building Iraqi stability and prosperity".[218]

275. Implementing the Compact would require two new bodies: a Peace Commission and a Reconciliation/Rehabilitation Commission. The latter, it was proposed, would not deal with cases before the de-Ba'athification Commission which would continue to be heard there, but would address detainee issues and hear accounts of pre- and post-2003 violence from victims and perpetrators.

De-Ba'athification in 2007

276. At the end of January 2007, Mr Dominic Asquith, British Ambassador to Iraq, recorded a report from the Iraqi Ministry of Foreign Affairs that the Iraqi Ba'ath Party had split, and a splinter group had formed that wanted to "come back to Iraq, start a dialogue, renounce violence and act politically".[219] It was hoped that others might be attracted to the same strategy.

277. The IPU provided advice on "how best to step up and co-ordinate work on reconciliation" in February 2007.[220] It said that de-Ba'athification was a "major inhibitor" of reconciliation and a cause of grievance in the Sunni community.

278. The IPU wrote:

> "We have worked in close consultation with the US to promote a substantive discussion between the main political parties on reforming the de-Ba'athification process. The aim is to take account of the concerns of all major communities, help reduce the numbers of Iraqis excluded from public life and thus reduce alienation and motives for violence. A number of different draft laws have been provided by different political parties. We are working to help bring these together in a single document, ideally including a sunset clause to bring an end to de-Ba'athification in the future. A US/UK facilitated version has just gone to President Talabani with the aim of having a cross-sectarian draft presented to the Iraqi parliament by the Presidency Council."

279. In a separate 'Update on de-Ba'athification', also dated February 2007, the IPU explained that "we want to see the de-Ba'athification process reformed and ultimately brought to an end".[221] In the short term, the objective was to reform the de-Ba'athification Commission so that it operated in a more independent and transparent way. Specifically, this meant that it should:

"– … target an individual's conduct, not membership of the Ba'ath party, reinforcing the underlying principle that de-Ba'athification should be a judicial rather than political process;

– review the cases of all individuals who have already been de-Ba'athified, as the previous process was deeply flawed due to political interference;

– complete the de-Ba'athification process within a defined period."

280. The IPU explained that the draft US/UK text proposed abolishing the de-Ba'athification Commission and replacing it with a "Reconciliation and Accountability Commission" for six months. President Talabani had indicated that he was broadly content with the US/UK text. If the Presidency Council exercised its right to put the draft law to the Council of Representatives directly, and other drafts were also presented, they were likely to be considered by a Committee of the Council.

281. On 5 March, Mr Blair's Private Secretary wrote to the Private Secretary to Mrs Margaret Beckett, the Foreign Secretary:

"The Prime Minister would like us to get a UK adviser on reconciliation into Maliki's office as quickly as possible … We also need to build influence with Abdul-Mehdi on de-Ba'athification … The Prime Minister is pleased at UK/US efforts to ensure that there is now a single document on de-Ba'athification with Talabani."[222]

282. In an update for Mr Blair on 23 March, his Private Secretary reported a sense that Iraqi politicians risked missing the opportunity presented by the Baghdad Security Plan (see Section 9.5) to pursue reconciliation.[223] He wrote that "faltering progress on the oil law and on de-Ba'athification" were contributing to increased suspicion within the Sunni community.

283. In his Weekly Assessment dated 29 March, Mr Asquith reported that the proposed new de-Ba'athification Law had become "another victim of the US fixation on security

'results'".[224] Mr Asquith wrote that the departure of Ambassador Khalilzad would "deprive Iraq of one of the great contrivers" and that his final act was:

> "… a de-Ba'athification draft law – a characteristic mix of the bad and the superficially plausible fix, designed to service immediate domestic US rather than Iraqi long term interests. My Legal Adviser had been working closely with the Americans and Iraqis for some months on the substance. I had in parallel been discussing the provisions with political leaders. The key objectives were to set an early (eg. six month) date for the termination of the de-Ba'athification Commission's work, drawing a line definitively in the sand, reduce to as few as possible (1,200-1,500) those caught by the provisions and secure the agreement of the three-man Presidency Council to a text which could then be introduced directly into Parliament.
> "… Khalilzad persuaded the PM and President (alone) to sign off, thereby failing the Constitutional condition for fast-track introduction of legislation. Those caught by the provisions will increase by 10-12,000 (and indeed potentially many more, if Provinces decide to exploit the latitude they are given on implementation).The termination of the de-Ba'athification Commission in a year is undermined by the creation of a 'Special Committee' (of political/security 'experts' appointed by the Presidency and PM) to adjudicate on security clearances for sensitive jobs (in effect a vetting committee), which has no/no termination date. And the PM is given the right to intervene in the decisions of the Special Committee and a separate panel of judges appointed to consider the decisions of the de-Ba'athification Commission or Special Committee."

284. Mr Asquith recorded that there had as yet been no co-ordinated response from Sunni Arab politicians. The only way to introduce the draft legislation into Parliament rapidly would be to "bend the Constitution".

285. On 12 April, Dr Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the Iraqi National Security Adviser, told Sir Nigel Sheinwald that the proposed "accountability and justice" law would "allow 90 percent of Ba'athists to return to work".[225] Those who had held high rank would be excluded from the security ministries, but pension rights for the families of those who had been prosecuted for their actions would be protected. Dr Rubaie described implementing the policy as an uphill struggle, but pointed to a "growing consensus in support of the need to rehabilitate and reconcile".

286. After visiting Baghdad and Basra, Mr Des Browne, the Defence Secretary, wrote to Mr Blair on 5 May with an assessment of work under way on reconciliation and its prospects for success.[226] Mr Browne judged that a "bridging package" to attract a broad range of Sunni support would include: "recognition, amnesty, reversal of de-Ba'athification, progress on sharing natural resources … investment, employment, political representation, and release of detainees".

287. On 16 May, the JIC assessed that "genuine fears of a Ba'athist resurgence" were helping to keep the fragile Shia coalition, the United Iraqi Alliance, together.[227] There had been "little substantive progress on de-Ba'athification".

288. The JIC judged that there had been "no tangible progress on national reconciliation" and that "antipathy" between Shia and Sunni communities remained "intense".

289. The JIC judged that:

> "… progress on national reconciliation will remain slow unless there is a major shift in both Shia and Sunni attitudes and expectations, backed by strong and persistent Coalition pressure. At the moment it means different things to different groups."

290. On 23 May, Mr Blair's Private Secretary reported:

> "… there are now sensible amendments agreed by the Executive Committee to the existing draft law, which should address some of the key problems for the Sunni, including a sunset clause for the de-Ba'athification Commission, a representative Political Committee to supervise the process (overseen by the CoR [Council of Representatives]), and introducing a judicial element to the process. Some issues remain, but this represents welcome progress. Further pressure will have to be put on the Shia in particular to agree an acceptable law, and on the Council of Representatives to pass it."[228]

June 2007 onwards

291. As described in Section 9.5, Mr Blair stood down as Prime Minister on 27 June 2007. Shortly after Mr Blair tendered his resignation, HM The Queen asked Mr Gordon Brown to form a government.

292. On 20 August, a Current Intelligence Group (CIG) judged that:

> "I. The influence of the Iraqi Ba'ath Party on the Sunni Arab insurgency is marginal. The party is fractured with little political relevance or popular support in Iraq; this is highly unlikely to change.
> "II. Iraqi Shia politicians' fears of a Ba'athist resurgence, however exaggerated, are genuinely held. They will limit the Shia appetite for reconciliation with the Sunni more broadly."[229]

> "Following the Petraeus/Crocker testimonials [see Section 9.6], the centre of gravity has switched back from Washington to Baghdad, where Maliki is enjoying a somewhat more secure position. However, he still faces significant challenges: to break the impasse over key legislation (de-Ba'athification and Provincial Powers laws) … and drive forward the reconciliation agenda."[230]

294. The list of points for Mr Brown to make in his meeting with Prime Minister Maliki suggested that he should stress the Prime Minister's particular responsibility to give a strong lead to national reconciliation.

295. In November, the British Embassy Baghdad reported:

> "After two months of playing games, the correct draft of the Accountability & Justice Law (de-Ba'athification) has now made it to the CoR … there should be sufficient majority to see this law through."[231]

296. By the end of December, the Accountability and Justice Law still had not been passed.[232]

297. The Law was approved by the Council of Representatives on 12 January 2008.[233]

298. The British Embassy Baghdad reported on 24 January that, although Vice President Hashimi had continuing concerns, he had agreed to register them in a letter to the Speaker rather than delay or veto the law.[234]

299. On 12 January, the Iraqi Council of Representatives approved the Justice and Accountability Law (formerly the de-Ba'athification Law).[235] The Cabinet Office told Mr Brown that:

> "Although the law's practical impact will be more symbolic than substantive, its approval nevertheless sends out a positive message especially to Sunnis, about the ability of the political system to function."

SECTION 11.2

CONCLUSIONS: DE-BA'ATHIFICATION

Contents

Introduction and key findings 58

Conclusions 58

Lessons 61

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section contains the Inquiry's analysis, conclusions and lessons in relation to the de-Ba'athification of the Iraqi public sector, the evidence for which is set out in Section 11.1.

Key findings

- Early decisions on the form of de-Ba'athification and its implementation had a significant and lasting negative impact on Iraq.
- Limiting de-Ba'athification to the top three tiers of the party, rather than extending it to the fourth, would have had the potential to be far less damaging to Iraq's post-invasion recovery and political stability.
- The UK's ability to influence the decision by the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) on the scope of the policy was limited and informal.
- The UK chose not to act on its well-founded misgivings about handing over the implementation of de-Ba'athification policy to the Governing Council.

Conclusions

2. Although the US and UK had discussed and recognised the need for it, de-Ba'athification was one of many areas of post-invasion activity in Iraq for which objectives and plans had not been agreed between the two Governments before the invasion (see Section 6.5). Consequently, no detailed preparations for implementation of a shared de-Ba'athification policy were put in place.

3. The UK lacked the deep understanding of which levels of the Iraqi public sector were highly politicised that would have been desirable in developing a de-Ba'athification policy, but did recognise that party membership was likely to have been a matter of expediency rather than conviction for many Iraqi citizens. Since the UK's planning assumption was that a large proportion of the Iraqi civil service would continue to function under new leadership post-invasion, the main UK concern was that a light-touch de-Ba'athification process should protect administrative capacity for the reconstruction of the country.

4. Measures to prevent a resurgence of the Ba'ath Party were important both to ordinary Iraqi citizens and to Iraqi politicians. The UK recognised the psychological importance of reassuring both groups that the Ba'athists would not return to power, but did not fully grasp the extent to which de-Ba'athification might have consequences for the relationship between the Shia and Sunni communities. The Coalition did not have a plan to deal with the tensions which inevitably rose as result. This placed at risk the UK's objective that Iraq would become a stable and united state.

5. Recognition of the symbolic importance of de-Ba'athification is clear from its inclusion in General Franks' Freedom Message of 16 April 2003, and from the fact that it was the subject of the first Order issued by the CPA in May 2003.

6. The UK did have advance sight of the text of the Freedom Message, which "disestablished" the Ba'ath Party, but did not succeed in having its drafting changed to reflect concerns raised by lawyers in the FCO.

7. In the post-conflict phase, Secretary Rumsfeld and the Department of Defense in Washington, and Ambassador Bremer in Baghdad, became the driving forces of de-Ba'athification policy.

8. The UK's absence from formal decision-making within the CPA (see Section 9.8) meant that its input to discussion of de-Ba'athification policy in May 2003 was dependent on the influence of one particular individual: Mr John Sawers, the Prime Minister's Special Representative to Iraq. The key policy choice at that point was centred on whether the top three, or the top four, tiers of the Ba'ath Party should be brought into scope.

9. The CPA Order No.1 signed by Ambassador Bremer differed from the UK policy position on the best approach to de-Ba'athification. In particular, the decision to bring the fourth tier[1] of Ba'ath Party members into scope – which increased the number of individuals potentially affected from around 5,000 to around 30,000 – was considered by the UK to be disproportionate and likely to deprive Iraqi institutions of much-needed capacity.

10. The Inquiry agrees with the UK's view, and considers that limiting de-Ba'athification to the top three tiers would have had the potential to be far less damaging to Iraq's post-invasion recovery and political stability.

11. As Order No.1 was being finalised, UK officials did not propose any attempt at Ministerial level to influence the policy via Washington. The effect of such an approach may in any case have been limited as significant policy choices appear to have been made before Ambassador Bremer deployed to Iraq. Not unreasonably, Mr Sawers advised against lobbying Washington in the face of a strong desire by the Iraqi Leadership Group, comprised largely of Shia and Kurdish politicians, for a stringent approach to de-Ba'athification.

12. However, the UK's informal acceptance of Order No.1 helped to set the tone for its relationship with the CPA which persisted throughout the lifespan of the organisation. Informal consultation with the UK, usually through Mr Sawers and subsequently Sir Jeremy Greenstock, became the norm.

13. The Order had consequences. It made the task of reconstructing Iraq more difficult, both by reducing the pool of Iraqi administrators and by adding to the pool of the unemployed and disaffected, which in turn fed insurgent activity.

[1] Down to the rank of Group Member.

14. After Order No.1 was signed, the UK, having recognised the Order's potential to create a pool of disaffected individuals and to deny posts to effective public servants, urged a pragmatic approach to de-Ba'athification in its contacts with the US, including at the highest levels, but with little practical effect.

15. In November 2003, the CPA decided to hand responsibility for implementing de-Ba'athification to the Governing Council (GC). There were misgivings about the decision in the FCO but, rather than act on them, it relied on assurances that the policy was to be implemented flexibly.

16. Although it would have been challenging to create, a more independent oversight body than the GC would have been more appropriate. The decision to hand over responsibility for implementation to a political body of this nature was, in the Inquiry's view, a mistake which left a critically important area of policy outside the control of the CPA, with damaging consequences.

17. One Iraqi interlocutor suggested to the Inquiry that it would have been preferable for judges to preside over the process but also recognised that the Iraqi court system was not in a fit state to take on additional responsibilities in 2003.

18. As soon as it was appointed, the High National de-Ba'athification Commission, steered by Dr Ahmed Chalabi and Mr Nuri al-Maliki, took action to toughen the impact of de-Ba'athification. Both officials and military commanders recognised almost immediately that such action was likely to generate further instability, but the CPA's decision to hand over responsibility to the GC left the UK unable to intervene. The UK, however, remained responsible for security in the South in the face of a growing insecurity.

19. The enthusiasm for de-Ba'athification felt by many Iraqi political leaders – Dr Chalabi and Mr Maliki in particular – may well have made any policy change difficult to achieve. This enthusiasm reflected a deep-seated fear within the Shia community of the resurgence of the Ba'ath Party and a return to Sunni dominance.

20. After the appointment of the Interim Transitional Government in June 2004, the coalition's responsibilities in Iraq shifted, but it retained considerable influence over the development of the political process.

21. By the time of Iraq's first post-invasion elections, de-Ba'athification had already been identified as a major political issue because it put a substantial barrier in the way of Sunni engagement with the political process. Although the UK placed a high premium on successful and inclusive elections, attempting to remove the barriers imposed by Order No.1 was not made a priority.

22. Increasing codification of the extent of de-Ba'athification, in the Transitional Administrative Law and then the Iraqi Constitution, was one crucial way in which sectarianism was legitimised in Iraqi political culture, helping to create an unstable foundation for future Iraqi governments.

23. Although it is difficult to arrive at a precise figure, the evidence suggests that the impact of de-Ba'athification was felt by tens of thousands of rank and file Ba'athists. De-Ba'athification continued to be identified as a major Sunni grievance and a source of sustenance for the insurgency in Iraq as late as 2007.

24. As described in Sections 9.6 and 9.7, UK influence in Iraq and its relationship with the Iraqi Government declined further from 2007. From that point, lacking influence, there was very little realistic prospect of a UK-inspired change in the approach to de-Ba'athification.

25. The Inquiry concludes that early decisions on the form of de-Ba'athification and its implementation had a significant and lasting negative impact on Iraq. This negative impact was soon recognised by the UK Government, but its efforts to secure a change of approach were largely ineffective. This became a persistent problem that could be traced back to both the early failure to have a settled US/UK agreement on how the big issues of post-war Iraqi reconstruction would be handled and the improvised decision-making leading up to Order No.1.

Lessons

26. After the fall of a repressive regime, steps inevitably have to be taken to prevent those closely identified with that regime from continuing to hold positions of influence in public life. The development of plans which minimise undesired consequences, which are administered with justice and which are based on a robust understanding of the social context in which they will be implemented, should be an essential part of preparation for any post-conflict phase. This should include measures designed to address concerns within the wider population, including those of the victims of the old regime, and to promote reconciliation.

27. It is vital to define carefully the scope of such measures. Bringing too many or too few individuals within scope of measures like de-Ba'athification can have far-reaching consequences for public sector capacity and for the restoration of public trust in the institutions of government.

28. It is also important to think through the administrative implications of the measures to be applied and the process for their implementation.

29. The potential for abuse means that it is essential to have thought-through forms of oversight that are as impartial and non-partisan as possible.

30. For lessons related to the UK's involvement in decision-making within the CPA, see Section 9.8.

Introduction

1. This Section addresses the UK's Iraq strategy between 1990 and 2000. Although this period falls outside the Inquiry's Terms of Reference, events during that time nonetheless have a bearing on the subsequent policy decisions the Inquiry is examining.

2. This Section does not address the review of UK policy on Iraq which began in September 2000. That is addressed in Section 1.2.

3. This Section draws on material which is in the public domain, including the Ministry of Defence's Statements on the Defence Estimates 1991 (Cm 1559-I) and 1992 (Cm 1981), a paper on No-Fly Zones prepared for the Inquiry by the MOD in November 2009 and published on the Inquiry's website, the Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction (HC 898) in 2004, and House of Commons Research Papers 98/28, 99/13 and 02/53. Other sources, including evidence provided to the Inquiry, are identified in a footnote where appropriate.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

4. The Inquiry is grateful to Dr Hans Blix, Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) from 1981 to 1997 and Executive Chairman of the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission on Iraq (UNMOVIC) from 2000 to 2003, for giving oral evidence to the Inquiry.

5. The Inquiry also asked Mr Rolf Ekéus, Executive Chairman of the United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) on Iraq from 1991 to 1997 (and previously the Ambassador to the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva from 1978 to 1983 and involved in international negotiations on the Chemical Weapons Convention and the Control and Verification of the Biological Weapons Convention), whether he had any insights or reflections on the results of inspections in the 1990s and Iraq's response to them; and for any comment he might wish to make on Dr Blix's evidence on UNSCOM's operations.

6. The Inquiry is grateful to Mr Ekéus for his statement, in which he describes the role, methodology and independence of UNSCOM and its relationship with the IAEA, and for agreeing that it could be published with the Inquiry's Report. Mr Ekéus emphasised the complexity of UNSCOM's operations, which he felt had been "missing" from the oral evidence presented to the Inquiry.

UK Iraq strategy

7. Following the Gulf Conflict in 1990-1991, the UK and the US played a leading role in sustaining a policy of containment and deterrence towards Iraq for the rest of the decade. US and UK policies were intertwined. UK policy evolved through a process of dialogue and negotiation between the UK and US Governments, and, in turn, between each Government and its other partners and allies at the UN, in the region, and in Europe.

8. Although it is not the task of the Inquiry to evaluate US policy, the approach taken by the UK Government can only be understood in the context of its dialogue with Washington and the evolution of US policy.

9. The UK and the US shared common strategic interests in the region, but their analyses and policies were not identical and there were important differences in their tactical and diplomatic approaches. France and Russia also had key interests in Iraq, which pre-dated the 1990-1991 Gulf Conflict, including in relation to outstanding debts for arms they had supplied. As Permanent Members of the Security Council, they too had significant influence on the development of international policy on Iraq.

Iraq's invasion of Kuwait

10. After the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq War, Iraq continued to develop its military capability. Some Western governments had shown a degree of support for Iraq during that conflict, but tension grew between Iraq and the West as evidence emerged of advanced work on weapons of mass destruction, including nuclear weapons, in contravention of Iraq's international treaty obligations. Some Western firms were implicated in supplying material to Iraq, as Lord Justice Scott set out in the Report of the Inquiry into the Export of Defence Equipment and Dual-Use Goods to Iraq and Related Prosecutions, published in 1996. The execution of Observer freelance journalist Mr Farzad Bazoft in March 1990 led to the withdrawal of the British Ambassador to Iraq. The subsequent discovery at Heathrow Airport, the same month, of an attempt to smuggle nuclear-weapons-related components further exacerbated the deterioration in the UK's relations with Iraq.

11. In July 1990, Saddam Hussein accused Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates of waging economic warfare against Iraq. The accusation was based on: their reluctance to reduce oil production to force a rise in prices; Kuwait's unwillingness to cancel Iraq's debts for the large loans it had received during the Iran-Iraq War; and accusations that Kuwait was stealing from the Rumaylah oilfield, which straddles the border between Iraq and Kuwait. Iraq began moving the eight divisions of the Republican Guard towards the border on 16 July. Negotiations to settle the dispute, facilitated by King Fahd of Saudi Arabia and President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt, began in Jedda on 31 July.

12. Despite assurances of peaceful intent from Saddam Hussein to King Fahd and President Mubarak, Iraqi military forces invaded Kuwait in the early hours of 1 August. Within a few hours, the UN Security Council met to discuss elements of a draft resolution. On 2 August, the Security Council adopted resolution 660 (1990), determining that a breach of international peace and security existed, and confirming that it was acting under Articles 39 and 40 of the UN Charter (see Box, 'The Charter framework for the use of force'). The resolution condemned the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait; demanded that Iraq withdraw immediately and unconditionally all its forces to the positions in which they were located on 1 August 1990; called upon Iraq and Kuwait immediately to begin intensive negotiations to resolve their differences; and decided to meet again as necessary to consider further steps to ensure compliance with the resolution.

13. On 6 August, the Security Council adopted resolution 661 (1990), reaffirming resolution 660 and expressing deep concern that it had not been implemented, despite Kuwait's expression of readiness to comply. Acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter (see Box, 'The Charter framework for the use of force'), the Security Council decided to take measures to secure compliance with the demand for immediate Iraqi withdrawal which was included in resolution 660. Resolution 661 imposed comprehensive economic sanctions on Iraq, including prohibiting the import and export of all commodities into and out of Iraq, with the exception of medical supplies and, in humanitarian circumstances, foodstuffs. The resolution also prohibited States from providing any funding or financial or economic resources to Iraq, and required them to freeze any of its assets or resources, with the exception of payments for medical or humanitarian purposes. A Committee of all Council members was established to review and report on implementation of the sanctions.

14. Resolution 662 (1990), adopted on 9 August, recorded that the Security Council had decided Iraq's annexation of Kuwait was "null and void", and called upon all States, international organisations and specialised agencies not to recognise it. Eight further resolutions followed addressing: the safety of third-State nationals within Iraq and Kuwait; the circumstances in which the importation of foodstuffs would be permitted; and further condemning Iraqi attacks on Kuwaiti, third-State and diplomatic persons. By early September, 17 countries had committed forces to a growing, US-led military coalition, which was already involved in enforcing sanctions. The US, UK and France had agreed to deploy air and land forces to Saudi Arabia to deter Iraq from further aggression. In September and October, further forces were deployed as the international community prepared to liberate Kuwait if Saddam Hussein did not comply with the Security Council's demand that he withdraw.

15. On 29 November, the Security Council adopted resolution 678 (1990) which said that, acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, it:

> "Demands that Iraq comply fully with resolution 660 and all subsequent resolutions, and decides, while maintaining all its decisions, to allow Iraq one final opportunity, as a pause of goodwill, to do so;
> "Authorises Member States co-operating with the Government of Kuwait, unless Iraq on or before 15 January 1991 fully implements the above-mentioned resolutions, to use all necessary means to uphold and implement resolution 660 and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area."[1]

16. The resolution was adopted by 12 votes to two (Cuba and Yemen); China abstained.

The Charter framework for the use of force

The United Nations was established in 1945 “to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war”. In its Charter, it set out its intention to “ensure, by the acceptance of principles and the institution of methods, that armed force shall not be used, save in the common interest”. The purposes of the UN include: “To maintain international peace and security, and to that end to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace …” (Article 1). States are forbidden to use force against the territorial integrity or political independence of other States (Article 2, paragraph 4).

Chapter VI of the United Nations Charter contains prescriptions relating to the peaceful settlement of disputes. Chapter VII contains, but is not limited to, what were intended to be comprehensive prescriptions relating to the use of force in the context of “action with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace, and acts of aggression”.

The UN Charter envisaged that States would not need to use force to protect their national interests. The intention was for any threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression to be met by collective security, provided by the Security Council. Article 39 provides for the Security Council to determine the existence of a threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression, which must precede enforcement measures under Articles 41 (sanctions) and 42 (military enforcement measures).

Article 40 provides for the Security Council to call upon the parties to comply with such provisional measures as it deems necessary or desirable, before making recommendations or taking other measures to maintain or restore international peace and security. That has proved, for political reasons, impossible to achieve in the form envisaged under Chapter VII. Instead, the United Nations has resorted to UN peacekeeping (in which the consent of the “host State” is required). On two occasions, UN Members have been authorised (but not obliged, as the unimplemented Charter provisions envisaged) to engage in assisting a State that had been invaded (South Korea in Security Council resolution 83 (1950) and Kuwait in Security Council resolution 678 (1990) in repelling that attack.

Such authorisations are in every way exceptional. In the case of Korea, it was conducted, formally at least, under a United Nations Command. In the case of the 1990-1991 Gulf Conflict, the authorisation given in resolution 678 to “Member States co-operating with the Government of Kuwait” was not under a unified UN command, but was the final element of an immediately prior series of resolutions. The authorisation in both cases – two examples in nearly 60 years – was within the context of Security Council control. The authorisations for the use of force were clear in their terms, as is consistent with the Charter and the primacy of the responsibility of the Security Council (in contrast to the General Assembly) as articulated in Article 24 of the Charter.

The idea that “authorisation” by the Security Council is far from being a routine basis for a legitimate use of force by a State, or coalitions of States, is further suggested by the fact that the authorisation in both Security Council resolution 83 (1950) and resolution 678 (1990) referred to a use of force in assistance of the attacked country to repel an invasion, the attacking State having failed to withdraw.

Article 48 of the Charter provides that action to carry out the decisions of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security “shall be taken by all the Members of the United Nations or by some of them, as the Security Council shall determine".[2] There is no suggestion in the Charter of a residual right for individual Members to enforce Security Council decisions.

Article 51 provides that nothing in the Charter should impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence in the event of an armed attack on a Member State, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. Although a State may act in self-defence without prior authorisation, it is required immediately to report such action to the Security Council; and such action would not in any way affect the authority of the Security Council. The intention to exercise overarching Security Council control, is apparent.

The scheme of the Charter, against which all resolutions should be viewed for the proper understanding of their terms, suggests both that authorisations to States to use force to enforce a Security Council decision in the context of a threat to international peace are extremely rare, and that they occur only with the clear agreement of the Security Council. The Security Council, however, has rarely engaged directly in efforts to resolve individual conflicts. Its involvement in containing Iraq after the invasion of Kuwait and its subsequent liberation in 1991 was unusual.

The 1991 Gulf Conflict

17. Iraq did not comply with resolution 678. Discussions in Geneva between Mr James Baker (the US Secretary of State) and Mr Tariq Aziz (the Iraqi Foreign Minister), and in Baghdad between Mr Perez de Cuellar (the UN Secretary-General) and Saddam Hussein, were unsuccessful.

18. On 14 January 1991, Saddam Hussein called on the Iraqi people to fight to the death to hold on to Kuwait. The coalition began the military operation to liberate Kuwait, named Operation Desert Storm, on 17 January. The coalition comprised 42 States. In addition to the US and UK, 13 countries, including France and a number of Arab and Gulf States, took part in offensive operations. The campaign began with air strikes, with the objective of:

- disrupting Iraq's command, control and communications;
- destroying Iraq's nuclear, biological and chemical warfare capability;
- severing supply routes to Kuwait; and
- attacking Iraqi forces in Kuwait.

19. From mid-February, Russia sought to broker a deal for the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait, but Iraq's conditions were unacceptable to the Security Council. In a final effort to obtain Iraqi compliance, coalition governments issued a statement on 22 February setting out the conditions which Iraq needed to meet to bring about a cessation of hostilities. The statement made clear that if Iraq informed the UN of its acceptance before noon on 23 February, the coalition would not launch a ground offensive. Iraq rejected that final deadline.

[2] In resolution 221 (1966) the Security Council authorised the UK "to prevent, by the use of force, if necessary" the arrival at Beira of vessels believed to be carrying oil destined for Southern Rhodesia, and empowered the UK to arrest and detain the tanker Joanna V upon departure from Beira.

20. On 23 and 24 February, a massive coalition land operation began in Kuwait. On the morning of 26 February, Saddam Hussein claimed in a broadcast that he had ordered his forces to withdraw from Kuwait. The broadcast also claimed victory and asserted Iraq's continued claim on Kuwait. Coalition leaders responded by repeating that Iraq must accept unconditionally all UN resolutions, release all prisoners of war and detainees, and end the destruction of Kuwait. The coalition also made clear that unarmed Iraqi soldiers would not be attacked but that, to ensure the safety of allied troops, forces retreating with their weapons would continue to be treated as hostile. Iraqi units moving north with their equipment were attacked from the air during the night of 26/27 February.

21. By the night of 27/28 February, Kuwait had been liberated. After consulting coalition partners, President George HW Bush announced a suspension of hostilities, to take effect from midnight on 27 February. As a result, a number of elite Iraqi fighting units returned to Iraq intact.

22. On 2 March, the Security Council adopted resolution 686 (1991). It affirmed that the 12 preceding resolutions, including the application of sanctions, continued to have effect, and set out a number of demands including: acceptance of the preceding resolutions; military conditions for the cessation of hostile activities; the release of all Kuwaiti and "third-State nationals" detained by Iraq or the release of the remains of any deceased personnel; the release of prisoners of war; and the payment of reparations. It stated that the authority to use force in resolution 678 remained valid during the period required for Iraq to comply with those demands. The meeting between coalition and Iraqi military commanders to agree the military conditions for the cease-fire took place at Safwan, on the Iraq-Kuwait border, the following day.

23. Resolution 687 (1991) was adopted on 3 April, by 12 votes to one (Cuba); Ecuador and Yemen abstained. Its preambular paragraphs:

- recalled and affirmed the 13 previous Security Council resolutions;
- affirmed the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq;
- recalled its objective of the establishment of a nuclear weapons-free zone in the region of the Middle East;
- reiterated its objective of restoring international peace and security in the area; and
- set out the need to take the measures specified, acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter.

24. The resolution's operative paragraphs were divided into a number of separate parts. Sections A, B, D, E and G all addressed various issues relating to Kuwait, including: respect for the inviolability of the international boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, and arrangements for its demarcation; arrangements to deter violations of the boundary through a demilitarised zone; arrangements to facilitate the return of Kuwaiti property; Iraq's liability to Kuwait for financial reparations; and arrangements to facilitate the repatriation of Kuwaiti and third-country nationals.

25. Section C of the resolution addressed Iraq's possession and intentions in relation to weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and other weapons systems and programmes, including the establishment of a Special Commission which became known as the United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM).

26. Section F of the resolution addressed sanctions, removing the prohibition on the import into Iraq of foodstuffs provided they were notified to the Committee set up under resolution 661 (subsequently known as the 661 Committee). The Committee was given the power to approve the import of other items for essential civilian needs. That provision was subject to review every 60 days in the light of the policies and practices of the Iraqi Government, including the implementation of all relevant resolutions, for the purpose of determining whether to reduce or lift the prohibitions. In certain circumstances, the 661 Committee was also empowered to approve exceptions to the prohibitions on exports from Iraq.

27. The resolution also affirmed the prohibition on the sale or supply of arms and related materiel of all types, including both those prohibited by other provisions of the resolution and conventional weapons and weapons technology; and called upon all States to maintain national controls to ensure compliance with the prohibition.

28. Section H of the resolution required Iraq to inform the Security Council that it would not commit or support any act of international terrorism or allow terrorist organisations to operate within its territory, and to condemn unequivocally and renounce all acts of terrorism.

29. Resolution 687 concluded (Section I) by declaring that, upon official notification by Iraq to the Secretary-General and the Security Council of its acceptance of the provisions, a formal cease-fire would be effective between Iraq and Kuwait and the Member States co-operating with Kuwait in accordance with resolution 678.

30. Iraq indicated its acceptance of the resolution on 6 April, and the cease-fire came into effect on 11 April.

Legacy of the 1990-1991 Gulf Conflict

INTERNAL REPRESSION

31. To maintain control in Iraq, Saddam Hussein used extreme brutality, wilfully violating international human rights norms and covenants. Following Iraq's expulsion from Kuwait, his opponents inside Iraq mounted two separate, but parallel, attempts to overthrow the regime.

32. On 1 March 1991, demonstrations in Basra and Najaf developed into battles between Shia fighters and Saddam Hussein's security forces. Within days, the unrest had spread to all the main Shia cities in southern Iraq. At the same time, Kurdish forces saw an opportunity to seize control of northern Iraq and by 20 March they had captured every city in the North, including Kirkuk. Saddam Hussein's forces responded with brutal, indiscriminate force, using helicopter gunships and artillery to crush the resistance. Thousands of Shia and Kurdish citizens were killed and many more fled their homes, particularly in the North, where they were caught in the mountains on the borders.

33. Initially, coalition states were reluctant to intervene for a number of reasons including: inhibitions about interference in the internal affairs of Iraq and being sucked into a civil war; concerns about the break-up of Iraq; and fears of a possible revolutionary Shia government. But outrage at Saddam Hussein's actions, and claims that coalition rhetoric had encouraged the uprisings,[3] led to decisions to take action. US commanders warned that they would shoot down any Iraqi aircraft flying over the country; two Iraq Su-22 aircraft were subsequently shot down, one on 15 and one on 22 March.

34. On 5 April, the Security Council adopted resolution 688 (1991), which condemned "the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of Iraq" and demanded that "Iraq, as a contribution to removing the threat to international peace and security in the region, immediately end this repression".[4] It insisted that "Iraq allow immediate access by international humanitarian organisations"; requested the Secretary-General "to pursue his humanitarian efforts in Iraq"; and appealed to all Member States "to contribute to these humanitarian relief efforts".

35. By early April, however, Saddam Hussein had already regained control. Iraq's ruling Revolutionary Command Council announced on 5 April "the complete crushing of acts of sedition, sabotage, and rioting in all towns of Iraq". Refugees were moving towards the borders with Turkey and Iran and, because the border with Turkey was closed, their position caused serious concern. On 6 April, the US-led Operation Provide Comfort

[3] Dr Barham Salih, the Kurdistan Front spokesman in London, was reported in the Los Angeles Times on 8 April saying that the Kurds felt a bitter sense of betrayal, having taken President Bush's encouragement of an Iraqi revolt literally. "I don't know of any other interpretation … There was a clear statement that Saddam ought to be removed and the Iraqi people will be supported."

began to provide humanitarian relief to the Kurds and to help them return to northern Iraq. The creation of a No-Fly Zone (NFZ) followed.

36. Iraq did not accept the provisions of resolution 688. A Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) between the Government of Iraq and the UN, signed on 18 April, permitted only a limited UN presence to provide humanitarian assistance and relief for the "return and normalisation" of the lives of "displaced persons" in their place of origin, "without prejudice to the sovereignty, territorial integrity, political independence, security and non-interference in the internal affairs" of Iraq.[5] The MOU was to apply until December 1991.

DIPLOMATIC ISOLATION

37. Iraq was widely regarded as a disruptive force within the region. In his time in power, Saddam Hussein had attacked Iran, Saudi Arabia, Israel and Kuwait. Despite the sanctions imposed by resolution 687 and the severe damage inflicted on Iraq's armed forces, the regime continued to be seen as hostile and potentially threatening by Kuwait and some of Iraq's other neighbours.

38. The boundary with Kuwait was demarcated by a UN Commission, and resolution 833 (1993) affirmed that its decisions were final. On 15 October 1994, following Iraqi military deployments towards Kuwait, resolution 949 (1994) noted past Iraqi threats and instances of actual use of force against its neighbours; warned that any hostile or provocative action against its neighbours constituted a threat to peace and security in the region; and underlined that the Security Council would "consider Iraq fully responsible for the serious consequences of any failure to fulfil the demands" in the resolution, including that Iraq withdraw its forces and not take any other action to enhance its military capacity in southern Iraq.[6] Iraq accepted the UN demarcation of the border in a letter of 27 November 1994[7] but Iraq's claim to the territory of Kuwait was never resolved.[8]

39. The US and UK did not resume diplomatic relations with Iraq. Of the other Permanent Members of the Security Council, Russia and China maintained an Embassy in Baghdad, and France maintained a liaison office. Russia represented the UK's interests.[9]

The strategy of containment

40. The coalition had made a deliberate decision in 1991 not to pursue the overthrow of Saddam Hussein. Mr Baker stated in April 1991 that "the removal of Saddam Hussein was neither a political nor a military objective" of the US, and that:

> "We are not prepared to go down the slippery slope of being sucked into a civil war … We cannot police what goes on inside Iraq, and we cannot be the arbiters of who governs Iraq. As President [George HW] Bush has repeatedly made clear, our objective was the liberation of Kuwait. It never extended to the remaking of Iraq. We repeatedly said that could only be done by the Iraqi people."[10]

41. In a later interview, Mr Dick Cheney, the US Defense Secretary in 1991, said that there had been concern about what to do with Iraqi soldiers who were "surrendering in droves"; and that there was a limit to how long you could "continue the bloodshed without having it look as though we were asking our troops to do something we probably shouldn't ask them to do".[11] He added that, while some had argued that the coalition should have continued to Baghdad, he thought that if they had done that "we would have been bogged down there for a very long time with the real possibility we might not have succeeded".

42. From the end of the conflict, the objective of encouraging a change of regime in Baghdad was an element of the policy debate in Washington. Mr Richard Haass, who served in the administration of each President Bush, observed that the administrations of President George HW Bush, President Bill Clinton and President George W Bush "each contended with the question of how to balance containment with a desire for regime change".[12]

43. Saddam Hussein proved more intractable than was predicted. Throughout the 1990s the UN Security Council frequently discussed Iraq and Saddam's continued refusal to accept all the obligations imposed. A total of 41 resolutions were passed between resolution 687and December 2000. There were continuous efforts to contain the Iraqi threat and put pressure on Iraq to disarm and to comply with the Security Council's requirements. Saddam Hussein's objective was to break out from UN restrictions and, by avoiding full compliance, to retain and rebuild Iraq's military capabilities.

44. In addition to diplomatic isolation, the strategy of "containment" had several dimensions which developed in response to challenges posed by the Iraqi regime, including:

- NFZs covering the North and South of Iraq, patrolled by US, UK and (until 1996) French aircraft;
- economic sanctions;

- a ban on the sale of arms to Iraq;
- a naval force in the Gulf with powers to intercept ships suspected of breaching sanctions;
- military forces of the US, the UK and other allies stationed in neighbouring countries as a deterrent; and
- efforts to enforce the provisions set out in resolution 687 for the destruction of Iraq's chemical, biological and nuclear weapons programmes, and of its longer-range missiles, under the supervision of UNSCOM inspectors.

Those elements are described in the following Sections.

45. Sir Peter Ricketts, FCO Director General Political 2001 to 2003, told the Inquiry that the purpose of the UK's policy was "containment" of "Saddam Hussein's ambitions to redevelop weapons of mass destruction but also containment of the threat which Iraq had posed to the region".[13]

46. Sir Peter said that containment had three strands. The first was sanctions, where the arms embargo was the most effective element and sanctions on Iraqi oil exports and revenues were handled through the complex machinery of the Oil-for-Food (OFF) programme run by the UN. The second strand he described as an "incentive" strand based on resolution 1284 (1999), which had offered the Iraqis a deal whereby sanctions would be suspended 120 days after the Iraqis accepted the return of weapons inspectors to Iraq. The third strand was deterrence provided by the NFZs.

THE NORTHERN NO-FLY ZONE

47. On 10 April 1991, an NFZ was established north of the 36th parallel, enforced by US, UK and French aircraft based at Incirlik in Turkey. The UK contribution, Operation HAVEN, also involved the deployment of 3 Commando Brigade into northern Iraq until mid-July. In a statement to Parliament on 15 April, Mr Douglas Hurd, the Foreign Secretary, explained that the UK's policy envisaged the creation of "temporary safe havens in Iraq, in which UN officials can provide for the basic needs of refugees and monitor their security until they can return to their homes in safety".[14] The aim was "to create places and conditions in which refugees can feel secure … We support the territorial integrity of Iraq."

48. On 7 June, relief operations were handed over to the United Nations High Commission for Refugees and by mid-July almost all the 400,000 Kurdish refugees who had fled into the mountains in the Iraq-Turkey border region had returned to their homes or to the camps constructed for them by coalition forces.

49. On 24 July, Op Provide Comfort and Op HAVEN were replaced by Operation Provide Comfort II, of which the UK contribution was Operation WARDEN. Its primary aims were to prevent Saddam Hussein from attacking the Kurds from the air by maintaining the NFZ, and to monitor whether he was complying with resolution 688. There was also a limited humanitarian element to the mission, with the protection of humanitarian convoys and continued distribution of supplies to Kurds and other minorities in the region.

50. In October 1995, the UN assumed full responsibility for the humanitarian elements of the operations.

THE SOUTHERN NO-FLY ZONE

51. In 1992, concern mounted about Saddam Hussein's continued persecution of the Shia in the South, including the draining of the Arab marshes and a forced resettlement programme accompanied by a counter-insurgency campaign that included indiscriminate attacks on villages by artillery, helicopter gunships and fixed-wing aircraft.

52. On 11 August, the UN Special Rapporteur on Iraq set out his concerns directly to the Security Council. Citing the need for a response to those concerns, US, UK and French forces launched Operation Southern Watch on 27 August, imposing an "air-exclusion" zone south of the 32nd parallel using aircraft based in Saudi Arabia. The UK contribution was called Operation JURAL.

THE LEGAL BASIS FOR THE NO-FLY ZONES

53. Resolution 688 condemned Iraq's suppression of its own people, particularly the Kurds, and demanded the immediate end to their repression. It also requested the Secretary-General to provide humanitarian relief to the Iraqi people. But, unlike many previous and subsequent resolutions on Iraq, resolution 688 was not made under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, the only Chapter under which the use of force can be authorised (see Box, 'The Charter framework for the use of force', earlier in this Section). It did not explicitly authorise the coalition's actions in patrolling Iraqi airspace to monitor the NFZs. Nor did resolution 688 invite or authorise Member States to monitor its effect.

54. A review by the then Attorney General of the legal basis for the NFZs was conducted in November 1997.

55. The UK Government stated that, in enforcing NFZs, it was acting "in support" of resolution 688. Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, said in April 2000 that UK operations in the NFZs were:

> "… essentially based on the overwhelming humanitarian necessity of protecting people on the ground, combined with the need to monitor the effect of [resolution] 688; so it is the two taken in combination that provides the legal justification."[15]

[15] Minutes, Defence Committee (House of Commons), 19 April 2000, [Evidence Session], Qs 3 and 11.

56. Sir Michael Wood, FCO Legal Adviser from 1999 to 2006, told the Inquiry that the legal basis on which the UK Government relied in establishing the NFZs:

> "… was based upon an exceptional right to take action to avert an overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe …
> "The need to avert an extreme humanitarian catastrophe … is regarded by the British Government as being derived from customary international law, and the essence of it, I think, is that if something like the Holocaust were happening today, if the Security Council were blocked, you couldn't get an authorisation from it, then it simply cannot be the law that States cannot take action to intervene in that kind of a situation, an emergency of that scale."[16]

57. Sir Michael also referred to the answer given by Baroness Symons to Parliament in 1998 in relation to Kosovo, which set out the Government's position on the use of force for humanitarian purposes:

> "There is no general doctrine of humanitarian necessity in international law. Cases have nevertheless arisen (as in northern Iraq in 1991) when, in the light of all the circumstances, a limited use of force was justifiable in support of purposes laid down by the Security Council but without the Council's express authorisation when that was the only means to avert an immediate and overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe. Such cases would in the nature of things be exceptional and would depend on an objective assessment of the factual circumstances at the time and on the terms of relevant decisions of the Security Council bearing on the situation in question."[17]

58. While enforcing the NFZs, coalition aircraft also collected tactical reconnaissance information to help monitor Saddam Hussein's compliance with resolution 688.

59. Op Provide Comfort II formally ended on 31 December 1996. France withdrew from the enforcement of the northern NFZ, announcing that the humanitarian need had subsided. On 1 January 1997, Operation Northern Watch began, enforced by UK and US aircraft.

60. Following an attack on 19 September 1996 on Iraqi air defence missile sites north of the 32nd parallel which had targeted coalition aircraft, the US and the UK moved the boundary of the southern NFZ north to the 33rd parallel. From that date, French aircraft participated only in patrols up to the 32nd parallel. France withdrew its support for the operation in the wake of Operation Desert Fox, in December 1998, although it continued to station aircraft in Saudi Arabia.

61. The zones, covering around 60 percent of the land area of Iraq, continued to exist until March 2003.

[17] House of Lords, Official Report, 16 November 1998, column WA140.

62. On a number of occasions, UK and US aircraft enforcing the NFZs targeted Iraqi military assets. The legal basis for those attacks derived from the right to self-defence. The MOD paper on NFZs states:

> "… it remained the UK's position that it was engaged in a lawful activity in monitoring the NFZs and if coalition forces were attacked or under imminent threat of attack, they were entitled to defend themselves. So UK forces participating in the No Fly Zones were permitted to attack targets which were or contributed to actual or imminent threat of attack. This was based on the inherent right of self-defence."

63. Activity in the NFZs increased over time and, in response to the threat from Iraq, eventually extended to attacks on Iraqi air defence sites outside the Zones. Incidents increased significantly after Operation Desert Fox. Concerns about the continued legality of the NFZs in 2000 and 2001 are addressed in Section 1.2.

ARMS EMBARGO

64. Resolution 687 confirmed the prohibition on the sale or supply to Iraq of arms and related materiel of all types, and called on all States to maintain national controls to ensure compliance. In his statement on 15 April 1991, Mr Hurd recorded that the UK's proposal was for "a strict arms embargo against Iraq to remain in force as long as Saddam Hussein is in power".[18] The principle of the embargo was relatively uncontroversial, but the control of items which had "dual use" (a civilian as well as a military use) did create difficulties. Various arrangements were made, including resolution 1051 (1996) adopted on 27 March 1996; but there were increasing disagreements.

ECONOMIC SANCTIONS

65. Resolution 687 provided the framework for the economic sanctions imposed on Iraq. It permitted the import of medicines, of food and of other supplies for essential civilian needs.

66. By the summer of 1991, concern about the "nutritional and health situation" of the Iraqi civilian population and the risk of a further deterioration led to the adoption of resolution 706 (1991) on 15 August. Acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, it authorised States to permit the import of Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products, for an initial period of six months, up to a defined limit of US$1.6bn. Payment for the purchases would be held in an escrow account to be established by the UN Secretary-General "exclusively to meet the purposes" of resolution 706. They were: the full cost of the UN carrying out the tasks authorised by section C of resolution 687 (inspections and monitoring) and facilitating the return of all Kurdish property seized by Iraq; half the costs of the Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission; the purchase of foodstuffs, medicines and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs; and the costs of implementing resolution 706 and other necessary humanitarian activity in Iraq.

[18] House of Commons, Official Report, 15 April 1991, column 21.

67. The resolution asked the UN Secretary-General to produce a scheme, which became known as the "Oil-for-Food" programme, to cover those purchases, and to monitor and supervise their equitable distribution to "all regions of Iraq" and "all categories of the Iraqi civilian population". The Secretary-General's report was submitted on 4 September, and implementation was authorised by resolution 712 (1991) adopted on 19 September.

68. Iraq rejected both resolutions and refused to co-operate on the grounds that the arrangements were an infringement of Iraq sovereignty. Resolution 778 (1992), adopted on 2 October 1992, deplored Iraq's position "which puts its civilian population at risk" and decided that any Iraqi funds arising from the proceeds of sale of Iraqi petroleum or petroleum products should be transferred by Member States to the UN escrow account. States were also to arrange to sell or purchase any petroleum or petroleum products owned by Iraq and transfer the proceeds to the escrow account; to contribute funds from other sources as soon as possible. The resolution stated that no further Iraqi assets should be released for the purchase of food stuffs, medicines and other essential supplies except to the escrow account or directly to the UN for humanitarian activities in Iraq.

69. By late 1993, differences had emerged within the Security Council over the conditions for lifting sanctions. The US and UK took the view that sanctions could only be lifted following Iraq's full compliance with its obligations as set out in UN resolutions. China, France and Russia believed that a timetable for the gradual lifting of sanctions should be put in place as Iraq complied with UN demands.

70. As a result of Iraq's objections, the UN adopted resolution 986 (1995) on 14 April 1995. It directed the committee established by resolution 661 to monitor the sale of petroleum and petroleum products exported by Iraq, with the assistance of independent inspection agents appointed by the UN Secretary-General; and to verify that the purchase price was "reasonable in the light of prevailing market conditions".[19] A separate escrow account was established to finance the export to Iraq of material covered by the resolution. In the exceptional circumstances in northern Iraq, and to ensure an equitable distribution, the UN Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme operating in the Governorates of Dahuk, Erbil and Sulaymaniyah would disburse a share of the fund. The fund was to be audited by "independent and certified public accountants". The UN Secretary-General was to keep the Government of Iraq "fully informed".

71. Iraq eventually accepted resolution 986 in May 1996, when a Memorandum of Understanding was agreed. Following the Iraqi offensive against the Kurds in August, implementation was suspended until December. The first shipment of food arrived in March 1997 and the first shipment of medicines in May 1997.

[19] UN Security Council resolution 986 (1995).

72. Resolution 1153 (1998), adopted on 20 February 1998, increased the amount of oil Iraq could sell from US$2bn every six months to US$5.2bn. The resolution requested the establishment of a group of experts to determine, with the Government of Iraq, "whether Iraq is able to export petroleum or petroleum products sufficient to produce" the funds identified in the resolution as necessary to meet Iraq's needs.[20] They reported in April that it could not, leading to authorisation of the import of oil industry spare parts and equipment in resolution 1175 (1998) on 19 June.

73. Resolution 1153 also recorded the UN Secretary-General's observation that the situation in the electricity sector in Iraq was extremely grave. It asked him, in consultation with the Government of Iraq, to submit a report on essential humanitarian needs, "including necessary improvements to infrastructure".

74. As a result of Iraq's decision to suspend co-operation with UNSCOM and the IAEA and resolution 1194 condemning Iraq's decision, the six-monthly UN reviews of sanctions were suspended. As an incentive, Iraq was offered the prospect of a comprehensive review of Iraqi compliance if co-operation was resumed. Iraq declined.

75. The Oil-for-Food programme continued to operate, with resolutions renewing the arrangements every six months, until 2003. It helped to alleviate the humanitarian position in Iraq, but there was concern, within the UN and elsewhere, about the impact of sanctions. As well as the humanitarian impact, there were reports of increased corruption in Iraq, misuse of Oil-for-Food, and increased oil smuggling which was benefiting Saddam Hussein's regime. These concerns led to questions about the sustainability of the policy, which are addressed in Section 1.2.

ENFORCEMENT AT SEA

76. There had been a Royal Navy (RN) presence in the Gulf region since the early 1980s, when the Armilla patrol was deployed to defend UK vessels caught in the crossfire of the Iran-Iraq War. After the 1991 Gulf Conflict, a RN frigate or destroyer was permanently deployed in the Gulf as part of a US-led naval force to support the UN arms embargo and controls on the export of oil through the Gulf. It had powers to intercept ships suspected of breaching UN resolutions.

DETERRENCE BY FORCES STATIONED IN THE REGION

77. Concerns about the risk of Saddam Hussein attacking neighbouring countries, particularly Kuwait, remained. Mr Simon Webb, MOD Policy Director from July 2001 to October 2004, told the Inquiry that the deterrent effect of aircraft enforcing the NFZ in southern Iraq was a "side benefit of risk reduction": it was an alternative to stationing significant ground forces in Kuwait because it enabled the US and UK to know what the military situation was in Iraq. If an Iraqi military build-up was detected it would give the US and UK time to attack ground forces before they could attack Kuwait.[21] The US and other allies had forces stationed in countries in the region, in particular Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Bahrain and Turkey, which could respond at short notice, should a threat emerge.

78. Following Iraq's deployment of 80,000 troops towards the border with Kuwait in October 1994, the US and UK rapidly deployed forces to Kuwait. The Security Council adopted resolution 949 (1994), and Iraqi forces withdrew north of the 32nd parallel. The US increased its military personnel based in Saudi Arabia from under 1,000 to around 7,000.

Iraq's weapons of mass destruction

Assessments of Iraq's WMD capability before the Gulf Conflict

79. The term "weapons of mass destruction" originated as an umbrella concept covering weapons with the capability to cause indiscriminate loss of life and wide-scale destruction.[22] All nuclear, chemical and biological weapons are frequently characterised as weapons of mass destruction, and radiological devices have been included more recently.

80. During the 1970s and 1980s, Iraq had active chemical, biological, nuclear, and missile programmes. It used chemical weapons against Iranian forces during the Iran-Iraq War and against Iraqi Kurds in Halabja in March 1988.

81. After 1998, Iraq continued to develop its military capability, including programmes to develop chemical, biological and nuclear weapons, and the means for their delivery including ballistic missiles.

82. Some Western firms were implicated in supplying material to Iraq, as Lord Justice Scott set out in the Report of the Inquiry into the Export of Defence Equipment and Dual-Use Goods to Iraq and Related Prosecutions published in 1996.

83. In March 1990, an attempt to smuggle nuclear-weapons-related components was discovered at Heathrow Airport.

[21] Public hearing, 24 November 2009, pages 49-50.

[22] The first official definition was provided by the UN Commission for Conventional Armaments in 1948 which defined weapons of mass destruction as "atomic explosive devices, radioactive material weapons, lethal chemical and biological weapons, and any weapons developed in the future which have characteristics comparable in destructive effect to those of the atomic bomb or other weapons mentioned above" (S/C.3/32/Rev.1, August 1948). This definition has been used in successive UN resolutions dealing with disarmament.

84. The Butler Report stated:

> "In the late 1970s, Iraq obtained large quantities of uranium ore from Niger, Portugal and Brazil. By the mid-1980s, however, Iraq had become self-sufficient in uranium ore, which was a by-product of indigenous phosphate mines … which extracted and purified the uranium ore for subsequent use in nuclear enrichment processes."[23]

85. After the invasion of Kuwait in August 1990, the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) issued a number of Assessments about Iraq's possession of weapons of mass destruction and its intentions.

86. The role and responsibilities of the JIC for providing Ministers and senior officials with regular intelligence Assessments on a range of issues of immediate and long-term importance to national interests, primarily in the fields of security, defence and foreign affairs are set out in Section 2.

87. The JIC assessed Iraq's nuclear capabilities in September 1990 and judged that, without "significant external assistance", it would take Iraq:

- "at least three years to establish a production facility for fissile material;
- one more year before sufficient weapons-grade material would be available for the production of one nuclear device; and
- a further year or more (ie 1995 at the earliest) before there would be enough material for a small stockpile of 3-4 weapons."[24]

88. The JIC's Assessment was based on an assumption that Iraq was "using only a centrifuge route" for enriching fissile material which was "later shown to be incorrect".

89. The JIC also examined, "on the basis of intelligence", the possibility that Iraq might have authorised a "crash programme" to produce an untested nuclear device.

90. That would have required Iraq to divert nuclear material stored at civil sites in breach of IAEA safeguards, to have recovered unburnt uranium from reactor fuel and to have advanced work on firing systems and high explosive parts to the stage where they could be incorporated into a nuclear device.

91. The JIC noted that:

- "If and only if all of these conditions were met … it is conceivable that Iraq could have the capability to make an untested nuclear weapon … with a yield of approximately 20 kilotonnes by the end of this year."

[24] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898, pages 42-43.

- Saddam Hussein might have authorised a development project on those lines but its conclusion remained that "the technical difficulties would be so great as to be virtually insurmountable in the short time available".

92. An IAEA inspection of Iraq's civil nuclear programme on 22 November 1990 showed that no fissile material had been diverted.

93. In December 1990, the JIC dismissed the option of an outside supplier providing the necessary material or a complete weapon on the grounds that only a few countries might have the motivation to supply the necessary material or weapons, and the JIC did not consider such supply likely.

94. A JIC Assessment of 20 September 1990, which cautioned that there were "considerable uncertainties about Iraq's current ballistic missile capability and deployments", estimated that Iraq:

- had a stockpile of "about 700" ballistic missiles;
- could have "about 300 SCUD-B" short range (300km) missiles;
- "may have converted some 250 SCUD-B missiles to the longer range [650km] Al Hussein variant"; and
- could have "up to 150" (900km) Al Abbas missiles.[25]

95. The Butler Report found that a single intelligence report, received in November 1990, had had a significant impact on the JIC's Assessments of Iraq's biological and chemical weapons capabilities.[26]

96. On 9 November 1990, the JIC reported:

> "According to the new intelligence, Iraq possesses the BW agents pneumonic plague and anthrax and has weaponised them … Weapons are available for immediate use …
> "The report that Iraq has weaponised anthrax is consistent with our earlier assessment that it might have done so. But we have no collateral for the claim that it has developed plague to a similar extent. Plague was, however, one of the agents included in the list of those that Iraq had studied or on which it had information … We believe that Iraq has the facilities to produce plague in sufficient quantities for weaponisation."[27]

97. Later that November, the Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) said that plague seedstock was now probably available to Iraq.

[27] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898, page 134.

98. The JIC and DIS judgements on plague were "based on several intelligence reports from a single informant described as 'a new source of unestablished reliability'" and who was "felt to be in a position to comment authoritatively".

99. The Butler Report observed that, in relation to Iraq's chemical warfare capability, the report:

> "… added new detail to the JIC's existing body of knowledge covering the types of chemical agents held in the Iraqi stockpile; the capabilities of those agents; their weaponisation into free-fall bombs; the availability of suitable ballistic missiles for the delivery of particular agents; and the volumes of each type of agent, and hence of the total chemical agent stockpile."[28]

100. On the basis of that report, the JIC "briefly" put "Iraq's total chemical agent stocks in the range 15,000-22,000 tonnes".

101. A JIC Assessment before military action against Iraq in 1991, intended "to provide military commanders with an indication of the possible scale of Iraq's use of chemical weapons, and of how long such use could be sustained", subsequently reduced the estimate of the size of the stockpile, to between 6,000-10,000 tonnes of agent.[29]

102. The enduring effect of that Assessment is addressed later in this Section.

103. Iraq fired 86 of its SCUD missiles during the 1991 conflict, 40 against Israel, 44 against Saudi Arabia and two in the direction of Bahrain and Qatar.[30] No Al Abbas missiles were fired.[31]

104. Based on its Assessment in September 1990, the JIC concluded on 17 April 1991 that Iraq might have up to 600 ballistic missiles left, "both standard SCUD and extended range variants", but the figure was "probably less".[32]

105. The Butler Report commented that JIC Assessments of Iraq's chemical warfare and ballistic missile programmes before military action in 1991 were "done on what was effectively a worst case basis", but that was not made explicitly clear.[33]

106. Reporting in 2005, the Iraq Survey Group (ISG) concluded that in 1991 the coalition's military actions had:

- destroyed or damaged most of Iraq's chemical weapons infrastructure;[34]
- damaged but did not destroy Iraq's biological weapons infrastructure;[35]
- successfully bombed most of the key facilities involved in the processing of nuclear material or weapons research which had been identified; and
- effectively targeted much of Iraq's delivery systems infrastructure.[36]

107. In its report, ISG stated that:

- Iraq produced hundreds of tons of a range of chemical agents annually, including mustard, sarin and tabun in the 1980s, and had committed significant resources to a long-term programme.[37]
- More than 100,000 "chemical munitions" were used against Iranian forces and the Kurdish population during the Iran-Iraq War.[38]
- Production of chemical agent ceased in 1988 but re-started in 1990.[39]
- A biological weapons programme had started in the 1970s.[40]
- Between 1979 and 1982 Iraq bought large quantities of uranium in several forms from several countries and, in 1982, began formally to pursue uranium enrichment.[41]
- In 1988 work began on a nuclear weapon research, development and production complex at Al Athir.
- In April 1990 orders were given to weaponise agents.[42]
- By early 1991, Iraq had produced large quantities of agent, including anthrax, botulinum toxin, Clostridium perfringens, aflatoxin and small quantities of ricin and it had successfully weaponised some of them into ballistic missiles, aerial bombs, artillery shells and aircraft spray tanks.[43]

Provisions of resolution 687

108. Resolution 687, adopted on 3 April 1991, addressed Iraq's obligations under international law in relation to the possession and use of chemical, biological and nuclear weapons.

109. The resolution stated that the Security Council was:

> "Conscious … of the statements by Iraq threatening to use weapons in violation of its obligations under the Geneva Protocol for the Prohibition of the Use in War of Asphyxiating, Poisonous or Other Gases, and of Bacteriological Methods of Warfare signed at Geneva on 17 June 1925, and of its prior use of chemical weapons and affirming that grave consequences that would follow any further use by Iraq of such weapons".[44]

110. The preambular paragraphs of the resolution also:

- recalled that Iraq had "subscribed to the Final Declaration adopted by all States participating in the Conference of States Parties to the 1925 Geneva Protocol and Other Interested States, held in Paris … January 1989, establishing the objective of universal elimination of chemical and biological weapons";
- recalled that Iraq had "signed the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on Their Destruction, of 10 April 1972";
- noted the "importance of Iraq ratifying this Convention"; and of "all States adhering" to the Convention;
- was aware of Iraq's use of "ballistic missiles in unprovoked attacks and therefore of the need to take specific measures in regard to such missiles located in Iraq";
- said that the Security Council was: "Concerned by the reports in the hands of Member States that Iraq had attempted to acquire materials for a nuclear-weapons programme contrary to its obligations under the Treaty of Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of 1 July 1968"; and
- said that the Security Council was: "Conscious of the threat that all weapons of mass destruction pose to peace and security in the area and the need to work towards the establishment in the Middle East of a zone free of such weapons."

111. Acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, Section C of the resolution set out Iraq's disarmament obligations.

112. Operative paragraph (OP) 7 of the resolution invited Iraq to reaffirm unconditionally its obligations under the 1925 Geneva Protocol and to ratify the 1972 Convention.[45]

[45] Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on Their Destruction, [signed] London and Moscow and Washington, 10 April 1972.

113. In OP8, the Security Council decided that Iraq should "unconditionally accept the destruction, removal, or rendering harmless, under international supervision", of all:

- chemical and biological weapons;
- stocks of agents;
- related subsystems and components;
- research, development, support and manufacturing facilities;
- ballistic missiles with a range greater than 150km; and
- related major parts, repair and production facilities.

114. In OP9, the Security Council decided that Iraq should submit a declaration of locations, amounts and types of all the items specified in OP8 and to agree to urgent on-site inspection. OP9 also specified:

- the formation of a Special Commission to carry out on-site inspections of Iraq's biological, chemical and missile capabilities; and
- a requirement on Iraq to yield possession to the Commission "for destruction, removal or rendering harmless" of all items specified in OP8.

115. In OP10, the Security Council decided that Iraq should "unconditionally undertake not to use, develop, construct or acquire any items specified" in OP8 and OP9, and requested the UN Secretary-General "in consultation with the Special Commission, to develop a plan" for future monitoring and verification for the approval of the Security Council "within one hundred and twenty days".

116. OP11 invited Iraq to "reaffirm unconditionally" its obligations under the 1968 Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons.

117. In OP12, the Security Council decided that Iraq should:

- "unconditionally agree not to acquire or develop nuclear weapons or nuclear-weapons-usable material or any subsystems or components or any research, development, support or manufacturing facilities related to" nuclear weapons;
- submit a declaration of the locations, amounts and types of specified items to the UN and the Director General of the IAEA;
- yield up any such items to the IAEA; and
- accept inspection and future ongoing monitoring and verification.

118. These requirements were more intrusive than the IAEA's previous methodology of "safeguards inspections" of declared sites.

119. OP13 requested the Director General of the IAEA, "through the Secretary-General, with the assistance and co-operation of the Special Commission" to:

- carry out immediate on-site inspections;

- develop a plan for submission to the Council within 45 days "calling for the destruction, removal or rendering harmless as appropriate" of all items listed in OP12;
- carry out that plan within 45 days of the Council's approval; and
- develop a plan for future monitoring and verification for the approval of the Security Council "within one hundred and twenty days".

120. The Special Commission provided for in OP9 subsequently became known as the United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM), and was a subsidiary organ of the Security Council, reporting to it through the UN Secretary-General. The Council asked the Director General of UNSCOM to carry out inspections, and to develop plans for the future monitoring and verification of both nuclear and other prohibited weapons systems and programmes. Mr Rolf Ekéus, a Swedish diplomat who had been the Ambassador to the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva from 1978 to 1983 and had been involved in international negotiations on the Chemical Weapons Convention and the Control and Verification of the Biological Weapons Convention, was appointed Executive Chairman of UNSCOM on 15 April 1991 and began work on 24 April.

Iraq's response to resolution 687

121. Iraq's initial declarations in response to resolution 687 were incomplete and it failed to co-operate with inspections and concealed activities.

122. In resolution 687, the UN originally expected a three-step inspection process:

- full disclosure by Iraq;
- verification of those disclosures by the Commission; and
- destruction, removal or rendering harmless under international supervision, of all proscribed weapons, materials and facilities.[46]

123. UNSCOM's approach was to establish a "material balance", for each of the weapons categories, between items acquired by Iraq through import or production and their disposal by use or destruction.[47]

124. Iraq provided initial declarations of its holdings of prohibited weapons on 18 and 28 April 1991.[48]

125. The Butler Review was told that the JIC pre-conflict estimate that Iraq's stockpile of chemical agent was between 6,000 and10,000 tonnes was "derived from past intelligence about production at individual plants, pieced together to provide a figure for the combined capacity for Iraq's production plants of 3,000-5,000 tonnes per annum".[49] The estimate was based on two years' production at full capacity since the end of the Iran-Iraq War, and the range reflected the inherent uncertainties in the calculation.

126. The Butler Report stated that:

- the consequence of the methodology adopted was "to leave the intelligence community with an estimate for the size of the Iraqi chemical agent stockpile which was over-cautious, and at its upper end worst case"; and
- the estimate was carried forward into subsequent Assessments but, after May 1991, the Assessments did not make clear the basis of the estimate.

127. The Report continued:

> "There will inevitably have been a risk that that estimate, shorn of its assumptions, may have become the 'prevailing wisdom', with subsequent Iraqi declarations being tested against it for truthfulness, especially in circumstances where intelligence was sparse. If so, that process would have tended to lead to deductions by analysts and policy-makers that there were shortfalls in Iraqi declarations. Furthermore, suspicions here will have been exacerbated by Iraqi prevarication, concealment and deception in the early- and mid-1990s, reinforcing any suspicions that Iraq had substantial stocks to hide."

128. Iraq "consistently and emphatically denied that it had undertaken any proscribed biological warfare related activity".[50]

129. In May 1991, the JIC stated that, while it could not "be precise", it was "confident" that Iraq had "substantially under-reported the numbers of missiles".[51]

130. The UN Security Council adopted resolution 699 (1991) approving the plans for UNSCOM and IAEA inspections on 17 June 1991.[52]

131. In July, UNSCOM supervised the destruction of 48 operational missiles, 14 conventional warheads, six operational mobile launchers and other equipment and material.[53]

The discovery of Iraq's nuclear programme

132. Following IAEA inspections in May and June 1991, and a meeting in Baghdad, Mr Ahmed Hussein, Iraq's Minister for Foreign Affairs, wrote to the UN Secretary-General on 7 July stating that Iraq had "decided that it would be appropriate to give an account" of its "peaceful nuclear programme".[54]

133. In an "overview" attached to the letter, Iraq stated that the programme had begun in 1956, after the US had announced that it was launching a peaceful nuclear programme, and it had been implemented in three stages:

- Collaboration with some Western countries and then the Soviet Union with the objective of building a "research reactor and laboratories for producing radioactive isotopes for medical and industrial applications".
- Accession to the Non-Proliferation Treaty and related system of safeguards followed by "agreements with France, Italy and other countries" in relation to the nuclear fuel cycle allowed Iraq to achieve:
  - experimental laboratories producing nuclear fuel for nuclear power plants;
  - research laboratories for processing spent nuclear fuel;
  - the nuclear power plant programme;
  - uranium extraction from phosphate ores; and
  - the establishment of the Tammuz 1[55] reactor and related facilities and equipment, which Israel had destroyed on 7 June 1981.
- As a result of the inability of international guarantees and bilateral agreements to protect facilities and personnel from aggression, it had been "necessary to adopt new formulas … to acquire the relevant nuclear know-how … of the nuclear fuel cycle, through self-reliance and the non-disclosure of information."

134. Iraq admitted that in the third stage it had:

- extracted uranium from carbonate ores;
- purified and converted uranium-bearing compounds;
- enriched uranium isotopes using the electromagnetic method;
- enriched uranium isotopes using the centrifugal method; and
- enriched isotopes by chemical methods.

135. Iraq stated that the US had bombed its declared nuclear facilities and reactors whilst they were in operation and that was "equivalent to a nuclear attack" which had endangered the population and the environment.

[54] Letter Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq to Secretary-General of the United Nations, 7 July 1991, [untitled], attaching 'Overview of the Iraqi nuclear programme' and tables.
[55] This reactor is frequently referred to as Osirak.

136. Iraq also provided detailed tables of its equipment and activities, which stated that it had produced half a kilogram of uranium 235 enriched to 4 percent through the electromagnetic process and the production of an "unappreciable" quantity of uranium enriched through a centrifuge process, and identifying those that had been damaged or destroyed.

137. Mr Hussein stated that "careful examination" of the details provided would enable the UN Secretary-General to conclude that the programme did "not entail any departure from, or violation of" the NPT and the IAEA safeguards agreement, which had been "constantly observed".

138. Mr Hussein added that Iraq had been "induced to refrain from declaring some of the stages of the programme though this was not in any way inconsistent with either the Treaty or the agreement" because of a fear of "exaggeration, abuse and aggression". Iraq therefore believed it was "best to abstain from overt reference to nuclear technology so that such reference might not be taken as a threat to the security of States or be used to hinder the propagation of the peaceful uses of such technology".

139. The decision to provide details of the nuclear programme was the result of two factors. First, the "comprehensive destruction" of the programme, and second, "Iraq's decision to destroy anything which might possibly be interpreted as incompatible" with resolution 687. The UN had "chosen to consider the destruction carried out by Iraq, without prior notification and without your participation, as inconsistent with the requirements for the implementation" of resolution 687.

140. Mr Hussein stated that he wished to reaffirm Iraq's "fear of exaggeration and deliberate alarmism in various fields, particularly the nuclear field". This had caused President George HW Bush:

> "… to declare in November 1990 that Iraq would produce a nuclear weapon within two months and that he was accordingly obliged to expedite launching the war and destroying Iraq's nuclear capabilities before Iraq could take advantage of that opportunity."

141. Mr Hussein wrote:

> "… this alone was sufficient reason for a decision to proceed with destruction."

142. The second reason for Iraq's actions was the decision to make Iraq pay the costs of implementing resolution 687. Iraq had "hastened its decision on destruction before receiving interminable lists of equipment to be destroyed".

143. In an exchange of correspondence with Dr Blix, which followed Iraq's admission, the IAEA disputed Iraq's view that it had not violated its obligations.[56]

144. Iraq continued to contest the IAEA view.[57] It stated that:

- Research activities had not reached the stage which required notification.
- The amount of enriched uranium produced was far less that the defined threshold for notification of 75 kilogrammes.
- It had experimented on only a "single centrifuge prototype, and not a successive chain".
- The three enrichment methods were in the early stages of development and did not mean the existence of an installation.
- Iraq was not required to report holdings of yellowcake and uranium dioxide which were being used for non-nuclear purposes, including reinforcing anti-tank warheads.
- IAEA inspectors had had access to stores of such material alongside material they were verifying and had pointed out that yellowcake was not subject to inspection.

145. On 11 July, the JIC addressed Iraq's nuclear activities.[58]

146. The JIC reported that, on the basis of post-war intelligence, it now knew that:

> "… in the 1980s Iraq investigated four methods of uranium enrichment, including the use of centrifuges. But the route that had made most progress was electromagnetic isotope separation (EMIS)."

147. The JIC noted there was intelligence that "enough fissile material had been produced before the coalition air attacks to produce one nuclear device"; but it concluded that, whilst the intelligence was generally credible, it did not believe that Iraq could have obtained enough fissile material for a bomb through the route described in the intelligence. The JIC added:

> "Nonetheless, given our lack of intelligence about the Iraqi nuclear programme, we cannot exclude the possibility that Iraq might have produced more fissile material than we have previously believed."

148. Resolution 707 (1991), adopted on 15 August, condemned Iraq's:

> "… serious violation of a number of its obligations under section C of resolution 687 (1991) and of its undertakings to co-operate with the Special Commission and the IAEA, which constitutes a material breach of the relevant provisions of resolution 687 which established a cease-fire and provided the conditions essential to the restoration of peace and security in the region."[59]

149. The resolution also condemned Iraq's "non-compliance" with its obligations under its safeguards agreement with the IAEA, which constituted a "violation of its commitments" as a party to the NPT.

150. The demands in the resolution included that Iraq should:

- "provide full, final and complete disclosure … of all aspects" of its prohibited programmes and comply with its other obligations and co-operate with the Special Commission and IAEA "without further delay";
- allow UNSCOM, the IAEA and their inspection teams "immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access";
- "cease immediately any attempt to conceal, or any movement or destruction of any material or equipment" without notification to and prior consent from UNSCOM; and
- "halt all nuclear activities of any kind".

151. In his memoir, Dr Blix wrote that between May and September 1991, IAEA inspections teams had produced "spectacular" results and the documents recovered provided "crucial and convincing evidence" about Iraq's nuclear programme.[60]

152. Dr Blix wrote that "the revelation that Iraq had secretly enriched uranium without being detected shook the world" and resulted in agreement that it was necessary to sharpen the IAEA system of safeguards.

153. In September 1991, an IAEA inspection team led by Dr David Kay discovered significant volumes of documents about Iraq's nuclear weapons.

154. In his statement to the Inquiry, Mr Ekéus said that the identification of the building in central Baghdad containing documentation about Iraq's nuclear programme was as a result of data provided by the US.[61]

155. The Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction (The Butler Report) records that, in an Assessment in October 1991, the JIC noted that inspection had confirmed the existence of a comprehensive nuclear weapons programme and concluded:

> "On the basis of the evidence so far of the programme's progress before Desert Storm, Iraq could have made its first nuclear weapon by 1993, had its work not been interrupted by the war."[62]

156. That was two years earlier than had been assessed before the 1990-1991 conflict. The unexpected discoveries had a significant impact on subsequent JIC Assessments, which tended to look at Iraq's potential capability on a "worst case" basis.

157. By the end of 1992, the processes of transporting Iraq's fissionable material to Russia and of the IAEA supervising the destruction of many large installations that had been used in Iraq's weapons programme was mostly complete.[63]

Concealment of WMD activities

158. Iraq's actions to conceal the scale and details of its activity, including the unilateral destruction of prohibited weapons and material, created major problems for UNSCOM in carrying out its mandate.

159. The regime for "ongoing monitoring and verification" (OMV) was authorised in resolution 715 (1991), adopted by the Security Council on 11 October 1991.[64]

160. Mr Ekéus wrote that "the monitoring system could not be fully operational until early 1995 due to Iraqi's obstructions".[65]

161. In January 1992, the JIC significantly revised its assessment of Iraq's remaining ballistic missile holdings, stating:

- "Although we do not know the true figure, we assess that around 100 SCUD-B remain concealed."
- There might be "as many as 250 complete Soviet build SCUD-B guidance and engine packages which cannot be accounted for, and would be critical for future production. Provided the raw material was available, Iraq could build its own replacement mid-body sections and assemble new material from this stockpile."[66]

162. Iraq told UNSCOM, after 1999, that it produced 17 Al Abbas and 387 Al Hussein missiles between 1987 and 1990.[67]

163. In 1991, Iraq had declared 30 chemical warheads for its ballistic missiles which were destroyed by April 1993.[68]

164. Despite the provisions of resolution 687, which stated that prohibited items should be declared and subsequently dealt with under international supervision, Iraq admitted in March 1992 that a decision had been taken in late June 1991 to carry out a unilateral programme to destroy proscribed equipment, including missile launchers, munitions and chemical agents.[69]

165. Iraq disclosed that it had concealed "the greater part of its operational missile force (85 … missiles, over 130 warheads, both conventional and chemical, 8 operational launchers …) and a significant amount of other proscribed items and materials", which it had "unilaterally and secretly destroyed in late July 1991". Iraq also claimed that the destruction "had not been fully documented or recorded".

166. In June 1992, the JIC judged that Iraq retained a "potential BW agent production capability and has hidden BW weapons".[70]

167. UNSCOM subsequently reported that the decision to destroy proscribed weapons and equipment had been taken by a high-level committee, of which Iraq's Deputy Prime Minister, Mr Tariq Aziz, was a member, to:

- "provide only a portion of their extant weapons stocks, with an emphasis on those which were least modern";
- "retain production capability and the 'know-how' documentation necessary to revive programmes when possible";
- "conceal the full extent of chemical weapons programmes, including its VX project, and retain production equipment and raw materials";
- "conceal the number and type of BW and CW warheads for proscribed missiles";
- "conceal indigenous long-range missile production, and retain production capabilities, specifically with respect to guidance systems and missile engines"; and
- "conceal the very existence of its offensive biological weapons programmes and retain all production capabilities".[71]

168. Although there were doubts about whether Iraq had revealed the full extent of its activities, the JIC was more sanguine in September 1994 about the size and value of Iraq's chemical and biological agent stockpiles.

169. After 1992, UNSCOM "continued to have concerns that not all proscribed items had been disclosed".[72]

170. In January 1993, there were two incidents involving Iraqi incursions into the demilitarised zone between Iraq and Kuwait. On 8 and 11 January, two Presidential Statements were issued, declaring that Iraq's actions constituted unacceptable and material breaches of relevant provisions of resolution 687.[73] Again, Iraq was warned that "serious consequences" would flow from such continued defiance. The status and legal significance of Presidential Statements is addressed in Section 5.

171. On 13, 17 and 18 January, the US, UK and France carried out air and missile strikes against Iraqi targets. Mr Ralph Zacklin, Assistant Secretary-General for Legal Affairs at the United Nations from 1998 to 2005, subsequently wrote:

> "The legitimacy of this limited resumption of the use of force was borne out by the fact that there was a marked absence of protest on the part of Member States even when the air strikes continued for a third wave. By issuing repeated warnings to Iraq in the form of Presidential Statements which conveyed the sense of the Security Council as a collective organ, the Council had clearly signified its agreement to the course of action which had been taken."[74]

172. In April, an Iraqi plot to assassinate former US President George HW Bush during a visit to Kuwait was foiled. On 26 June, his successor, President Bill Clinton, responded with a cruise missile attack against the headquarters of the Iraqi Intelligence Services in Baghdad.

173. On 25 August, the JIC stated:

> "Iraq has admitted to the UN that it conducted research into BW agents from 1986 to 1990, but claims never to have produced agent in quantity nor to have possessed biological weapons. We have information that this claim is untrue and assess that Iraq produced BW weapons containing anthrax and plague … Stocks of agents and weapons have probably been hidden, together with key items of equipment."[75]

174. Commenting on the judgement that Iraq had produced plague, the Butler Report recorded that, after the Gulf Conflict, two further sources had provided "some apparently corroborative intelligence" that Iraq had produced plague. There were some inconsistencies between the knowledge of one of those sources and the source who had provided information in November 1990, which "could have led to questioning of their access".

175. By November, there was renewed progress when Iraq accepted resolution 715, and permitted the deployment of OMV systems to ensure former weapons sites were not reactivated.

176. By May 1994, UNSCOM had supervised the destruction of "480,000 litres of live chemical agent, 28,000 chemical munitions and approximately 1.8 million litres, and over 1 million kilograms of some 45 different precursor chemicals".[76]

177. A JIC Assessment of 8 September noted that it did "not believe the full extent of the CW programme" had been revealed:

> "Although UNSCOM has destroyed the large declared stocks of CW agents, precursors and weapons, Iraq may have retained a secret stockpile but we have no direct evidence. Hidden stockpiles are probably unnecessary as the Iraqi civil chemical industry can produce all the precursors needed to make mustard agent and most of those for nerve agents."[77]

178. In OP22 of resolution 687, the Security Council had decided that, upon approval by the Security Council of the programme called for in OP19 (which would establish a fund to pay compensation for damage caused by Iraq's invasion and occupation of Kuwait) and "Council agreement that Iraq has completed all actions contemplated" in OPs 8-13, the sanctions imposed by resolution 661 should "have no further force or effect".

179. In response to Iraq's deployment of forces into southern Iraq, the Security Council adopted resolution 949 (1994) on 15 October 1994, which condemned "deployments by Iraq in the direction of the border with Kuwait".[78] It included a demand that Iraq "co-operate fully with the United Nations Special Commission".

180. In autumn 1994, UNSCOM conducted a thorough review of Iraq's biological weapons programme, including "an attempt to create a material balance of equipment and … growth media acquired by Iraq".[79] The review "reinforced the suspicion that the Al Hakam factory was a biological warfare agent production facility and that other sites were also involved in the biological weapons programme".

181. Inspections and interviews had:

> "… enabled the Commission to arrive at a firm assessment that Iraq's declarations in the biological area at that time were fundamentally wrong and misleading as it was attempting to hide a full-scale biological warfare programme, including weaponization. The Commission came to the unequivocal conclusion that Iraq had in fact produced biological weapons, that its biological programme was offensive in nature, that Al Hakam had been constructed as a dedicated biological warfare agent research and production facility and had been operational before January 1991, and that additional sites, including al-Muthanna, a known chemical weapons establishment were involved in the programme."

182. UNSCOM "confronted" Iraq with its assessments in February 1995.

183. Iraq admitted in December that it received proscribed SCUD missile gyroscope components in 1991 and a shipment of proscribed advanced missile gyroscopes was intercepted in 1995.[80]

184. Mr Haass wrote in his memoir that, during the Clinton Administration, there was:

> "… a range of efforts that sought to promote regime change, something that got the CIA and the Clinton administration enmeshed in a disastrous attempt to oust Saddam Hussein by covert means. The coup was uncovered and crushed in March 1995. There was as well a parallel overt initiative to strengthen the Iraqi opposition that lived outside Iraq …"[81]

185. In April 1995, the Security Council was advised that the Special Commission assessed that Iraq had "obtained or sought to obtain all the items and materials required to produce biological warfare agents in Iraq". Given Iraq's failure to account for those items, the only conclusion was that there was "a high risk that they had been purchased and in part used for proscribed activities".[82]

186. Mr Ekéus told the Inquiry that he was able to make that report as a result of the work of UNSCOM scientists, including Dr David Kelly.[83]

187. On 1 July 1995, as part of a further "full, final, and complete disclosure (FFCD)" of its capabilities, Iraq admitted for the first time to the production of bulk biological agent, but not to its weaponisation.[84]

188. In July 1995, dual-use items were rendered harmless or destroyed, "under strong protest from Iraq". In November 1995, Iraq acknowledged that the items had been specifically procured for and used in proscribed activities.[85]

189. Mr Ekéus told the Inquiry that, in 1995, Mr Aziz had asked him to approach Mr Tony Lake, US National Security Advisor, to offer, on Mr Aziz's behalf, "high quality information about activity and planning inside terrorist networks" in exchange for an accommodating attitude on the easing of sanctions against Iraq.[86] Mr Lake declined.

The defection of Lieutenant General Hussein Kamil

190. On 8 August 1995, Saddam Hussein's son-in-law, Lieutenant General Hussein Kamil, the former Minister of Industry and Head of Iraq's Military Industrialisation Corporation defected to Jordan. He had been responsible for the development and manufacture of Iraq's proscribed weapons programmes.

191. Lt Gen Kamil met Mr Ekéus and two other officials from the IAEA and UNSCOM and an interpreter in Amman.[87] Lt Gen Kamil said that, after inspections had started, Iraq had destroyed its biological weapons and he himself had ordered the destruction of Iraq's chemical weapons. In addition, all Iraq's SCUD missiles and their components had been destroyed, although two launchers had been dismantled and hidden. Lt Gen Kamil also referred to a nuclear project that inspectors were not aware of, at the Sodash site, where equipment had been buried.

192. Mr Tim Dowse, Chief of the Assessments Staff from 2003 to 2009, told the Inquiry that Lt Gen Kamil had claimed that:

> "CW had been destroyed immediately after the war. But there was some doubt about whether he was in a position to know that in the same way that he was in a position to know about the biological programme.
> "He also exposed an organised Iraqi campaign of deception directed from the top – so I think in many ways what he revealed to us very much coloured our approach thereafter."[88]

193. In the aftermath of Lt Gen Kamil's departure, Iraq admitted that its disclosures had been "deliberately misleading" and released a large amount of information which had both "confirmed" many of UNSCOM's earlier observations and "brought to light earlier unknown documents of significance".[89] It included "new information related to Iraq's attempts to acquire advanced chemical and biological weapons capabilities, as well as long-range missile systems with ranges of up to and over 2,000 kilometres".

194. Iraq's disclosures "represented a great step forward in the work of the Commission" and expedited the inspection process.[90] In December 1995, Mr Ekéus reported to the Security Council that Iraq had recently submitted new declarations, containing "full, final and complete disclosures" in relation to its chemical, biological and missile programmes, which still did not meet UNSCOM's requirements.

195. During a visit by Mr Ekéus to Baghdad, the Iraq delegation had also supplied a "personal diary" relating to the destruction of chemical and biological bombs, which had been provided by a junior military engineer, but "the Commission was convinced that certain of the most important documentation had not yet been handed over".

196. UNSCOM concluded that the documents disclosed by Iraq in August 1995 showed that Iraq's chemical weapons programme was more developed and wider in scope than had previously been admitted.[91] Iraq had "used chemical weapons facilities to support other weapons of mass destruction programmes", including "production of casings for radiological bombs, activities for the uranium chemical enrichment process and major support for the biological weapons programme". They had also provided evidence of "much greater foreign involvement in Iraq's chemical weapons programme". Production records had been provided for only seven months in 1988, not for all production including "the most important phase after 1988 when Iraq conducted research and development, inter alia, on more advanced chemical weapons agents and delivery systems".

197. In an Assessment issued on 24 August, the JIC reassessed Iraq's capabilities in the light of the new information.[92]

198. In relation to Iraq's nuclear programme, the JIC noted that Iraq:

- "… admits that it previously concealed the full extent of its nuclear programme. It has revealed that in August 1990 it began a crash programme, later abandoned, to build a nuclear programme within a year"; and
- "… intended to use nuclear material held under IAEA safeguards in Iraq. The Iraqis claim the plan was abandoned because they concluded that the IAEA would detect their activities. In fact, they had insufficient fissile material to make a nuclear device. Hussein Kamil's reported claim that, at the time of the Gulf Conflict, Iraq was only three months from completing a nuclear weapon probably refers to the 'crash programme'. It is very unlikely to be true."

199. In relation to ballistic missiles, the JIC recorded that:

> "UNSCOM has verified destruction of the declared SCUDs (and the Iraqi derivatives) and their launchers and believes it has a satisfactory account of what happened to the rest. UNSCOM has also supervised destruction of components and much of the missile-related infrastructure …"[93]

200. The JIC noted, however, that Iraq would:

> "… retain a technology and production base because UN SCR 687 allows it to develop and manufacture missiles with ranges less than 150 km. But intelligence reports that some current missile R&D [research and development] work is being hidden from UNSCOM inspectors. Iraq has now revealed that it developed … SCUD-type missile motors. This re-introduces uncertainty into an area where UNSCOM had previously expressed itself to be satisfied."

201. In relation to chemical weapons, the JIC concluded that it was "unlikely" that Iraq had "a covert stockpile of [chemical] weapons or agent in any significant quantity; Hussein Kamil claims that there are no remaining stockpiles of agent".[94]

202. The JIC added that Iraq:

> "… could begin to make chemical weapons within a matter of weeks, and produce significant quantities within months, if UN constraints were removed."

203. In relation to biological weapons, the JIC noted:

> "We have convincing intelligence of a BW programme which started in the 1970s and strong indications that it produced and weaponised anthrax, botulinum toxin, and probably plague. With the exception of plague, Iraq previously admitted doing research on these and other agents but steadfastly denied the work was for an offensive programme. UNSCOM, although suspicious, could find no clear evidence to the contrary … [I]n August 1995 Iraq admitted to a major BW programme under which it had produced huge quantities of anthrax and botulinum toxin, but implausibly denied it had ever considered weaponisation … In the last few days Iraq has admitted to UNSCOM that agent was produced at additional sites, field-testing of weapons took place in 1989, and that bombs and missile warheads were filled with anthrax and botulinum toxin in December 1990 … Many questions remain on the BW programme; Iraq has not, for example admitted any work on plague."[95]

204. After Lt Gen Kamil's defection, concerns began to grow that Iraq had a systematic programme of concealment.

205. UNSCOM reported that Iraq's FFCD on ballistic missiles in November 1995 did not appear to constitute a firm basis for establishing a definite and verifiable material balance for proscribed weapons and activities.[96]

206. From early 1996, UNSCOM undertook a series of inspections specifically targeting sites it "believed to be associated with concealment activities" in response to Iraq's assertion that "there was no systematic mechanism for concealment".[97]

207. While Iraq complied with its obligations in respect of most inspections, UNSCOM reported encountering difficulties and delays on five occasions in March 1996 when it requested no-notice inspections of sites related to Iraq's missile programmes, and that Iraq had also imposed restrictions on aerial surveillance.[98]

208. In a letter to the President of the Security Council on 17 March 1996, Mr Aziz stated that the problems related to the special nature of the sites and that the delays were "no longer than the time necessitated by … practical factors".[99] Mr Aziz cited the agreement in July 1993, in response to Iraq's concerns in respect of its sovereignty, internal security and the dignity of the people and State of Iraq, that UNSCOM and the IAEA intention was to implement their plans "in the least intrusive manner consistent with effective monitoring and verification in the circumstances prevailing, with all due regard to the legitimate concerns of Iraq … in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations". In addition, two of the requests, on 8 and 15 March, had been made on a Friday. Appropriate arrangements had been made for the inspections to proceed, including on two occasions after telephone conversations with Mr Ekéus.

209. Mr Aziz also stated that the allegations that equipment could have been removed and some documents burnt were "not realistic" given the presence of "more than 50 inspectors with 16 vehicles" surrounding the sites, helicopter surveillance and the subsequent inspections.

210. Mr Aziz reaffirmed that Iraq had "no intention of impeding" UNSCOM's tasks. "On the contrary", it was "keen" to continue to work with UNSCOM to fulfil its tasks "as soon as possible". But Iraq expected UNSCOM, in discharging its duties, "to adhere" to its "undertakings towards Iraq by respecting its sovereignty, dignity and national security".

211. Mr Aziz also wrote that he expected the Security Council "to deal with this issue in an objective manner which would balance Iraq's obligations towards the Security Council and the Council's obligations towards Iraq in accordance with the principles of the United Nations Charter and the provisions of the relevant resolutions of the Council".

212. The incidents in which UNSCOM inspection teams were denied immediate and unconditional access to sites prompted a statement by the President of the Security Council that "Iraq's delays in permitting the inspection team recently in Iraq access to the sites concerned constitute clear violations by Iraq of the provisions of resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991)".

213. On 27 March 1996, as part of developing the OMV system, the Security Council adopted resolution 1051 (1996), which implemented a mechanism for monitoring sales or supplies of items "relevant to the implementation of Section C of resolution 687 (1991) and other relevant resolutions".[100]

214. To replace the previous reporting systems, the resolution also consolidated the progress reports on UNSCOM and the IAEA's activities into reports every six months from the UN on all aspects of its work.

[100] UN Security Council resolution 1051 (1996).

215. The first consolidated report to the Security Council, in April, recorded that both the volume and quality of information being provided by Iraq had diminished since February, and found that:

> "In all areas for which the Commission has responsibility, Iraq has yet to provide sufficient evidence that it does not still possess proscribed weapons or materials related to them. The Commission's concerns stem particularly from the difficulties encountered in substantiating Iraq's claims that, in 1991, in flagrant violation of its obligations under resolution 687 (1991) it secretly destroyed large quantities of these prohibited weapons and materials instead of declaring and handing them over for the Commission's verification."[101]

216. The report stated that "large quantities" of prohibited items had been "successfully eliminated", but "relatively minor, but highly significant, quantities" of proscribed items remained "unaccounted for".

217. On the basis of new documents and draft disclosures provided by Iraq, UNSCOM concluded that there had been "considerable progress" in some areas since December 1995. Iraq had disclosed information of great significance, especially documents which it earlier said had been destroyed. There were, however, "significant deficiencies and gaps".

218. In relation to Iraq's ballistic missile programme, Iraq had submitted a revised draft declaration on 27 February 1996 which contained significant new information, including confirmation that equipment UNSCOM had decided should be disposed of in April 1995 had been for a major project (Project 1728) for the development and production of liquid propellant engines for long-range missiles.

219. Iraq had also admitted that it had "carried out an undeclared programme to modify a Volga/SA2 surface-to-air missile system to a surface-to-surface application with a range of over 100 kilometres", including "flight tests and prototype production of some components", which should have been declared. As a result, an extensive programme to monitor Iraq's Volga missiles was required.

220. UNSCOM remained concerned about Iraq's undeclared procurement of prohibited and dual-use items.

221. In January 1996, UNSCOM had investigated the recent delivery of "a large number of sophisticated guidance and control components" which it assessed were "used in missiles with ranges over thousands of kilometres". Iraq had denied acquiring the items but following official investigations it had confirmed that "its authorities and missile facilities had been involved … through a specific middleman" and some components had been delivered in July 1995. Other components had been stored in transit in Jordan. A Director General of an Iraqi missile facility stated that he had destroyed the components received in August 1995 and informed the Iraqi authorities of the receipt of proscribed items in August and October. There were still "contradictions and ambiguities" about what had happened, but Iraq was reluctant to broaden the investigation.

222. There were suspicions that items still existed and Iraq was withholding important documents. Although no proscribed items had been found, Iraq's actions in March meant that UNSCOM's confidence had been diminished.

223. Iraq had provided a new draft disclosure in relation to chemical weapons in February 1996. This was an improvement in some areas, but there were important gaps. These included:

- the "level of expertise achieved in research and development activities … large-scale production techniques, weaponisation and delivery systems";
- the absence of disclosures on precursor production capabilities and dual-use equipment within the civilian chemical industry; and
- Iraq's activities in relation to "V class" agents.

224. In the new draft disclosure the quantities of precursor chemicals and agents and munitions produced, procured and destroyed had been changed but the source of the new information was not clear. UNSCOM's "strong presumption" was that it was based on information which Iraq had not disclosed.

225. Specifically, there were changes in the figures for the production and weaponisation of VX:

- "Initially Iraq stated that only laboratory scale synthesis had been undertaken."
- In March 1995, Iraq had admitted "production of 260 kilograms and weaponisation of the agent in three aerial bombs".
- In November 1995, Iraq had declared that it had produced "3.3 tonnes".
- In the February disclosure, the figure for production had "increased by a further 20 per cent".
- Iraq had not produced evidence to substantiate its statement that the "precursors for the large-scale production of VX" had been destroyed.

226. Iraq had assisted in excavations of buildings at al-Muthanna, Iraq's largest chemical weapons research and production facility, which were destroyed in February 1991. Records and "some 80 munitions and components" had been recovered, including "122 millimetre artillery chemical warheads and 155 millimetre 'binary' artillery shells".

227. There had been "serious deficiencies" in the draft disclosure on biological weapons submitted in November 1995 but Iraq had produced new documents and disclosures during discussions in January 1996, including:

- Al Hakam had been intended to be a "specialised filling facility for biological warfare munitions".
- R-400 bombs for biological warfare purposes were assembled there.
- Clarification of several issues including "those related to destruction of some types of biological warfare munitions".
- A "serious attempt" had been made to "resolve the fundamental issue of the filling and … destruction of biological warfare warheads for missiles"; but it had not been possible to do so because "Iraq's statements did not conform to documentation available" to UNSCOM.

228. Discussions in February had been less productive. Changes were introduced "without any documentary support or convincing explanations". The view of the UNSCOM team involved was that their Iraqi counterparts "tended to change production data to accommodate newly discovered facts".

229. UNSCOM wanted "a substantiated material balance … from production to destruction", but the draft disclosure submitted in March did not match UNSCOM's findings. Unless Iraq could rectify that "in a convincing manner" in its formal declaration, it would "cause great problems".

230. Iraq had accepted an UNSCOM request to cease all activity at two sites identified with the production of BW agents and assisted in establishing appropriate deactivation and surveillance measures.

231. Iraq had provided a report on a radiological weapons project by the Military Industrial Corporation and Iraq's Atomic Energy Commission between August and December 1987, "to combine the effectiveness of conventional aerial munitions with the spreading of radioactive materials". Four prototypes had been constructed. The report had concluded that Iraq "had the capability to manufacture a bomb containing irradiated materials", but the Iraqi Air Force suggested that there should be a study to consider reducing the weight of the bomb.

232. Iraq's declaration stated that:

- The project had been abandoned and no order to produce radiological weapons was given.
- 100 empty casings for a smaller calibre bomb had been produced.
- 75 of the casings had been sent to the Al-Qa-Qa State Establishment, but their fate was not addressed.
- 25 of those casings which remained at al-Muthanna were unilaterally destroyed in the summer of 1991.

233. UNSCOM hoped that the diminution in the quality of information and the quantity of documents provided since mid-February, and the difficulties with inspections in March, "did not indicate a return to the non-co-operative attitude demonstrated by Iraq prior to the summer of 1995".

234. Iraq's biological weapons facilities, and growth media it had purchased, were destroyed under UNSCOM supervision in May and June 1996.[102]

235. In May 1996, Iraq admitted that the documents handed over on 20 August 1995 "constituted only a portion" of the documentation which had been concealed; the rest had "been burnt just a few days" earlier, "at another farm west of Baghdad".[103]

236. In May, UNSCOM sent a team to Iraq to conduct interviews with Iraqi officials believed to be involved in concealment activities.[104] Iraq "abruptly" terminated its co-operation with the inspectors, and claimed that Lt Gen Kamil had been entirely responsible for the concealment programme, a claim which was retracted in August.

237. A JIC Assessment on 12 June 1996 reflected the concerns about Iraq's concealment activities.[105]

238. In relation to ballistic missiles, the JIC stated:

> "Information obtained in the wake of the … defection has, however, led UNSCOM to judge that missile components, launchers and possibly complete SCUD missiles remain hidden. We doubt whether there are any concealed missiles in Iraq but it is likely that components remain."

239. The JIC also assessed that:

> "If all UN controls were to be removed and Iraq could purchase the technology and expertise required … an accurate 1,000km range missile could probably be produced within three to five years. A 300–500km range SCUD type missile could be indigenously manufactured within two years."

240. In relation to Iraq's biological warfare programme, the JIC noted:

> "We do not believe Iraqi statements that the BW programme has been destroyed. Possibly substantial elements, including some production equipment and weaponised agent, continue to be concealed."[106]

241. The JIC also stated:

> "Iraq has not yet admitted to work on plague and has played down its success in developing BW aerosol delivery systems."[107]

242. In relation to chemical warfare, the JIC stated that it doubted whether "all agents, munitions, precursor chemicals and equipment have been accounted for".[108]

243. The Butler Report stated that its authors had been informed that the reason for the change in the JIC's view on Iraq's biological warfare programme, "in the apparent absence of underpinning reliable intelligence", was:

> "… the impact of … Kamil's defection, UNSCOM's inability to reconcile Iraqi claims for production and destruction, unaccounted-for growth media and a total lack of co-operation from the Iraqis."[109]

Events leading to the withdrawal of UNSCOM

244. Following a series of incidents in which the inspectors were denied access, resolution 1060 (1996), adopted on 12 June 1996, deplored Iraq's refusal to allow UNSCOM access to sites designated for inspections and demanded "immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation" that UNSCOM wished to inspect.[110]

245. After talks in Baghdad between Mr Ekéus and Mr Aziz, a joint programme of action was agreed on 22 June.[111] It included Iraq's intention to submit "official declarations containing full final and complete disclosures on its proscribed programmes in the non-nuclear areas" before the end of June.

246. In the joint statement issued after the agreement, Iraq "undertook to secure … immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to all sites which the Commission or the IAEA may wish to inspect". UNSCOM undertook "to operate with full respect for the legitimate security concerns of Iraq". It stated that Iraq and UNSCOM had "agreed to intensify their work with the aim of making it possible for the Commission to report as soon as possible to the Security Council that Iraq has met its obligations under section C of resolution 687 (1991)".

247. Mr Ekéus also reported that he had told Mr Aziz that, without an agreement, "Iraq's isolation would have increased and there would have been the possibility of further actions being taken by the Council to obtain compliance with its resolutions", and that:

> "Without the right to inspect any site at which the Commission had reason to believe that proscribed weapons or materials were present, the Commission's utility in achieving the Council's objectives would have been irreparably harmed."

248. The joint programme of action focused on Iraq's FFCDs of its activities and the means and techniques of verifying them.[112] As a priority and to accelerate verification, Iraq and UNSCOM agreed to concentrate on the fundamental areas of the:

- material balance of proscribed weapons and their major components;
- unilateral destruction of proscribed items;
- further provision of documentation;
- identification of measures used to retain proscribed items; and
- immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access".[113]

249. Mr Ekéus told the Inquiry:

> "… in 1996 I developed, together with the Iraqi [deputy] prime minister Tariq Aziz, modalities for functioning access for inspectors, which guaranteed realization of inspections of what Iraq called sensitive sites (Presidential Palaces etc). The modalities implied some delay of access but without compromising control of the facility (entrance/exit and aerial helicopter surveillance). This was welcome[d] by all the Security Council members with the exception of the US/UK."[114]

250. Dr Blix wrote in 2004:

> "The solution was not welcomed by the US and some other members of the Security Council, who felt that it introduced a limitation in the inspection rights that had been laid down by the Council. This was certainly how the Iraqis also saw the instruction."[115]

251. Dr Blix added that the problem was that "any concession in the implementation of a Security Council resolution was a step taken on a slippery slope".

Tension in the Kurdish region

A dispute between the two main Kurdish parties, the Kurdish Democratic Party (KDP) and the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK), became increasingly tense from May 1994.

In August 1996, the KDP, led by Mr Masoud Barzani, sought Saddam Hussein's support to retake the city of Erbil from the PUK, led by Mr Jalal Talabani. Saddam Hussein sent thousands of troops and more than 300 tanks to attack the PUK in Erbil.

The conflict was eventually ended by the US-mediated "Washington Agreement" between the PUK and the KDP in September 1998. The two parties agreed to share revenues and power and to exclude Iraqi troops from the Kurdish region. The US pledged to protect the Kurds from aggression by Saddam Hussein.

252. The President of the Security Council issued a statement on 23 August 1996 reinforcing the importance of Iraq's co-operation with UNSCOM and that it should be given immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to facilities and individuals to allow it fully to discharge its mandate and stating that:

- The Council remained "gravely concerned" by Iraq's failure to comply fully with its obligations.
- Iraq's repeated denial of access to sites and attempts made to impose conditions on interviews were a "gross violation of its obligations" as well as a contradiction of its commitments in the joint statement of 22 June.[116]

253. On 3 September, Mr Ekéus reported that, during discussions in Baghdad on 26 to 28 August, Mr Aziz had stated that Iraq "was abiding and would continue to abide sincerely and effectively" by the June agreements.[117]

254. Mr Ekéus had stressed that concerns relating to concealment of proscribed items remained a prime objective for UNSCOM. Mr Aziz made a formal statement to the effect that Iraq did not conceal proscribed weapons, components or documents and asked UNSCOM to refrain from conducting further on-site inspections and interviews on that issue. Mr Ekéus said they must continue.

255. Iraq also stated that it would not accept any new extension or enlargement of UNSCOM's rights and privileges and on several occasions "attempted to dictate how and to what extent" those rights should be exercised.

[117] UN Security Council, 3 September 1996, 'Letter dated 3 September 1996 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) addressed to the President of the Security Council' (S/1996/714).

256. Mr Ekéus concluded that the visit had been useful, clarifying the respective positions of Iraq and UNSCOM and narrowing certain differences. UNSCOM would continue vigorously to pursue verification of Iraq's disclosures. He hoped that a repeat of Iraq's actions over the last few months could be avoided, but that it required "full and unreserved co-operation from the Government of Iraq and a genuine policy … to carry out its obligations".

257. In the subsequent press briefing, Mr Ekéus stated that he felt there was "a certain commitment" although UNSCOM suspected "an active policy of concealment". Its task was to find and destroy prohibited items and to ensure that no new ones were produced but it would now have to "wait until the situation had become a bit more settled".[118]

258. Following a meeting with UNSCOM in September 1996, Iraq admitted in a letter of 3 October that production tools and components for ballistic missiles had been collected and concealed in July 1991, but they had been destroyed in March 1992.[119] Iraq had also declared that three missiles which had been retained in July 1991 were not destroyed until October that year.

259. In his report of 11 October 1996, the UN Secretary-General wrote:

> "The results of the Commission's investigations, starting with UNSCOM 143 in March 1996 and continuing through August, clearly show that there was an organized mechanism of concealment used by Iraq to deny access to proscribed documents and material retained since the adoption of resolution 687 (1991). Throughout this investigation Iraq has sought to deflect or minimize the involvement of its special security services in concealment activities. It has acknowledged that officially sanctioned false statements had been made to mislead the Commission in its investigations. It has resorted to delays and denials of access … Despite this behaviour the Commission has accumulated information which reinforces its assessment that the concealment mechanism has been established for the purpose of hiding and protecting proscribed material."[120]

260. UNSCOM had:

> "… succeeded in uncovering the existence of Iraq's biological programme and believes it has destroyed its major facilities. However, it needs to continue to investigate the scope and extent of the programme to arrive at a complete picture of it."

[118] UN Security Council, 4 September 1996, 'Press Briefing by Executive Chairman of Special Commission' (19960904).
[119] UN Security Council, 11 October 1996, 'Report of the Secretary-General on the activities of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991)' (S/1996/848).
[120] UN Security Council, 11 October 1996, 'Report of the Secretary-General on the activities of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991)' (S/1996/848).

261. The report said that Iraq's sixth version of an FFCD on its biological warfare programme, produced on 22 June 1996, was "not credible". "Major sections" were "incomplete, inaccurate or unsubstantiated", and the lack of documentation was "difficult to accept".

262. UNSCOM had "evidence that chemical warfare agents and munitions were produced in 1989" although Iraq had "consistently denied this"; and that it believed that "production of different types of chemical weapons was also carried out in the first half of 1990".

263. Iraq's FFCD on ballistic missiles, submitted on 2 July 1996, had reported the previously undisclosed acquisition of important proscribed missile components, but UNSCOM's view was that Iraq had "still … not fully accounted for all proscribed weapons".

264. UNSCOM also had:

> "… concerns related to undeclared facilities where equipment … was evacuated before January 1991 and the unilateral destruction conducted secretly by Iraq in the summer of 1991, when, among other items, chemical warheads for Al Hussein missiles and nerve agent VX precursors were allegedly destroyed."

265. The report concluded by stating that the requirement for full, final and complete disclosures had "not been fully met". It had "a good understanding" of Iraq's programme "to create a massive number of tactical chemical weapons" before August 1988. But details of two later phases, to integrate the "programme into Iraq's chemical industry and production of more stable and storable chemical agents" and "the design and production of strategic chemical weapons", had not been disclosed. An understanding of those two phases was "absolutely necessary" before UNSCOM could complete its task and verify that nothing remained.

266. In January 1997, Mr Kofi Annan became the UN Secretary-General.

267. In his memoir, written in 2012, Mr Annan wrote that, in the six years after the end of the Gulf Conflict in 1991, Iraq "became transformed from an example of the international community's acting lawfully in pursuit of the highest aims of the UN's founders to an albatross around the organisation's neck". The UN mandate had been only to "reverse the invasion of Kuwait, nothing more". But that:

> "… left Saddam Hussein in power, the predatory leader of a brutal, tyrannical regime that demonstrated little evidence of intending to comply fully with the demands of the international community."[121]

[121] Annan K. Interventions: A Life In War And Peace. Allen Lane, 2012.

268. Mr Annan added that his predecessor as Secretary-General had offered him only one piece of advice when he left office at the end of 1996:

> "Watch out for the question of Iraq … It will become very important."

Dr Albright's Georgetown speech

269. In a speech at Georgetown University on 26 March 1997, Dr Madeleine Albright, the new US Secretary of State, reaffirmed that US policy in Iraq was "part of a broad commitment to protect the security and territory of our friends and allies in the Gulf".[122]

270. Quoting President George HW Bush, Dr Albright stated that, as well as driving Iraq out of Kuwait, the US objective in launching Operation Desert Storm in 1991 had been to cause Iraq once again to "live as a peaceful and co-operative member of the family of nations". Iraq's leaders had, however, "continued to defy the will of the international community" and "from the outset", chosen "denial, delay and deceit". They had:

> "… lied … blocked inspections, concealed documents, falsified evidence and challenged UNSCOM's clear and legitimate authority."

271. Dr Albright added that, following the defection of Lt Gen Kamil, it had "appeared for a time, as if it would cause Iraq finally to accept the need for full disclosure", but that had not been the case and Iraq's "refusal to co-operate fully continued". The US would be "unwavering"; it would "not allow Iraq to regain by stonewalling the Security Council what it forfeited by aggression on the battlefield". An international consensus "that Iraq should not be allowed again to threaten international peace" had been sustained.

272. Dr Albright stated that Iraq's military threat to its neighbours was "greatly diminished", and, "As long as the apparatus of sanctions, enforcement, inspections and monitoring" was "in place", Iraq would "remain trapped within a strategic box". But she warned that it was "essential" that international resolve did not weaken:

> "Containment has worked, but … the future threat has not been erased. Iraq's behaviour and intentions must change before our policies can change."

273. Iraq had:

- "yet to provide convincing evidence that it has destroyed all" its chemical and biological weapons;
- "admitted loading many … [chemical and biological] agents into missile warheads" before the Gulf Conflict;
- retained "more than 7,500 nuclear scientists and technicians, as well as technical documents related to the production of nuclear weapons"; and
- "been caught trying to smuggle in missile guidance instruments".

[122] Speech, 26 March 1997, 'SecState Albright Policy Speech on Iraq, March 26'.

274. Dr Albright added that "according to Ambassador Ekéus", UNSCOM had "not been able to account for all the missiles Iraq acquired over the years". He believed it was "highly likely" that Iraq retained "an operational SCUD missile force, probably with chemical and biological weapons to go with it".

275. Dr Albright stated that, if Iraq was "released from sanctions and scrutiny", its "current government … would pick up where it left off" in 1991. "For those reasons", US policy would "not change". The US did:

> "… not agree with the nations who argue that if Iraq complies with its obligations concerning weapons of mass destruction, sanctions should be lifted. Our view, which is unshakeable, is that Iraq must prove its peaceful intentions. It can only do that by complying with all of the Security Council resolutions to which it is subject."

276. Dr Albright added that the evidence was "overwhelming" that Saddam Hussein's intentions would "never be peaceful". The US looked forward "to the day when Iraq rejoins the family of nations as a responsible and law abiding member", and "a change in Iraq's government could lead to a change in US policy". But until that day came, the US would "insist, with all the diplomatic tools at our command, that UN sanctions remain in place", while doing what it "responsibly" could to "minimize the suffering of Iraqi citizens".

277. Mr Ekéus told the Inquiry that, after Dr Albright's speech:

> "Tariq Aziz made it clear to me that from now on it would be close to impossible to convince the President of the value of co-operating with the UN inspectors. This move by the US was from our perspective destructive."[123]

UNSCOM activity

UNSCOM REPORT, APRIL 1997

278. The Security Council was told in April 1997 that there had been tangible results in some areas of UNSCOM's activities but the capabilities which could not be accounted for could not be ignored.[124]

279. The report of UNSCOM's activities since 11 October 1996 stated that work over the last two years had "led to the unmasking" of:

- Iraq's biological weapons programme;
- "highly sophisticated and advanced work on the extremely lethal chemical warfare nerve agent VX"; and [124] UN Security Council, 11 April 1997, 'Report of the Secretary-General on the activities of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991)' (S/1997/301).

- the development and production of SCUD-type missile engines.

280. UNSCOM's achievements demonstrated that:

> "… international weapons inspections under the auspices of the United Nations, if applied with first-rate expertise and modern technology, can achieve effective results."

281. But UNSCOM was continuing its work because it could not state that Iraq had "accounted for all weapons, components and capabilities proscribed" in resolution 687 for a number of reasons, including Iraq's unilateral programme of destruction in contravention of resolution 687 and its policy of concealment "aimed at deceiving the inspectors and at retaining limited but significant proscribed capabilities".

282. Because of the "inadequacies, incompleteness and lack of evidentiary documentation" in Iraq's FFCDs, UNSCOM had been unable credibly to verify Iraq's declarations. In an effort to expedite that process, Mr Ekéus and Mr Aziz had agreed to adopt an innovative process whereby UNSCOM presented its detailed findings and an assessment of the outstanding problems at the "political level" in Baghdad. This process had started by addressing missile issues in December 1996, followed by discussions on chemical weapons in February and April 1997 and biological weapons in April 1997.

283. The process had "led to a much clearer understanding" by Iraq's political leadership of the problems and what Iraq needed to do to resolve them. UNSCOM hoped that this would help to overcome the lack of progress on technical issues.

284. The report stated that:

- The new process constituted "a fruitful approach" if Iraq was "fully co-operative and transparent in its response to the Commission's initiatives and concerns".
- "Tangible results" had "already been achieved" on missiles and chemical weapons.
- Agreement for remnants of missiles unilaterally destroyed by Iraq to be removed and analysed outside Iraq had not been reached until late February, and the work would require "several weeks or months before it was completed".
- More documentation on Iraq's proscribed programmes should exist and had been formally requested.
- Iraq had stated that there was no policy to withhold information and when documents were discovered they were given to UNSCOM.
- There were difficulties on biological weapons. Iraq had been asked to reconsider its position and provide a new declaration; and after some discussion had agreed on 5 April to do so.

285. UNSCOM also reported that the completeness and accuracy of Iraq's declarations and a clear understanding of the scope and history of its proscribed programmes were essential for an effective monitoring programme.

286. Since October 1996, there had been "a pattern of efforts" by Iraq "to restrict the Commission's monitoring activities" which had caused "serious problems". UNSCOM hoped that commitments given by Mr Aziz to Mr Ekéus during their meeting in April would be "translated into action".

287. There was "not much" that was unknown about Iraq's "proscribed weapons capabilities", but what was "unaccounted for" could not:

> "… be neglected. Even a limited inventory of long-range missiles would be a source of deep concern if those missiles were fitted with warheads filled with the most deadly of chemical nerve agents, VX. If one single missile warhead were filled with the biological agent, Anthrax, many millions of lethal doses could be spread in an attack on any city in the region. With that in mind, the Special Commission has undertaken extraordinary efforts to bring to a satisfactory conclusion the full accounting of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and long-range missiles, in order to be able to make sure that all the proscribed items have been disposed of."

288. UNSCOM concluded:

> "A solid framework with tested procedures is in place. It is now time for Iraq to make full use of this and to provide the material and data to give substance to its stated commitment of full co-operation. The remaining problems … cannot be solved through a technical process … Their solution requires the major political decision by Iraq's leadership to give up, once and for all, all capabilities and ambition to retain or acquire the proscribed weapons …"

289. UNSCOM's activities between October 1996 and April 1997 and the discrepancies between its findings and Iraq's declarations were set out in detail in an Appendix to the report.[125] Its key points included:

- Iraq had still not provided a credible account of quantities and types of "special warheads" which had been produced for proscribed missiles, and UNSCOM had "evidence that Iraq has provided incorrect information".
- Not all chemical bombs had been declared by Iraq.
- The "final disposition of the programme for the production of … VX" remained "unresolved". Iraq claimed that it had only carried out activities "on the laboratory/pilot plant scale", and that it had destroyed "hundreds of tons of VX precursors in 1991". UNSCOM had "evidence that Iraq obtained the technology" and retained "equipment for the large-scale production of VX".
- In December 1996, UNSCOM had presented its concerns that "In an attempt to mislead the Commission, Iraq had tried to falsify evidence" of missile destruction.

- Four complete missile engines which had not been declared were found in early 1997.
- In March 1997, IAEA excavations at declared burial sites had unearthed an undeclared "highly expensive cache of … valves" for use in uranium enrichment.

A CHANGE OF TACTICS

290. Mr Ekéus told the Inquiry that it had started to become clear in spring 1997 that it was:

> "… a matter of months rather than years before UNSCOM/IAEA could report the accomplishment of the WMD disarmament and the monitoring functionality in place."[126]

291. In May 1997, Mr Blair became Prime Minister of the UK.

292. From the middle of 1997, Saddam Hussein adopted more sharply confrontational tactics, and the humanitarian situation continued to deteriorate, with the result that Iraq climbed back up the international agenda. The five Permanent Members of the UN Security Council (the "P5"), and the international community more widely, were divided in their response.

293. Following four incidents in early June 1997, there was an exchange of letters between UNSCOM and Iraq, including two letters on 5 June from Mr Aziz to Mr Ekéus.

294. In one letter, Mr Aziz stated that UNSCOM's activities gave "rise to profound disquiet" and raised "serious questions" about UNSCOM's commitment to "complete its mandate … expeditiously and in an impartial and businesslike manner".[127]

295. In a second letter, Mr Aziz stated that UNSCOM was conducting inspections "on the pretext of alleged concealment" and fabricating "crises and tensions" to "provide a pretext for directing … unfounded accusations against Iraq" and prolonging its duties.[128]

296. In response, Mr Ekéus wrote to the President of the Security Council suggesting that the Council "might wish to remind Iraq of its obligations".[129]

297. A Presidential Statement issued on 13 June expressed "serious concern" about the incidents in which "Iraqi personnel unacceptably interfered with helicopter flights operating in support of inspection" of designated sites. The Security Council deplored the incidents, reminding Iraq of its obligations and its support for UNSCOM's efforts to implement its mandate.[130]

298. Mr Ekéus wrote to the President of the Security Council again on 12 June to report Iraq's decision to deny UNSCOM access to three sites on 10 and 12 June.[131]

299. In a response on 15 June, Mr Aziz set out at length Iraq's "serious and real concerns relating to Special Commission inspection teams' access to sites" which were "important" to Iraq's "sovereignty or national security".[132]

300. Mr Aziz stated that, following their agreement of 22 June 1996, he had agreed with Mr Ekéus in October that "joint work should concentrate on reviewing" the missile, chemical and biological files in turn, and "working to close them". UNSCOM had, however, "altered" that approach when it "began to carry out large-scale inspections, the likes of which had not been conducted for several years" in March 1997. The inspections were based "on the pretext of verifying alleged claims of the concealment of proscribed items and activities" from the "intelligence sources of some States which provide the Special Commission with such fabricated information". Those sources were "tendentious and inaccurate".

301. In addition, Mr Aziz wrote that Iraq had "serious concern" that the facilities available to UNSCOM were being used as "a cover to detect the arrangements made for the security of Iraq, its leadership and the personnel involved". Mr Aziz was particularly concerned about the activities of Colonel Scott Ritter, a UN inspector and serving member of the US Army.

302. Mr Aziz stressed that:

- Allegations concerning concealment of proscribed items were "false", and UNSCOM had "no concrete evidence to substantiate them".
- Iraq had "pointed out … that limited operations of no practical value were carried out in 1991 by Hussein Kamil and a very small number of individuals".
- The "facts and information related to those operations" had been made available to UNSCOM, and it had interviewed the personnel involved and visited the sites of concealment "over a period of several months".
- Iraq suspected that the aim was "to keep matters in a state of flux, and justify the endless continuation of the embargo", which served "the well-known purposes of a certain State".

[130] UN Security Council, '3789th Meeting Friday 13 June 1997' (S/PV.3789).
[131] UN Security Council, 19 June 1997, 'Letter dated 12 June 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) addressed to the President of the Security Council' (S/1997/474).
[132] UN Security Council, 16 June 1997, 'Letter dated 16 June 1997 from Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq addressed to the President of the Security Council' (S/1997/465).

- The agreement that missiles should be analysed outside Iraq, in response to Mr Ekéus's "allegations" in 1996 "that Iraq might retain an operational missile force", had not provided any results.
- Iraq had allowed access to 40 of the 43 sites designated for inspection and its actions "cannot be interpreted as a decision by the Government of Iraq to prevent the Special Commission implementing its mandate".
- Col Ritter's aim in gaining access to designated sites was "to achieve other purposes, unrelated to the Special Commission's mandate".

RESOLUTION 1115 (1997)

303. On 21 June, the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1115 (1997), condemning Iraq's actions and demanding its full co-operation. Although the resolution was adopted unanimously, there were clear differences between the positions of the US and UK, and China and Russia.

304. Acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, in resolution 1115 the Security Council condemned the "repeated refusal of the Iraqi authorities to allow access to sites designated by the Special Commission", which constituted a "clear and flagrant violation" of the provisions of previous resolutions. The Council reiterated its the demands for Iraq to:

- "co-operate fully";
- allow "immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access" for the inspectors; and
- "give immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access" to officials whom the Special Commission wished to interview.

305. The resolution requested the Chairman of UNSCOM to include "an annex evaluating Iraq's compliance" with those requirements in his future reports to the Council.

306. The resolution expressed the Council's "firm intention … to impose additional measures" on the officials responsible if Iraq did not comply.

307. In a statement before the vote, Sir John Weston, the UK Permanent Representative to the UN in New York, stated that the Council was meeting "to respond to the latest in a series of incidents" in which the Iraqi authorities had "sought to impose conditions", which he described as an "Iraqi campaign to prevent the Special Commission carrying out the mandate given to it by this Council" which was "obviously directed from the highest levels in Baghdad".[133]

308. Sir John added that it was "simply incredible for Iraq to claim that this campaign of concealment was the work of the late Hussein Kamil and a few associates". It was "essential" that the "mechanism of deception and concealment" was:

[133] UN Security Council, '3792nd Meeting Saturday 21 June 1997' (S/PV.3792).

> "… fully exposed and brought to an end. Otherwise we cannot know whether caches of equipment, documents, facilities, or entire programmes still exist of which we are unaware and which will therefore not be subject to monitoring."

309. Sir John concluded that Iraq had "repeatedly assured" the Council of its "commitment to furnishing full co-operation" but had "failed to translate these assurances into reality". The draft resolution was a "reasonable, proportionate and focused" way to remind Iraq of its obligations.

310. Mr Nabil Elaraby, Egyptian Permanent Representative to the UN, made it clear that an earlier draft of the resolution had proposed "additional sanctions to be imposed on Iraq at a time when the regional Arab, African and Islamic organizations and those associated with the Non-Aligned Movement wish the Special Commission to end its mission so as to put an end to the suffering of the Iraqi people".

311. Mr Edward Gnehm, US Deputy Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that, far from complying, Iraq had "expended its best efforts to thwart the will of the Council, particularly in the crucial area of weapons of mass destruction". Since 1991, it had:

> "… made every effort to conceal its true weapons capabilities, to destroy evidence of its programmes and supply routes and to lie about it to this Council. In the last two years, Iraqi efforts to interfere with the Special Commission … have intensified … UNSCOM inspectors have observed blatant efforts to remove documents and other evidence from sites while the inspectors themselves have been prevented from entering; and UNSCOM inspectors have been refused permission to interview knowledgeable individuals."

312. Mr Gnehm added that Iraq had abrogated the modalities in the joint agreement and its "obstructionist actions were taken under orders from the highest authorities in Baghdad". UNSCOM was facing its most serious threat since it was established and Iraq's failure was "a serious threat to the region's peace and security". Mr Ekéus's briefing to the Council had confirmed that there had been "no improvement" in Iraq's "alarming policies" since his April report and Iraq had "responded with contempt" to the Council's resolutions and statements.

313. Mr Gnehm stated:

> "… the time for mere words is over. Iraq has shown us that it will never voluntarily comply with resolutions of the Council unless the Council acts firmly and decisively to enforce its will. That is why we have brought forward this resolution today, which will demonstrate conclusively to Iraq that its actions have serious consequences …
> "… We have chosen these particular steps because they are measured and targeted …
> "Similarly, the Council expresses its intent to impose new measures, targeted precisely at those parties most responsible for the continued concealment of > Iraq's weapons programmes, if Iraq … fails to comply … with the substance of the Commission's authority to conduct inspections and interviews without interference of any sort."

314. In a statement after the vote, Mr Qin Huasun, Chinese Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that Iraq had "basically maintained its co-operation" and that UNSCOM had "made great progress in discharging the mandate entrusted to it". He added: "Under these circumstances, we should consider gradually lifting sanctions against Iraq in order to alleviate its humanitarian difficulties."

315. Mr Sergei Lavrov, Russian Permanent Representative to the UN, emphasised the importance of the Security Council's consensus on a "balanced", not "one-sided" response which reflected "both the very core of the problem and the broad range of views of the members of the Security Council", and was "not based on the logic of punishment but forms part of the Council's main thrust: to conclude this disarmament issue as quickly as possible and to achieve a lasting post-conflict settlement in the Persian Gulf on the basis of resolution 687 (1991)".

MR RICHARD BUTLER SUCCEEDS MR ROLF EKÉUS

316. On 1 July, Mr Richard Butler, an Australian diplomat and former Permanent Representative to the UN, succeeded Mr Ekéus as the Executive Chairman of UNSCOM.[134]

317. From mid-September 1997 there were further serious incidents in which UNSCOM access to designated sites was denied or delayed, and material was moved or destroyed, which were reported to the Security Council.

318. On 3 September, the JIC stated that Iraq had:

> "… claimed, however, that it had terminated the [BW] programme and destroyed its arsenal before UN inspections began in 1991. These admissions, while assessed to be largely accurate, are incomplete. We assess that Iraq has withheld information on key elements of its programme: reliable intelligence has described work on plague and suspicions persist of work on other pox viruses."[135]

319. Following a briefing to Security Council members from Mr Butler about two incidents the previous weekend, the President of the Security Council told the press on 17 September that the Council viewed Iraq's failure to co-operate and to apply the procedures agreed on 22 June "in the gravest terms", and called on Iraq to co-operate fully with UNSCOM.[136]

320. Despite that statement, inspection teams were prevented from inspecting three sites between 27 September and 1 October.[137] Constraints had also been imposed on two occasions on UNSCOM flights inside Iraq.

321. Mr Butler's report to the Security Council of 6 October acknowledged that progress had been made in "substantive areas" of UNSCOM's mandate, "in particular with respect to accounting for Iraq's proscribed long-range missiles and the destruction of chemical weapons-related equipment and materials".[138]

322. In addition, since April there had been more than 170 site inspections by visiting teams and more than 700 site inspections by resident monitoring teams. The majority had been conducted "without let or hindrance". The "atmosphere in which consultations with the Government of Iraq had been conducted" had "improved" and a number of problems had been resolved through direct contacts between Mr Butler and Mr Aziz.

323. A work programme had been agreed with Mr Aziz in late July.

324. In relation to ballistic missiles, the work programme "put special emphasis on achieving a solid and verifiable material balance". Mr Butler reported that:

- UNSCOM had been able to account for 817 of the 819 missiles imported by Iraq before 1988, including 83 of the 85 missiles which Iraq had claimed it had unilaterally destroyed.
- Inspections in August and September 1997 had accounted for 14 mobile missile launchers, but there were questions arising from Iraq's different accounts of what had happened to the launchers and its concealment of the fact that it had initially retained four launchers, which were not destroyed until October 1991.
- UNSCOM had not yet been able to account for proscribed missile warheads or propellants or the destruction of guidance components.
- In September 1997, Iraq had offered a new account of its concealment and destruction of components for indigenous production of missile engines and the means for their production, but had not provided any documentation to support that declaration.
- UNSCOM questioned Iraq's claims that it was not withholding any relevant documents.
- UNSCOM needed a full understanding of the considerations that had led to Iraq's retention of proscribed assets.

[137] UN Security Council, 6 October 1997, 'Report of the Secretary-General on the activities of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991)' (S/1997/774).
[138] UN Security Council, 6 October 1997, 'Report of the Secretary-General on the activities of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991)' (S/1997/774).

- Iraq had increased its declarations on the number of special warheads for the Al Hussein missile, filled with chemical or biological agents, several times. UNSCOM had established that the minimum number produced was 75, and that five additional warheads had been used for trials. It also "had evidence of the probable existence of a number of additional special warheads".
- UNSCOM had been unable fully to confirm Iraq's unilateral destruction of 45 of those warheads.
- Accounting for proscribed warheads would "greatly increase" UNSCOM's ability to report with confidence that Iraq did not possess a proscribed missile force.
- More work was required to account for Iraq's indigenous production of proscribed missile systems.

325. In relation to Iraq's chemical weapons programmes, UNSCOM was "still investigating the veracity" of Iraq's claims that it had unilaterally destroyed weapons and agents.

326. Iraq had not declared the removal and concealment of some production equipment from al-Muthanna until August 1997 and its plans required further clarification.

327. The "most important" outstanding issues were:

- "accounting for special missile warheads";
- the "material balance of 155mm mustard shells";
- the "extent of the VX programme"; and
- the rationale for the acquisition of various types of chemical weapons.

328. Iraq had declared in June 1996 that 550 artillery munitions filled with mustard agent had been destroyed during the 1991 Gulf Conflict but had not yet provided evidence of that destruction.

329. UNSCOM had been unable to verify the destruction of Iraq's stocks of precursor chemicals for the production of VX. In addition, while Iraq had declared, after 1995, that the project had failed and no large-scale production had ever taken place, UNSCOM had "recently obtained further sufficient evidence" that Iraq had "succeeded in acquiring VX production capabilities".

330. Important progress had been made, but Iraq would need to provide "much more and accurate material and related access … relevant to the warheads and VX questions" before UNSCOM would be able to "report positively on disarmament".

331. UNSCOM reported to the Security Council on 6 October that Iraq's total production and holdings of CW agents could not be verified:

- "Over a period of seven years Iraq had provided three formal FFCD (full and final complete declarations) and about 20 sets of clarifications …"

- Iraq's acquisition and expenditure of munitions before 1988 could not be verified because of the absence of sufficient evidence from Iraq and its former foreign suppliers of the procurement of precursor chemicals, production and weaponisation of CW agents.
- In trying to determine a material balance of the munitions which had existed in 1991, UNSCOM had been unable to account for some 16,000 unfilled munitions and 550 munitions filled with mustard, primarily because of Iraq's unilateral destruction programme.
- There was also a "material balance" of around 4,000 tons of key precursor chemicals.
- Almost all of Iraq's production equipment had been destroyed in the 1991 conflict or subsequently under UN supervision.

332. Iraq's biological weapons programme was, however, an area which was "unredeemed by progress or any approximation of the known facts of Iraq's programme". There was "incomprehension" about Iraq's persistence in "refusing to make the facts known" and why it was "so insistent on blocking the Commission's own efforts to reach those facts".

333. A panel of experts drawn from 13 Member States of the Security Council had unanimously concluded that Iraq's latest FFCD was "not acceptable". The declaration was "incomplete", had "significant inaccuracies", and the outstanding problems with all aspects of proscribed activity were "numerous and grave". There were no insights into the decisions to commence the biological weapons programme, or to conceal it between 1991 and 1995.

334. In September, Mr Butler and Mr Aziz had agreed that the new FFCD on biological weapons, and all other FFCDs in UNSCOM's possession, should be regarded as final; and that the Commission would not further assist Iraq in the formulation of its account.

335. The report also stated that:

- Much greater resources could be required in the future to monitor and verify dual-capable facilities and the export and import of dual-capable items.
- The monitoring system could not be comprehensive until the Security Council had been "able to conclude that Iraq's prohibited programmes have been destroyed, removed or rendered harmless" and the "full extent" of Iraq's prohibited programmes was known.
- The Iraqi Government's stated willingness to comply fully with the requirements for monitoring had "not always been reflected, in practice, on the ground". While the number of incidents of concealment, deception and interference with the inspections process were "relatively small", they served to "reduce confidence in Iraq's commitment to the system".
- There was still "considerable uncertainty" about Iraq's retention of prohibited material and concealment systems.

- UNSCOM's view was that, "were it to have full access to all relevant sites and persons in Iraq", it was "highly likely that proscribed items would be discovered"; and that "Iraq's actions to impede or block the Commission's concealment investigations" tended to "affirm this view".
- Iraq had "increasingly failed to apply or behave in conformity with the modalities [agreed on 22 June]" and, "in more recent times", had "sought both to exclude them altogether with respect to certain sites and to define new categories of often very large sites from which the Commission inspectors would be forbidden".

336. The report concluded that UNSCOM was "convinced" that:

- The Security Council should "insist that Iraq meet its obligation to disclose fully all of its prohibited weapons and associated programmes". This was a "crucial requirement" for which there was "no substitute".
- It was "essential" for the Council to "reaffirm and demand Iraq's complete co-operation" with UNSCOM's exercise of "its rights to full access to sites and persons".

337. In a letter on 12 October, Mr Aziz set out Iraq's concerns about UNSCOM activities and the influence of the US and UK on UNSCOM's approach, including:

- The US "in particular, together with Britain, were doing their utmost … to topple the national Government of Iraq and to eliminate its national leadership". That "seriously affected the composition" of UNSCOM, with the US "leading the hostile work against Iraq". An activity which was "supposed to be international and neutral" was "unbalanced".
- The US monopolised the intelligence means. Iraq wanted aerial surveillance using a plane from a neutral state.
- The justification for intrusive inspections was based on allegations of deliberate concealment and inaccurate information which were themselves inaccurate and being deliberately used by UNSCOM to procrastinate and to prolong the inspections process. For example, the delay in analysing missile fragments had been caused by UNSCOM's original insistence that the analysis should be conducted in the US.
- The reports submitted to the Council were "tendentious", using a method that was "intended to confuse the past with what has been newly achieved, in a manner that makes it difficult for the reader to differentiate between the positive and negative aspects"; and that many of the reports were "inaccurate". The Security Council and international community "were being deliberately misled with a view to fostering baseless suspicions about Iraq's capabilities".
- Iraq had not been asked in 1992 to preserve the remnants of the special warheads it had destroyed, and the subject had been "considered as closed" in UNSCOM's report in June 1995. In the absence of any missiles or means for their delivery, the warheads had no operational value. The renewed focus on special warheads was deliberately aimed at delay.

- UNSCOM should consider what had been achieved in relation to missiles and chemical weapons as sufficient to meet Iraq's obligations in section C of resolution 687.
- Iraq was "ready to start serious and extensive work to address the biological file in order to close it within a short time". It had "completely destroyed" all the biological agents in its possession and all "the sites, apparatuses and equipment used in the production of biological agents". All the 87 sites which UNSCOM considered could be capable of dual use for the production of biological agent were "under strict monitoring".
- Iraq was "ready to continue to work with the Special Commission in a serious, scientific, technical and objective manner" to close the files "so that the Council may proceed to implement its obligations towards Iraq" under paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991) (removal of the restrictions on trade in resolution 661).
- The people of Iraq could not "continue suffering this injustice". Iraq had "fulfilled the obligations imposed on it" and the Security Council should do the same, "starting at the earliest date". If the "imbalance" continued, the "situation" would become "absolutely unacceptable".[139]

IAEA REPORT, OCTOBER 1997

338. Dr Blix submitted his final consolidated report as Director General of the IAEA on 6 October, which concluded that the IAEA investigation of Iraq's nuclear programme had reached the point of diminishing returns. The extent to which the remaining uncertainty was acceptable was a political judgement.

339. The Butler Report stated that, after 1995, the JIC consistently assessed that, "if all United Nations controls on Iraq's nuclear activities were removed, Iraq could possibly develop a nuclear device in around five years".[140]

340. Dr Blix's final consolidated report assessed that the IAEA had a "technically coherent picture" which revealed a programme:

> "… aimed at the production of an arsenal of nuclear weapons, based on implosion technology, which had involved:
> – Acquisition of non-weapon-usable nuclear material through indigenous production and through overt and covert foreign procurement.
> – Research and development programmes into the full range of uranium enrichment technologies culminating in the industrialisation of EMIS [Electro Magnetic Isotope Separation] and the demonstration of a proven prototype gas centrifuge.

[139] UN Security Council, 13 October 1997, 'Letter dated 12 October 1997 from the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq addressed to the President of the Security Council' (S/1997/789).
[140] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898, page 45.

- Development of metallurgical technologies necessary for the fabrication of the uranium components of a nuclear weapon.
- Research and development activities related to the production of plutonium …
- Development of nuclear weapon designs and weaponisation technologies for implosion devices and the establishment of industrial-scale facilities for their further development and production.
- Research and development activities related to the integration of a nuclear weapon system with a missile delivery system."[141]

341. Dr Blix added that the IAEA's ability to understand the details of the programme had been "severely hampered by Iraq's persistence in a policy of concealment and understatement of the programme's scope and achievements".

342. The report included a summary of Iraq's actions since 1991 and the IAEA's activities illustrating that point. Since May 1997, the IAEA had "received clarification of many matters", although it had:

- "not provided a comprehensive statement of the membership, terms of reference and duration of authority of the Governmental Committee charged, inter alia, to 'reduce the effect of NPT violation to the minimum'";
- "stated that it has no further information regarding external assistance to its clandestine nuclear programme";
- "declared itself unable to describe the motives behind the actions ascribed to the late Lt Gen Hussein Kamil which resulted in the concealment of the cache of documentation, material and equipment 'discovered' at the Haider House farm";
- "declined to include, in its FFCD a summary of the practical and theoretical achievements of Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme"; and
- "yet to provide the promised written description of its post-war procurement system".

343. Despite those issues, the IAEA report stated that:

- There were "no indications to suggest Iraq was successful in its attempts to produce nuclear weapons", although there was "no documentation or other evidence" which showed "the actual status of the weapon design when the programme was interrupted".
- Iraq was "at, or close to, the threshold of success in such areas as the production of HEU [Highly Enriched Uranium] through the EMIS process, the production and pilot … of … gas centrifuge machines, and the fabrication of the explosive package for a nuclear weapon".

[141] UN Security Council, 8 October 1997, 'Fourth consolidated report of the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency under paragraph 16 of Security Council resolution 1051 (1996)' (S/1997/779).

- There were "no indications to suggest that Iraq had produced more than a few grams of weapons-usable nuclear material", and all of that had been removed from Iraq.
- There were "no indications" that Iraq had acquired other weapons-usable nuclear material.
- All the "safeguarded research reactor fuel, including the HEU fuel that Iraq had planned to divert to its 'crash programme', was verified and fully accounted for by the IAEA and removed from Iraq".
- There were "no indications" that "any physical capability for the production of amounts of weapons-usable nuclear material of any practical significance".

344. Dr Blix stated that there were "no indications of significant discrepancies" in Iraq's latest declaration.

345. The report stated that a letter of 1 May from Iraq's Minister of Foreign Affairs reflected "Iraq's unconditional reaffirmation of its obligations under the NPT" and "its acceptance of its obligations, as interpreted by the IAEA, under Iraq's Safeguards Agreement with the Agency".

346. The report observed that:

> "… taking into account the possibility, albeit remote, of undetected duplicate facilities or the existence of anomalous activities or facilities outside this technically coherent picture, no absolute assurances can be given with regard to the completeness of Iraq's FFCD. Some uncertainty is inevitable in any country-wide technical verification process which aims to prove the absence of readily concealable objects or activities. The extent to which such uncertainty is acceptable is a policy judgement."

347. The report said that the IAEA's:

> "… activities regarding the investigation of Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme have reached a point of diminishing returns … The IAEA is not 'closing the books' on its investigation … and will continue to exercise its right to investigate any aspect of Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme, in particular, through the follow-up of any new information …"

348. In his memoir, Dr Blix wrote:

> "There was general agreement … that there were no significant 'disarmament' matters to clear up in the nuclear dossier, only some 'questions' to clarify."[142]

349. The Security Council considered the report from Mr Butler and a draft resolution on 23 October.[143] Dr Blix's report was not formally tabled for discussion in the Security Council.

RESOLUTION 1134 (1997)

350. Resolution 1134 (1997), expressing the intention to impose travel restrictions in the event that UNSCOM reported that Iraq was not in compliance with resolution 1115, was adopted on 23 October.[144]

351. The draft text which became resolution 1134 was co-sponsored by nine members of the Council and adopted by ten votes. Five members, including three Permanent Members, abstained – China, Egypt, France, Kenya and Russia.

352. Resolution 1134:

- reaffirmed the Security Council's "determination to ensure" Iraq's "full compliance … with all its obligations under all previous resolutions"; and
- reiterated the Council's "demand that Iraq allow immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to the Special Commission to any site … and in particular … fixed wing and helicopter flights throughout Iraq for all relevant purposes … without interferences of any kind and upon such terms and conditions as may be determined by the Special Commission".

353. Acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, the measures adopted by the Council included:

- condemning Iraq's actions detailed in UNSCOM's report of 6 October;
- deciding that Iraq's refusal to co-operate constituted a "flagrant violation" of its obligations and demanding its full co-operation;
- demanding that Iraq should "co-operate fully with the Special Commission in accordance with the relevant resolutions";
- expressing the "firm intention", if UNSCOM reported Iraq was not in compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115, "to adopt measures which would oblige all States to prevent without delay the entry into or transit through their territories of all Iraqi officials and members of the Iraqi armed forces who are responsible for or participate in instances of non-compliance … [with the exception of] persons carrying out bona fide diplomatic assignments or missions"; and
- reaffirming its "full support for the authority of the Special Commission … to ensure the implementation of its mandate".

354. The record of the discussion demonstrates serious divisions in the Council over the approach adopted, with the UK and US speaking in strong terms about the need for action while the members who abstained argued that the terms of the resolution were unbalanced and unlikely to bring about a resolution of the problems faced by UNSCOM.[145]

[145] UN Security Council, '3826th Meeting Thursday 23 October 1997' (S/PV.3826).

355. Sir John Weston stated that the "incidents described" in Mr Butler's report of 6 October, and his inability to advise the Council that Iraq was "in substantial compliance with the demands of resolution 1115", were "adequate justification to move forward from the decision" taken by the Council in June.

356. Sir John added:

> "We shall regret it if a few Council members, for whatever reasons of their own, are unable to subscribe to this view. We have worked hard and in good faith to accommodate all members' preoccupations on the text. But we were not willing to compromise the underlying purpose of the resolution or the responsibilities of the … Council in order to appease Iraq …"

357. Sir John also stated that Saddam Hussein had to take "the political decision to co-operate fully" with UNSCOM, and that:

> "The regularity with which this Council has had to address this issue confirms that this decision has still not been taken. All we have heard from the Iraqi regime for the past six and [a] half years are lies and empty promises, while on the ground they have actively obstructed the Special Commission and concealed from it details of its illegal weapons programmes. These facts are borne out in the latest report of the Special Commission, which clearly states that, while progress has been made, serious deficiencies remain in all three weapons areas, in particular on chemical and biological warfare agents."

358. Sir John concluded that, "until and unless" Iraq co-operated and told "the whole truth", there could be "no prospect of the Council considering whether the demands of Section C of … resolution 687 (1991)" had been met. He also referred to Iraq's failure to meet its obligations in relation to missing Kuwaiti prisoners of war and property.

359. Ambassador Bill Richardson, US Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that the Baghdad regime was the only party "responsible for this very sad state of affairs", and that it was refusing "to meet its most basic obligations, such as allowing UNSCOM inspectors to carry out their Security Council mandate without obstruction or harassment". Mr Butler's report recorded "a litany of Iraqi harassment, obfuscation, obstruction and deception". Iraq had explained its actions by attacking the credibility of UNSCOM and questioning its judgement, and when that did not work, resorting to "time honoured tactics of bullying, burning and blackmailing".

360. Ambassador Richardson added:

> "Compliance with international obligations is not a voluntary act. Co-operation is not a matter of degree. Either Iraq is in compliance … or it is in breach of those obligations."

361. Ambassador Richardson challenged the description of Iraq's "so-called co-operation over the past six months", which was "too little, too late".

362. Addressing comments by other members of the Council about Dr Blix's report, Ambassador Richardson stated:

> "… even in this area it is clear that Iraq has not answered all the relevant questions necessary to have a full accounting of its programmes. The books cannot be closed. Furthermore, we now know, thanks to the efforts of Mr Blix and his staff, that Iraq lied and concealed an active weaponization programme for years in direct defiance of its commitments under the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (NPT) and its commitments to the IAEA. Iraq has lied about its programmes for too long and too recently for us to settle for anything less than absolute certainty that Iraq's nuclear ambitions have been completely neutralized.
> "When accounting for nuclear weapons, close is not good enough. If you fail to account for just one nuclear device, that could mean the destruction of an entire city."

363. Ambassador Richardson concluded that Baghdad had "a clear and simple choice" while commending the approach of Mr Butler and his team and stating that the Council "must do everything" it could to support him. He regretted the decision of some members of the Council not to support the resolution, which would "carry the full weight of international law".

364. Japan, Poland, Portugal and Sweden spoke in support of the resolution, but in more moderate terms than either the US or UK.

365. Mr Elaraby drew attention to Dr Blix's report and the progress in some areas reported by Mr Butler, and set out conclusions in seven areas that Egypt would have liked to see included in the resolution for the evaluation of the implementation of the Council's resolutions and the Council's future actions. These were:

- The draft resolution should have taken into account the positive aspects reported by UNSCOM and the IAEA.
- The Council "must be the only body responsible" for making decisions, "following consultations and discussions on the basis of reports submitted by the Special Commission".
- The IAEA and Special Commission were responsible for "purely technical matters". While it was "difficult" for them "to assert that nothing remains to be destroyed" it was "important" for the Council to take the decision "defining the ultimate goal of the activities of those two bodies in order that the Council's resolutions can be fully implemented in detail".
- The Council should "take the time … objectively" to study the differences in view between the Special Commission and Iraq about the interpretation of the modalities for inspections. Further co-operation was needed from Iraq, but the Special Commission also had to "make an effort" to co-operate so that it could discharge its responsibilities.

- The reports contained sporadic instances of non-co-operation; but the question was whether that was "recurring, systematic non-co-operation" and if it indicated "a real pattern of unwillingness to comply" or "isolated instances of differences".
- Egypt was opposed in principle to additional sanctions.
- The Council should have mandated the UN Sanctions Committee to determine clear criteria for the modalities for the implementation of the resolution so that the Council could "avoid contributing to aggravating the tensions between Iraq and the Special Commission, which could complicate the task of eliminating weapons of mass destruction".

366. Mr Elaraby concluded by stating that Egypt had asked for more time for "calm and constructive dialogue", but the sponsors of the resolution:

> "… had insisted on it being put to the vote … without taking into account the majority of the proposals put forward in recent days … so that the draft resolution would respect logic, legality and the provisions of resolution 1115 … and … inspire the Iraqi Government to co-operate more fully with the Special Commission."

367. Mr Kipkorir Aly Azad Rana, Kenyan Deputy Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that he would abstain because the draft resolution did not "clearly portray the balance and tone of the reports" from the IAEA and UNSCOM.

368. Mr Liu Jieyi, Counsellor, Permanent Mission of China to the UN, stated that the priority should be to enhance the co-operation between Iraq and UNSCOM and that he would abstain because the draft resolution was "not conducive to the settlement of the problems concerned" and amendments proposed by "quite a number of delegations" had not been accepted.

369. Mr Lavrov stated that the IAEA and UNSCOM had recently produced "voluminous comprehensive reports on the significant work done on filling in the blank spaces in the Iraq disarmament dossier". The UNSCOM report had noted "significant" and "important" progress, particularly in the missile and chemical areas, and the IAEA report "had a positive tone". Iraq had not accounted for all the items proscribed by section C of resolution 687, and a number of questions remained "to be clarified in the biological sphere". There were "deficiencies" in Iraq's compliance and "isolated incidents", but that could not "justify the immediate adoption of additional sanctions". The problems should be addressed within the framework of planned consultations between Mr Butler and Baghdad.

370. Mr Lavrov added that there was "an obvious lack of balance" in the draft resolution which "Ignored … various substantial elements of the fulfilment by Iraq of relevant provisions of resolution 687".

371. Russia could not understand why there was "no mention of the IAEA report" and the significant progress on the Iraqi nuclear dossier, which could be "viewed as closed". Mr Lavrov stated:

> "The sponsors' categorical refusal to refer to the IAEA report in the draft resolution raises most serious questions and is unacceptable to us."

372. Mr Lavrov also pointed out that resolution 1115 had required "substantial compliance" by Iraq with UNSCOM's requirements for access; and that continued in effect. The new resolution's requirements would "confuse the criteria" for compliance with the UN's resolutions.

373. Mr Lavrov concluded that Russia had been "prepared to continue working on the draft in order to make it more balanced and acceptable to all members of the Security Council", but the sponsors were "unfortunately" not ready to do so. Russia was "forced to abstain".

374. Mr Alain Dejammet, French Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that France had abstained "on a consideration of the merits of the text of the resolution" and the importance of the principle of "seeking unity within the Council", both to "underline the authority" of UNSCOM's actions and because France considered that unity had "contributed to the achievement of the significant progress" noted in UNSCOM's report. France also thought that Mr Butler "should have received some encouragement, however modest, to continue with his efforts and enhance further the effectiveness of the Special Commission's co-operation with Iraq".

375. Iraqi concerns about US intentions, and its decision to refuse US participation in UNSCOM activities in Iraq, were set out in a letter to the UN on 29 October.

376. Reflecting the concerns about US intentions and actions, set out in his letters of 15 June and 12 October, and the effect of resolution 1134, which clearly reflected the "arbitrary position imposed by the United States against Iraq, using pressure and blackmail", Mr Aziz informed the President of the Security Council that Iraq had decided to continue co-operation with UNSCOM:

> "… provided no individuals of American nationality shall participate in any activity … inside Iraq, particularly inspections, interviews, and aerial and ground surveillance."[146]

[146] UN Security Council, 29 October 1997, 'Letter dated 29 October 1997 from Mr Tariq Aziz, Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq, addressed to the President of the Security Council' (S/1997/829).

377. Mr Aziz added that the decision would take effect the following day. He also requested UNSCOM to withdraw its cover for U-2 flights, which "had been spying on Iraq and its leadership in order to execute America's hostile policy against Iraq under cover of the Special Commission's operations".

378. Mr Aziz wrote that Iraq was "confident" that it was "free of proscribed weapons" and had "no apprehension of actions to verify that by all practical means". He emphasised Iraq's "sincere desire for continuing the co-operation with the Special Commission" to fulfil its obligations, and demanded that the Security Council fulfil its obligations.

379. A Presidential Statement issued after a meeting of the Security Council to consider Iraq's "unacceptable decision … to seek to impose conditions on its co-operation with the Special Commission, thereby preventing the Special Commission from discharging its responsibilities":

- recalled the Security Council demands in resolution 1134 "that Iraq co-operate fully with the Special Commission in accordance with the relevant resolutions";
- condemned "the decision … to try to dictate the terms of its compliance with its obligation to co-operate";
- demanded that "Iraq co-operate fully … without conditions or restrictions";
- reminded Iraq "of its responsibility for the safety and security" of UNSCOM personnel; and
- warned "of the serious consequences of Iraq's failure to comply immediately and fully with its obligations under the relevant resolutions".[147]

380. The statement concluded that the Council was "determined to ensure rapid and full Iraqi compliance with the relevant resolutions" and that it would "remain actively seized of the matter".

381. On 30 October, Mr Butler advised the President of the Security Council that Iraq had refused entry for two UNSCOM officials, and one IAEA official, of US nationality.[148]

382. In a letter of 31 October, Dr Blix informed Mr Annan that the IAEA had suspended its monitoring activities in Iraq on 29 October.[149] Dr Blix reported that Iraq had subsequently informed the IAEA that it wished its work to continue and that "all IAEA staff, inspectors and experts" would be "welcomed as usual", there was "no reason whatsoever to suspend any IAEA activities in Iraq".

[148] UN Security Council, 30 October 1997, 'Letter dated 30 October 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) addressed to the President of the Security Council' (S/1997/830).
[149] UN Security Council, 31 October 1997, 'Letter dated 31 October 1997 from the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency addressed to the Secretary-General' (S/1997/833).

383. Dr Blix added that it was his view that, as the IAEA and Special Commission were acting "as organs of the Security Council" to contribute to "a common objective", it was "essential" that they had a "common approach". The IAEA would continue "for the time being … to suspend the practical implementation of its ongoing monitoring and verification plan".

384. On 2 November, Mr Nizar Hamdoon, Iraqi Permanent Representative to the UN, reiterated Iraq's decision on U-2 flights in a letter to Mr Butler.[150] He wrote:

> "In the light of current developments, Iraq anticipates that the United States will engage in military aggression … as it has done on previous occasions. Accordingly, the entry of a United States spy plane into Iraqi airspace cannot be accepted. We therefore urge you to cancel the overflights scheduled … on 5 and 7 November."

385. On 2 November, Mr Butler informed the President of the Security Council that two UNSCOM personnel of US nationality had the previous day again been refused entry by Iraq.[151]

386. In further letters on 4 and 5 November, Mr Butler reported that US personnel in UNSCOM inspection teams had been denied access to Iraqi facilities, and that dual-use equipment had been moved without authorisation.[152]

387. In his memoir, Mr Annan wrote that in November 1997 he had "personally stepped into the Iraq quagmire for the first time".[153] He had known "full well" that his "interventions would be met with suspicion and manoeuvring on all sides". He had appointed three senior diplomats to engage the Iraqis:

> "Baghdad … was clearly determined to re-engage the UN at a senior level, namely with me as Secretary-General, and it had made its negotiating position clear: it was not seeking confrontation; it had implemented all Security Council resolutions without receiving adequate respect for its sovereignty, integrity, and security; and that one member state – the United States – was using UNSCOM for its own purposes."

388. Mr Butler sent a separate letter on 5 November, informing the President of the Security Council that, in response to a request from the UN Secretary-General, he had decided to postpone the U-2 flights on 5 and 7 November while Mr Annan's Personal Envoys were delivering a message to Iraq; but that the flights would resume the following week.[154]

389. On 6 November, Iraq informed the President of the Security Council that it had requested US personnel not to enter a site, but UNSCOM had instructed the team to withdraw.[155] The letter added that, as a precaution against the possibility of US attacks, Iraq had moved equipment but the items would be returned for inspection and authentication and it would not be used for proscribed activities.

390. The letter concluded by stating that Iraq was "honouring our obligations under the monitoring plan" in resolution 715.

391. On 7 November, Mr Butler reported further incidents on 6 November and also drew attention to a further Iraqi request for cancellations of U-2 flights and to concerns about the visibility or absence of equipment being monitored by UNSCOM cameras.[156]

392. On 10 November, Mr Mohammed Said Al-Sahaf, the Iraqi Minister for Foreign Affairs, wrote to Mr Annan reporting that a "United States U-2 spy plane together with several formations of United States warplanes fitted with all kinds of weapons and espionage equipment" had "violated" Iraq's airspace and sovereignty that morning. As a result it was "no longer to be considered, even nominally or formally, as one of the means used by the United Nations to conduct so-called inspections". Iraq would act against US aircraft to safeguard its sovereignty and security.[157]

393. In a briefing for members of the Council on 10 November, Mr Annan stated that, "Had Iraq agreed to return to full compliance", he would have had "no hesitation" in recommending that Iraq should be "granted a hearing".[158]

394. Despite diplomatic efforts by a number of Member States and Mr Annan, Iraq refused to rescind its decision of 29 October.

395. Significant differences in position remained within the Council, particularly in relation to any potential use of force.

RESOLUTION 1137 (1997)

396. On 12 November, the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1137 (1997), which:

- recalled the Council's previous resolutions;
- stated its "grave concern" about recent developments;
- condemned Iraq's continued violation of its obligations, "including its unacceptable decision … to seek to impose conditions on co-operation" with UNSCOM;
- demanded Iraq rescind its decision of 29 October; and
- decided to impose a travel ban on designated Iraqi officials, as foreshadowed in resolution 1134.[159]

397. The resolution also expressed the Council's "firm intention to take further measures as may be required for the implementation of this resolution".

398. In statements to the Council before and after the vote, all members of the Council supported united action and targeted sanctions in response to Iraq's defiance of the UN, but significant differences in position remained.

399. Mr Elaraby drew attention to the impact of sanctions on the Iraqi people and the lack of hope that they would be lifted.[160] Iraq's co-operation had "not been ideal", but it had gone a long way. Iraq's defiance and failure to respond to attempts to persuade it to change its position were unwise because it meant "squandering the achievements made on Iraq's long road of co-operation with the Special Commission". There were lessons from the crisis, including that the Council should "review" UNSCOM's methods. Iraq should not be pushed "into believing that it has nothing to gain from its continued co-operation with the Commission and nothing to lose from a cessation of that co-operation".

400. Mr Njuguna Mahugu, Kenyan Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that the current level of tension "must not be allowed to escalate any further".

401. Mr Dejammet stated that he had believed reason would prevail and regretted Iraq's refusal to rescind its decision. A "strong and unanimous reaction" was required, but it had to be "balanced and commensurate with the realities of the situation". The "search for a peaceful solution" would not be hampered by the travel bans, and France continued "to advocate strongly that any action" should be "considered and led strictly within the framework of the Security Council". The resolution did not "encourage or justify any escalation". The Council should "persevere" in an "active search for a diplomatic solution".

[160] UN Security Council, '3831st Meeting Wednesday 12 November 1997' (S/PV.3831).

402. Mr Dejammet added that the "basic goal" was continuing the work of the Commission:

> "Nothing would be worse than to call into question the main strength of resolution 687 (1991) and United Nations relations with Iraq. The system of ongoing verification and monitoring cannot be suspended; the security of the region is at stake."

403. Mr Dejammet said that unanimity of the Council in a crisis was a "very important condition" for France. If Iraq heeded the message from the Council it would "be possible to discuss their concerns regarding the working methods of the Special Commission and the manner in which it discharges its responsibilities". There could also be discussions to "explore prospects for resolving the crisis and to take into account the significant progress … on the substance, notably on the nuclear and ballistic areas". The Iraqi population had paid an "exorbitant price", which could not "go on rising indefinitely, amidst general indifference".

404. Ambassador Richardson stated that the "unambiguous message to the leaders of Iraq" was that the Security Council was "united in its determination that Iraq must comply with the resolutions of the Council"; and that there would be "consequences for Iraq if it fails to do so". Mr Aziz had been in New York lobbying for sanctions to be lifted, but Iraq did not "seem to understand that its objective can only be reached through full compliance".

405. Ambassador Richardson added that Iraq had, for years, been "trying every trick to deceive" UNSCOM. Its actions were "gross violations" of its obligations. Iraq had:

> "… failed in other areas mandated by the Council and it has given no sign that it will cease activities and policies intended to threaten its neighbours. Indeed, it gives every indication that it intends to continue to develop a dangerous arsenal of weapons of mass destruction. Which is what this is all about."

406. Ambassador Richardson said that the US felt "compassion for the Iraqi people and empathy for their plight", and looked forward to sanctions being lifted, but Iraq had first to "comply fully and unconditionally with … relevant … resolutions".

407. Referring to a statement by Mr Robin Cook (the Foreign Secretary), Mr Stephen Gomersall (UK Deputy Permanent Representative to the UN in New York) stated that the UN had responded "swiftly, strongly and unanimously" to "provocation". If Saddam Hussein returned to his senses and let UNSCOM resume its work, and then complied with all relevant resolutions, the process for lifting sanctions could be started. But if he continued to defy the will of the UN, "further measures" would be taken.

408. The Council was facing "the most serious challenge" from Saddam Hussein since the end of the Gulf Conflict. The successful completion of UNSCOM's work was "essential for maintaining regional and international peace and security", and its latest report made clear that there was much to be done, "especially" on chemical and biological weapons.

409. There had been a lot of "special pleading from Iraq on the damage caused by six and a half years of sanctions" but it was:

> "… clear that the humanitarian interests of the Iraqi people and their welfare have been subordinated to the misguided policies of the leadership and that it is these policies which are the fundamental problem."

410. Mr Lavrov stated that Russia had been "working intensively" with others to "de-escalate the situation", but had failed to achieve the desired results. The Security Council had "no other way out than to adopt concrete measures on the basis of the consensus … established in June … in resolution 1115".

411. But Russia was "convinced" that any "complications" should be:

> "… resolved exclusively by political means and strictly within the framework of the relevant resolutions of the Security Council. Any other approaches, particularly actions involving force or the threat of the use of force, could nullify all our achievements so far in reaching a post-crisis settlement in the Persian Gulf and take us all a long way back from the goal, already coming within our reach, of eliminating the threat to peace and security in that region."

412. Mr Lavrov added that the resolution ruled out "the possibility of using the authority of the Security Council and the United Nations to justify any attempts to use force".

413. Mr Lavrov concluded that inspections had:

> "… confirmed that Iraq has no proscribed activities going on involving nuclear weapons, and the facilities and dual-use equipment are being reliably monitored. In this connection, the nuclear dossier can be deemed to be closed. The balance sheet is virtually completed on proscribed missiles. All capacity and components for the production of chemical weapons have been eliminated.
> "Such serious results cannot pass by without adequate evaluation by the Security Council. We intend to revert to this question immediately after the current crisis situation around Iraq has been resolved."

414. Mr Qin Huasun stated that China had called on Iraq to resume co-operation with the United Nations but had "always been of the view that Iraq's sovereignty, territorial integrity and legitimate concerns for its own security should be respected". He observed that the "causes of the current crisis" were "multifaceted and complex": "three feet of ice could not have accumulated as a result of one day's cold weather".

415. Mr Qin Huasun suggested:

> "The Security Council should hear the views of UNSCOM and Iraq on the question of inspections in order to make a fair and reasonable judgement on progress achieved in inspections. Problems … should be appropriately settled through dialogue and co-operation. We are opposed to the use or the threat of force or any actions that might further exacerbate tensions. We hope that the parties concerned will exercise restraint and find a proper solution to the problem through co-operation and dialogue and avoid the escalation of tensions. In particular, the occurrence of armed conflict must be avoided."

416. In his memoir, Mr Annan wrote:

> "In late 1997, it was clear the United States had lost patience with the inspections process and was agitating for military action or full Iraqi compliance. UN inspectors … destroyed more weapons of mass destruction than the coalition had during the Gulf War … despite … the regime's attitude … By this time, Iraq had identified a new reason to resist co-operation; namely, the national security and dignity of its Presidential sites … I knew Saddam had to open these … [to inspection], but I also felt deeply uneasy that the world could go to war over this issue …"[161]

417. In response to Russian diplomatic activity, Iraq agreed to allow UNSCOM to resume its activities in Iraq.

418. During a visit to Moscow on 18 to 19 November, Mr Aziz and Mr Yevgeny Primakov, the Russian Foreign Minister, agreed that Iraq would allow the return of UNSCOM from 20 November.[162]

419. The Joint Communiqué stated that Russia would:

> "… actively contribute, on the basis of Iraq's implementation of the relevant Security Council resolutions, towards a quick lifting of the sanctions imposed on Iraq, especially the implementation of paragraph 22 of resolution 687, to the letter and without additional conditions."

420. The Moscow Times reported that Mr Primakov had been very careful to observe the substance of UN policy on Iraq, and that he had warned Iraq not to expect an end to economic sanctions until it had closed down its chemical and biological weapons programmes.[163] The composition of UN inspections teams would be slightly adjusted, but would retain many US inspectors.

421. UNSCOM and IAEA inspectors returned to Iraq on 21 November 1997.[164]

422. At the request of the Security Council, the members of UNSCOM convened an emergency session on 21 November to discuss and advise on "ways to make the work of the Commission more effective".[165] The outcome of the discussion was reported to the President of the Security Council the following day.

423. In relation to nuclear weapons, the members of the Commission understood, from a presentation made by the IAEA, that:

> "… if the few clarifications required from Iraq in paragraph 75 of the IAEA report [of 8 October] are satisfactorily provided, and if Iraq were to co-operate in the use of fixed-wing aircraft within Iraq for monitoring purposes, IAEA would have a basis for an early favourable report to the Security Council."

424. In relation to ballistic missiles and chemical weapons, the report identified priorities as:

- clarification of and accounting for Iraq's indigenous production of proscribed missiles, conventional and special missile warheads, and major missile parts;
- the extent of Iraq's efforts to produce and weaponise VX;
- the material balance of chemical munitions which Iraq declared had been destroyed during the 1991 Gulf Conflict; and
- the material balance of equipment procured by Iraq for production of chemical weapons.

425. In relation to biological weapons, the Security Council was advised to urge Iraq to overcome the deficiencies in its declarations that had been identified in UNSCOM's October report.

426. The members of the Commission also:

- took note of Iraq's systematic concealment activities which had a direct effect on its ability to fulfil its mandate, but no details were provided;
- emphasised that access was fundamental to its ability to accomplish its tasks and that greater clarity was needed in the reconciliation of Iraq's legitimate concerns in respect of national security, sovereignty and dignity and the full practical application of UNSCOM's mandate;
- suggested that UNSCOM staff should continue to document all examples of Iraqi efforts to frustrate their work;

[164] UN Security Council, 24 November 1997, 'Emergency session of the United Nations Special Commission established under paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991)' (S/1997/922).
[165] UN Security Council, 24 November 1997, 'Emergency session of the United Nations Special Commission established under paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991)' (S/1997/922).

- suggested that the Executive Chairman should assess the extent to which the temporary cessation of UNSCOM operations had set back its ability to complete its mandate;
- recommended a review of additional equipment which could facilitate its inspections;
- noted that additional aerial surveillance, including night surveillance if possible, could enhance UNSCOM effectiveness;
- recommended a review of the modalities for air operations; and
- recommended Governments should be encouraged to make experts available.

427. In response, and following consultations between members, the Security Council authorised a Presidential Statement on 3 December, which:

- endorsed the Commission's conclusions and recommendations;
- reiterated the demand that Iraq fulfil all its obligations and co-operate fully with UNSCOM and the IAEA in implementing their mandates;
- stressed that the "effectiveness and speed with which UNSCOM may accomplish its responsibilities" was "above all, determined by the degree to which the Government of Iraq co-operates in disclosing the full extent and disposition of its proscribed programmes and in granting UNSCOM unimpeded access to all sites, document records and individuals";
- acknowledged UNSCOM's conclusion to respect the legitimate concerns of Iraq in the application of its mandate;
- welcomed the progress made;
- encouraged intensified efforts, in line with the conclusions of the emergency session, to implement UNSCOM and IAEA mandates;
- acknowledged that, as Iraq complied with its obligations and the Council agreed, UNSCOM and the IAEA would make the transition from inspections to monitoring; and
- urged Member States to respond positively to UNSCOM requests for additional personnel, equipment and information.[166]

428. Mr Butler, accompanied by his Deputy, Mr Charles Duelfer, and Commissioners from France, Russia and the UK, held talks to discuss the implementation of the mandate set out in the Presidential Statement of 3 December with an Iraqi delegation led by Mr Tariq Aziz.[167]

429. Mr Butler reported that discussions on access for inspections had addressed five categories of sites identified by Iraq:

[166] UN Security Council, '3838th Meeting Wednesday 3 December 1997' (S/PV.3838).
[167] UN Security Council, 17 December 1997, 'Letter dated 17 December 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) addressed to the President of the Council' (S/1997/987).

- Normal – which could be visited without restriction.
- National Security – where the modalities for inspections of sensitive sites would apply, "except for the most secret rooms … to which no access would be granted". Mr Aziz had agreed to an improvement of the arrangements, including that:
  - The size of the inspection team would be proportionate to the size and complexity of the site and agreed on a case-by-case basis.
  - Iraq would take steps significantly to reduce the delay in entry.
  - Immediately a site was declared sensitive, the Chief Inspector and an Iraqi minder could enter to ensure that movement was frozen and that documents would not be burnt or destroyed.
- Presidential and sovereign – in relation to which Iraq's "absolute" position was that inspections and overflights would not be allowed "under any circumstances", which Mr Butler doubted would be acceptable to the Security Council.
- Civilian sites/private residences – in which the Government had no authority and UNSCOM would need the owner's permission for inspections. Mr Butler expressed reservations about Iraq's position.
- Foreign – where UNSCOM would have to deal directly with the owners.[168]

430. Iraq asked again whether the U-2 surveillance flights could be replaced by Iraqi assets or those of another nation.

431. Iraq continued to state that it had "destroyed and/or no longer had any weapons of mass destruction" and had proposed technical "seminars" to address disagreement on issues of substance. Mr Aziz had stated "for the public record" that the Government of Iraq had decided in 1991 to "deny and obliterate traces of its biological weapons programme" on the grounds of "national security and survival".

432. Iraq had declined UNSCOM's invitation to develop an additional joint work programme, but agreed to technical evaluation meetings on missile warheads and VX in January, with a meeting on biological weapons to follow "as soon as practicable".

433. The report confirmed that, where facilities had been visited, dual-use equipment had been returned and the Commission had found no evidence of proscribed activities.

434. In December 1997, the JIC noted that Iraq "may have retained hidden production equipment, agent and delivery systems" and that it "could … regenerate a significant offensive BW capability within months".[169]

[169] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898, page 48.

435. In a Statement by the President of the Security Council, issued after consultations on Mr Butler's report on 22 December, the Council reiterated its demand that Iraq co-operate fully with UNSCOM and allow inspection teams "immediate, unconditional access", and stated that any failure to do so would be "unacceptable and a clear violation of the relevant resolutions". The Council also acknowledged that discussions on the practical arrangements were continuing, reiterated its full support for the Commission and Mr Butler, and called on the Government of Iraq to co-operate fully.[170]

436. On 12 January 1998, the Government of Iraq announced that, on the basis of the nationalities present, a team would not be permitted to conduct further inspections in Iraq.[171]

437. On 14 January, the President of the Security Council issued a further statement deploring the Iraqi statement of 12 January and its "subsequent failure to fulfil its obligations to provide the Special Commission with full, unconditional, and immediate access to all sites". The Council determined that "failure" was "unacceptable and a clear violation of the relevant resolutions".[172]

438. The Council also:

- recalled its statement of 29 October 1997 condemning Iraq's decision to try to dictate the terms of its compliance with its obligations to co-operate with UNSCOM;
- reiterated its demand in resolution 1137 for co-operation;
- expressed its full support for the Special Commission and its Executive Chairman; and
- requested a "full briefing" from Mr Butler after his planned talks with Iraq so that it could "decide as necessary on the appropriate response".

439. On 15 January, the IAEA's report of its visit to Iraq in December was made available to the Security Council.[173] The purpose of the visit had been to clarify five points identified in paragraph 75 of the earlier report, specifically:

- "… information provided by Iraq in respect of its post-war procurement procedures will contribute to the ability of IAEA to identify actions that might indicate Iraq's clandestine procurement of proscribed or dual-use equipment and materials."
- "The specification of the scope and content for the summary of the technical achievements of Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme that IAEA handed to the Iraqi counterpart should facilitate the production by Iraq of a document that will provide further assurance that the technically coherent picture of Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme is comprehensive."

- It had not been possible to verify Iraq's statement in relation to a specific instance of external assistance offered to its clandestine nuclear programme, or its statements regarding the "government committee" or of the actions attributed to Lt Gen Kamil.
- The IAEA had "no information that contradicts Iraq's statement that it had never identified nuclear weapon design options beyond those preliminary concepts described in its report", but ongoing monitoring would be based on the assumption that Iraq retained "the technical capability to exploit, for nuclear weapons purposes, any relevant material to which it might gain access".
- The IAEA intended to implement an aerial radiation survey in Iraq, based on Iraqi co-operation with the use of fixed-wing aircraft.

440. On 22 January, Mr Butler sent a report of his recent visit to Iraq to the President of the Security Council.[174]

441. During his visit, Iraq had proposed a three-month moratorium on any attempt by UNSCOM to visit Presidential and sensitive sites, pending completion of initial technical evaluation meetings.

442. Iraq also rejected a request to allow the Commission's fixed-wing aircraft to exercise their right to use airbases throughout Iraq. Mr Butler wrote:

> "I must remind the Security Council that full access is required not only for disarmament purposes but also in the context of ongoing monitoring and verification. Access relinquished now could be needed in important ways in the future."

Liberal interventionism

Sir Christopher Meyer, British Ambassador to the US from 1997 to 2003, drew the Inquiry's attention to a speech made by Mr Blair in January 1998 in which he said:

> "We have a clear responsibility in the interests of long term peace in the world to stop Saddam Hussein from defying the judgement of the world's community. He must be either persuaded by diplomacy or made by force to yield up his long cherished ambition to develop nuclear, chemical and biological weapons; weapons which threaten not only his immediate neighbours in the Middle East, but pose a direct and fundamental challenge to world peace.

[174] UN Security Council, 22 January 1998, 'Report of the visit to Baghdad from 19 January to 21 January 1998 by the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Security Council under paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991)' (S/1998/58).

> "All our experience of him teaches us that it is sometimes hard to succeed with him via diplomacy, but one thing is for sure: diplomacy stands no chance of success at all unless he knows that if he fails to listen to reason, we have the force to back it up."[175]

In his press conference on 20 December 1998, Mr Blair said:

> "… the patience of the international community cannot be tried indefinitely … when it is right and when the will of the international community is at stake we will act to enforce it because the first stirrings of a new global reality are upon us. Those who abuse force to wage war must be confronted by those willing to use force to maintain peace, otherwise the simple truth is that war becomes more likely. We cannot do everything, that is true, but what we can do reasonably we should do."[176]

443. Lord Wilson of Dinton, Cabinet Secretary from 1998 to 2002, told the Inquiry that between January 1998 and January 1999 he had attended and noted 21 Ministerial discussions on Iraq; 10 in Cabinet, of which seven had "some substance"; five in the Defence and Overseas Policy Committee (DOP); and six ad hoc meetings, including one JIC briefing.[177]

444. Iraq was discussed in one of Lord Wilson's first Cabinet meetings on 28 January 1998.[178] Lord Wilson recalled that Mr Cook told his colleagues things which were "entirely recognisable four or five years later", namely:

> "… a serious situation is building; we would be ready to use force if necessary, because not being ready to use force would undermine our leverage over Saddam Hussein; and thirdly, the United States were clear that they had legal authority to take action whereas our legal advice was more nuanced."

445. Lord Wilson commented that those points could be transposed to March 2002.

446. The Cabinet Office has informed the Inquiry that there was no discussion of Iraq in DOP in 1999 or 2000, and that the four discussions in Cabinet in early 1999 (the last on 7 March) were confined to brief updates on the NFZs. There is no record of any Cabinet discussion of Iraq in 2000.[179]

447. In a joint press conference with Dr Albright on 31 January 1998, Mr Cook said:

> "No option is ruled out but the best prospect of us achieving a solution by diplomatic measures is to leave Saddam Hussein in no doubt about our resolve to win this struggle and no doubt in his mind that all options are open to us."[180]

448. Mr Alastair Campbell, Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy, wrote in his diary on 2 February:

> "Iraq was the main focus with the French and Russians trying to get a diplomatic solution, but TB was pretty clear where it was heading."[181]

449. The Butler Report stated that the JIC concluded on 4 February that:

> "UNSCOM and the IAEA have succeeded in destroying or controlling the vast majority of Saddam Hussein's 1991 weapons of mass destruction (WMD) programme."[182]

450. On the same date, Mr Campbell recorded: "We turned the factual briefing into a paper for the media showing the extent of Saddam's capability and the damage he could do."[183]

451. During Defence Questions on 9 February, Mr George Robertson, the Defence Secretary, told the House of Commons that he was making available new information on Iraq's chemical weapons capability at the time of the Gulf War, concerning "recently received intelligence that Iraq may have possessed large quantities of a chemical weapons agent known as Agent 15 since the 1980s".[184] Mr Robertson described Agent 15 as "a mental incapacitant".

452. Mr Campbell recorded that Mr Blair chaired the first meeting of the Iraq media management group on 16 February, and was "alarmed at how poor the FCO/MOD propaganda effort was".[185]

453. On 19 February, Mr Campbell recorded that Cabinet was "mainly Iraq and Ireland", and that Mr Blair said "it was not an option to do nothing. We either got the inspectors in or we had to take action." Mr Blair was concerned that "Saddam would pitch a response perfectly to Kofi … to get the French and Russians into a different position to the rest of us." That concern was also discussed in a call with President Bill Clinton on 22 February.

454. On 20 February, the Security Council adopted resolution 1153 (1998) which increased the size of the Oil-for-Food programme, "to avoid any further deterioration of the current humanitarian situation".[186] and undertook "to accord UNSCOM and the IAEA immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access".

456. The MOU contained details of special procedures for the inspection of the eight Presidential sites, including having diplomats, not just technical experts, in the inspection teams.[187]

457. Mr Annan wrote that Secretary Albright had travelled to New York on 22 February to set out "red lines" before he left for Baghdad. He had "had to remind her" of his role and that, as Secretary-General, he was "answerable to 191 other Member States" and that it was his "duty to seek peaceful resolution of disputes". His objective had been to give Saddam Hussein a ladder to climb down so that inspections could resume.

458. Mr Annan wrote that he considered it "critical" that Iraq was "given a sense of light at the end of the tunnel" as an incentive to co-operate with an inspections regime that required "a degree of scrutiny without precedent", and that the talk in Washington of never lifting sanctions was not helpful:

> "The United States and its allies were entitled to state this position as a matter of national interest. However, they could not expect to have a United Nations committed to the peaceful disarmament of Iraq to simply play along. Nor could they have been unaware that this gave Saddam the excuse to tell the rest of the world that the game was fixed no matter what he did. We need the inspections to work toward resolving the ongoing crisis in Iraq. Until then, the Gulf War would not truly be over."

459. In a statement to the House of Commons on 24 February, Mr Blair said the UN inspectors had found and destroyed "horrific amounts of chemical and biological weapons … despite systematic obstruction, deceit and concealment by Saddam Hussein". The crisis over access to Presidential palaces had "not been an artificial argument about some theoretical threat, but a reflection of real alarm … about the use of those sites to conceal both evidence and actual weapons".[188]

460. Mr Blair added:

> "We should never forget that if we do not stop Saddam Hussein acting in breach of his agreement on weapons of mass destruction, the losers will not just be those threatened by him, but the authority and standing of the UN itself …"[189]

461. In Mr Blair's view, "nothing else" apart from "effective diplomacy and firm willingness to use force" would have changed Saddam Hussein's mind and produced a signed agreement with the UN:

"Throughout the dispute, our aim has been a peaceful, diplomatic settlement. There was no desire on either side of the Atlantic to use force, but it was also clear to us throughout that Saddam Hussein only understands and respects force …

"… As Kofi Annan said in Baghdad: 'You can achieve much by diplomacy, but you can achieve a lot more when diplomacy is backed by firmness and force.'

"I would put it this way: with Saddam, diplomacy plus force equals success."[190]

462. Mr Blair concluded:

"Saddam Hussein has spent seven years playing for time, but has been thwarted by the resolve of the international community. It is now clearer than ever that his games have to stop once and for all. If they do not, the consequences should be clear to all."[191]

463. Mr Campbell recorded that, when Cabinet discussed Iraq on 26 February, Mr Cook said there were "really worrying signs about what UNSCOM can do. We were pursuing a twin track approach – light at the end of the tunnel on sanctions, allied to clear warnings if Saddam breaks the agreement."[192] Mr Blair said "he was assured by [President] Chirac he agrees the language makes clear military action will follow if Saddam breaks the agreement."

464. On 2 March, the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1154 (1998).[193] It:

- endorsed the MOU of 23 February and looked forward to its full implementation;
- stressed the need for Iraq to comply with its obligations to provide access to UNSCOM and the IAEA which was necessary for the implementation of resolution 687;
- stated that "any violation would have severest consequences for Iraq";
- reaffirmed its intention to act in accordance with the relevant provisions of resolution 687 on the duration of prohibitions (sanctions);
- noted that Iraq's failure to comply with the relevant obligations had delayed that action; and
- decided, "in accordance with its responsibility under the Charter, to remain actively seized of the matter, in order to ensure the implementation of this resolution, and to secure peace and security in the area".

465. It is clear from the statements in the Council meeting on 2 March, made before and after the vote, including from seven States who were not members of the Council, that there had been significant tensions about the Secretary-General's mission and the text of the draft resolution co-sponsored by the UK and Japan.[194] Tensions centred on the Security Council determining whether the use of force was appropriate and authorising such action, not individual Member States.

466. In his statement to the Council, Mr Annan stated that, in travelling to Baghdad to seek a peaceful solution to the crisis, he had acted to fulfil his:

> "… constitutional obligation under the United Nations Charter and … commitment to the General Assembly … a sacred, moral obligation and commitment to act, any time, anywhere, without seeking or accepting instructions from any Government, whenever that action may be helpful in reducing a grave threat to international peace and security."

467. Mr Annan added that Iraq's refusal to honour its commitments had constituted such a threat which had been averted by the agreement of 23 February. But the agreement would be "empty words unless both parties now implement it fully, fairly and without delay".

468. Iraq's "complete fulfilment" of those obligations was "the one and only aim" of the agreement, and "nothing more and nothing less" would make the completion of the disarmament process possible and "thus speed the lifting of sanctions".

469. The agreement was also a call for the UN to look to the future and its "inherent obligation to remember that even the bitterest of enmities among nations do not last for ever".

470. Mr Annan said that the agreement was also a reminder of why the UN had been established:

> "… to prevent the outbreak of unnecessary conflict when the will of the international community can be achieved through diplomacy; to seek and find international solutions to international problems; to obtain respect for international law and agreements from a recalcitrant party without destroying for ever that party's dignity and willingness to co-operate; to secure, in this case, through on-site inspections and negotiations, the assured destruction of weapons of mass destruction that aerial bombardment can never achieve."

471. In conclusion, Mr Annan pledged "to strive, to seek to find and not to yield" in the fulfilment of his duty.

472. Sir John Weston described the crisis which had led to Mr Annan's "last ditch effort to find a diplomatic solution" as "just the latest and the most serious in a series of Iraqi provocations". His success was "not a success for diplomacy alone but a success for diplomacy firmly backed by the willingness to use force if diplomacy should fail", and no one could "seriously imagine" the same result without that.

473. Sir John said that there were two important messages in the resolution:

- Iraq was obliged to provide access at all sites, "not just in the eight so-called Presidential sites which have up to now been the pretext for so much delay and obstruction".
- The Iraqi regime had a choice. If it fulfilled its commitments, the way would "be open for the lifting of sanctions"; but if it failed to comply, that would "not be tolerated". The Council was "determined that any violation will result in the severest consequences".

474. Sir John concluded that, if Iraq doubted the will of the international community, it would:

> "… not for the first time, be making a grave mistake.
> "There is a great need at such moments to face up with courage and intellectual honesty to unpalatable truths. Regional security, the future of non-proliferation under international auspices, and the authority of the United Nations and its Secretary-General are all involved, and are all at stake, in our collective efforts to get the case of Iraq right."

475. Welcoming Mr Annan's success and the text of the draft resolution, Mr Fernando Berrocal Soto, Costa Rican Permanent Representative to the UN, emphasised the "key concept of international legality and the primacy of the provisions of the Charter over any political considerations". Bringing the MOU agreed on 23 February into the legal framework authorised by Chapter VII left "no political or legal doubt whatsoever about the seriousness and gravity of this warning by the Security Council". The "prerogatives and legal competences" were "exclusively of the Security Council" and could not be delegated.

476. Mr Celso Amorim, Brazilian Permanent Representative to the UN, referred to the strain the crisis had placed on a multilateral system "still learning to cope with the challenges of the post-cold-war era" and the Security Council's wisdom in encouraging the Secretary-General to "undertake a personal mission". Mr Annan had "succeeded in a mission that sceptics had considered doomed from the start"; and his "determination … to keep this matter under his close personal supervision … provides the Security Council with a fair chance to put the problem of the relations between Iraq and the United Nations on a more stable foundation".

477. Mr Amorim also pointed out that, in resolution 687, the Security Council had decided "to take such further steps as may be required for the implementation of the present resolution", rather than the "ritual formula" of deciding to "remain seized of the matter". As a result, he concluded that:

> "Only the Security Council has the authority to determine if, when and under what conditions the formal cease-fire it declared on 3 April 1991 holds or not."

478. Mr Amorim added that members of the Council had been "assured by its sponsors" that they did not intend the draft resolution "to imply any automaticity in the authorisation of the use of force in case of a possible violation by Iraq". Brazil was satisfied that nothing in the resolution delegated the "authority" that belonged to the Security Council.

479. Mr Hans Dahlgren, Swedish Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that it was "very important" that the Council's responsibility for international peace and security was "not circumvented", and that the last paragraph of the draft resolution was "an expression of the need to safeguard this responsibility".

480. Mr Hisashi Owada, Japanese Permanent Representative to the UN, emphasised that paragraph 3 of the resolution reflected the Council's wish "to register its firm resolve that violation …. would have the severest consequences for Iraq" but that it was "not meant to address the issue of so-called automaticity"; the draft resolution was "not designed to prejudge the issues of the future".

481. Mr Qin Huasun stated that China greatly appreciated "the wise decision made by the Secretary-General at the critical juncture between war and peace" and that it supported his diplomatic efforts. He added:

> "The situation in the Gulf region is complex and sensitive. If it is dealt with appropriately there will be peace. Any imprudence, however, may trigger a war, which is in no one's interest … We are not in favour of resorting to or threatening to use force … It would only cause heavy civilian casualties and possibly even more severe consequences."

482. Mr Qin Huasun added that the Chinese delegation had "repeatedly and unambiguously demanded that the draft resolution should contain no automatic authorisation of the use of force against Iraq". He had "listened very carefully to the explanations offered by the sponsors of the draft resolution", but they had not eliminated his "misgivings about the possible abuse of the draft resolution".

483. Mr Qin Huasun stressed that adoption of the resolution would:

> "… in no way mean that the Security Council is automatically authorising any State to use force against Iraq. The Council cannot and should not prejudge whether Iraq will violate its resolutions; even less should the Council predetermine the course of future action. The Security Council can make judgements and decisions only on the basis of prevailing circumstances."

484. Mr Qin Huasun concluded that Iraq was "a sovereign State and its sovereignty, dignity and legitimate security concerns should also be respected". The Security Council should "make a timely and objective assessment of Iraq's implementation of its resolutions". China hoped that UNSCOM would "complete its task of verification and the destruction of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction at an early date, so that steps can be taken to lift the sanctions against Iraq at the earliest possible date".

485. Mr Dejammet welcomed the draft resolution and the confirmation of the authority of the MOU. The resolution addressed a serious warning to Iraq about complying with its obligations, but it also underscored "the prerogatives of the Security Council in a way that excludes any question of automaticity". It was:

> "… the Security Council that must evaluate the behaviour of a country, if necessary to determine any possible violations, and to take the appropriate decisions."

486. Mr Dejammet concluded by paying tribute to Mr Annan's achievements, stating:

> "Nothing will be possible without the constant involvement of the Secretary-General in our work and in our deliberations."

487. Speaking after the vote, Ambassador Richardson stated that the US was "deeply grateful" to Mr Annan for his:

> "… courageous and diligent efforts. Through his diplomacy, backed by America's willingness to use force, he has achieved what could be, if implemented fully by Iraq, a breakthrough."

488. Ambassador Richardson also expressed scepticism about whether, "after six years of broken promises", Iraq would live up to its words or the Security Council's demands. The resolution provided "for a new beginning for Iraq"; but the "choice" was Iraq's.

489. Mr Lavrov stated that Russia had "unswervingly striven to bring about Iraq's complete fulfilment of its obligations", and that "the first step" would be to lift the oil embargo once all Iraq's "'disarmament dossier' issues have been dealt with and moved to the long-term-monitoring stage". As a result of Mr Annan's mission, there was "a real opportunity to speed up the process of achieving a comprehensive settlement".

490. Russia's main goals were:

> "… the need for full elimination of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, maintaining United Nations monitoring in this field and avoiding the extremely dangerous consequences for the entire region in the event of an uncontrolled development of the situation."

491. Mr Lavrov said that the resolution contained "a political warning to Iraq", "whereby new violations by that country will have extremely serious consequences", but:

> "At the same time, there has been full observance of the legal prerogatives of the Security Council … The resolution clearly states that it is precisely the Security Council which will directly ensure its implementation, including the adoption of appropriate decisions. Therefore, any hint of automaticity with regard to the application of force has been excluded; that would not be acceptable for the majority of the Council's members."

492. Argentina, Egypt, Kuwait, Malaysia, Mexico, Pakistan and Peru all asked to participate in the discussion. With the exception of Kuwait, the statements focused on the peaceful resolution of disputes as opposed to the use of force and their concerns about the adverse consequences of military action for the people of Iraq, and for peace and security in the region.

493. Kuwait welcomed Mr Annan's achievements but asked the Security Council to attach the same importance to Kuwaiti issues, including the destiny of the detainees and prisoners taken by Iraq in 1990-1991 who constituted one percent of the population of Iraq, as it had attached to saving others in the region from the threat from weapons of mass destruction.

494. On 5 March, UNSCOM inspectors returned to Iraq and successfully carried out a number of site inspections.[195] A baseline survey of the eight Presidential sites by a team including senior diplomats was successfully carried out between 25 March and 4 April.

495. During a visit by Mr Blair to Paris on 24 March, Mr Campbell recorded that, on Iraq, Mr Blair and President Jacques Chirac were "in very different places, TB claiming a success for diplomacy backed by force, Chirac basically saying we were killing children through sanctions".[196]

496. In his report of 3 April, Mr Butler set out UNSCOM's responsibility for reporting whether Iraq had met the requirements set out in paragraphs 8 to 10 of resolution 687, and that those reports were the "sole criteria" for assessing Iraq's actions to provide the basis for a Council decision on lifting the provisions of paragraph 22 prohibiting the imports of commodities and products originating in Iraq.[197]

497. Describing them as the "indispensible context" for the Council's consideration of Iraq's compliance, Mr Butler set out:

- "Iraq's claim that it has no more prohibited weapons 'in the control of the Government of Iraq, in the territory of Iraq'"; and that it had "made available … all that is necessary to enable the Commission to verify that claim and that nothing further, of substance, will be made available by Iraq.
- Iraq's claim, which it had not been possible for the Commission to verify, did not "satisfy the three step system the Council established in order to enable Iraq to fulfil its obligations". Those steps, which were "not separable" were:
    - full declaration by Iraq;

[195] UN Security Council, 16 April 1998, 'Report of the Executive Chairman on the activities of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991)' (S/1998/332).
[196] Campbell A & Stott R. The Blair Years: Extracts from the Alastair Campbell Diaries. Hutchinson, 2007.
[197] UN Security Council, 16 April 1998, 'Report of the Executive Chairman on the activities of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991)' (S/1998/332).

    - verification by the Commission; and - destruction, removal or rendering harmless under international supervision.
- Iraq's "consistent refusal" to provide "the information and materials needed to verify its claim, clearly fails to satisfy the second step"; and that made the third step "impossible".
- This "difficult circumstance" had been made "even more complicated by Iraq's claim that it has unilaterally destroyed those prohibited weapons which were not destroyed under international supervision"; and the Commission's inability to verify "all" those claims.
- Mr Aziz's view was that UNSCOM's "lack of technical competence and bias against Iraq" was the "main reason" why Iraq's claim was not accepted.
- The Commission's view was that Iraq's "basic declarations of its holdings and capabilities in prohibited weapons areas" had "never been 'full, final or complete'", and that Iraq's failure to "fill in the gaps" in its declarations and "acts of unilateral destruction" had "significantly obfuscated the situation".

498. Addressing the standard of verification needed for credible reports to the Council under paragraph 22 of resolution 687, Mr Butler stated that:

- where prohibited weapons had existed, UNSCOM "must be able to verify positively that they have been destroyed, removed or rendered harmless"; and
- where items and facilities for the potential production of such weapons existed, UNSCOM "must be able to verify negatively that prohibited weapons are not being created".

499. The remainder of the report set out UNSCOM's concerns about lack of substantive progress on the priority issues set out in its previous report, including concerns about the impact of the technical evaluation meetings requested by Iraq, which were attributed to Iraq's failure to deliver the information and documents requested.

500. In three areas, new concerns had arisen:

- Following Iraq's insistence that it was not necessary to account for all extant munitions on the grounds that any CW agent would have degraded to an inert state, analysis of four 155mm artillery shells "filled with mustard of the highest quality", showed that they "could be stored for decades without any loss of quality".
- In March 1998, the Commission had discovered a document, dated 1994, which "indicated the existence, at a site monitored by … [a] missile monitoring team, of a programme for the manufacture of nozzles for spray dryers to be delivered to Al Hakam, Iraq's principal biological weapons production facility".
- Also in March 1998, the Commission discovered documents, dated 1993, that reflected a systematic attempt to deceive the Commission at that time, contrary to Iraq's claim that it had ended its concealment activities in 1991 and dismantled its concealment mechanisms. This underscored "the importance of continued vigilance and activity … on the issue of concealment".

501. Mr Butler also expressed concern about the dangers of producing a list for action by Iraq, on the grounds that it was "not unreasonable to consider that Iraq might take action to satisfy that list positively" but not address any issues the Commission did not know about. This would "effectively transfer the onus of establishing the basic facts from Iraq to the Commission". The Commission's list "would become the standard of proof, not Iraq's … compliance with the resolutions and decisions of the Council".

502. Mr Butler concluded that:

> "Iraq's heightened policy of disarmament by declaration, no matter how vigorously pursued or stridently voiced, cannot remove the need for verification as the key means through which the credibility of its claim can be established."

503. On 7 April, Dr Mohamed ElBaradei, Director General of the IAEA, submitted his first report to the Security Council on Iraq. He stated that there were no indications of prohibited activities at any of the sites inspected by the IAEA and that all equipment and materials which had been moved by Iraq had been returned to their former locations. Initial inspections of the designated "Presidential sites" had "revealed no immediate indications" of prohibited materials, equipment or activities.[198]

504. Dr ElBaradei reported that the IAEA had "no independently verifiable information" to verify Iraqi claims that:

- Lt Gen Kamil had taken actions on the nuclear programme that were "independent, unauthorized and without the knowledge of the Government of Iraq".
- It had not followed up any offer of foreign assistance to its nuclear programme other than the declared foreign assistance to its centrifuge programme.
- The "high governmental committee", which had initially been described as having been established in June 1991 and headed by Mr Aziz, "had not, in fact, been an established entity".

505. Dr ElBaradei also reported that Iraq had "satisfactorily completed its undertaking to produce a consolidated version of its full, final and complete declaration of its clandestine nuclear programme" and "fulfilled its obligation to produce … a summary of the technical achievements". The latter document was regarded as "consistent with" the "picture" of the programme developed by the IAEA.

[198] UN Security Council, 9 April 1998, 'Letter dated 7 April 1998 from the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency addressed to the Secretary-General' (S/1998/312).

506. Following consultations between the members of the Security Council on the UNSCOM and IAEA reports, the President issued a statement on behalf of the Council on 14 May which:

- welcomed the improved access for UNSCOM and the IAEA;
- expressed the hope that the Government of Iraq's agreement to fulfil its obligations would "reflect a new Iraqi spirit with regard to providing accurate and detailed information in all areas of concern";
- expressed concern that the reports indicated that Iraq had "not provided full disclosure in a number of critical areas, in spite of repeated requests from the Special Commission";
- noted that discharge of UNSCOM and the IAEA's mandates required full co-operation from Iraq, "including fulfilment by Iraq of its obligations to provide full, final and complete declarations of all aspects of its prohibited programmes";
- noted that the IAEA's investigations over several years had "yielded a technically coherent picture of Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme, although Iraq has not supplied full responses to all of the questions and concerns of the IAEA", including enacting penal laws on prohibited activities and whether any Government document existed recording a government-level decision to abandon the nuclear programme; and
- affirmed its intention "upon receipt of a report (in October) from the Director General of the IAEA stating that the necessary technical and substantive clarifications have been made, including provision by Iraq of the necessary responses to all IAEA questions and concerns", to adopt a resolution agreeing that the IAEA should dedicate its resources to ongoing monitoring and verification.[199]

507. Mr Ekéus explained to the Inquiry that he had had "little belief" that Saddam Hussein would have been attracted by the idea of keeping WMD sensitive material in his private residence; and that events proved this assumption was correct.[200]

508. In response to a meeting of the Security Council on 27 April at which sanctions had been discussed, Mr Al-Sahaf forwarded an open letter from Iraq's Revolution Command Council and the leadership of the Iraqi branch of the Arab Socialist Ba'ath Party complaining about the injustice of continued sanctions.[201] It asserted that the purpose of sanctions was to "hurt the Iraqi people and to force the Security Council to remain the pawn of a single member [the US], assisted by the old imperialist devil, the English policeman". The letter also complained about "unfounded accusations and blatant lies" in Mr Butler's reports to the Council.

509. Following informal discussions in the Security Council on 27 April in which Iraq's compliance with resolution 1137 was raised, Mr Butler reported to the Council on 6 May that, since the MOU of 23 February:

- Iraq had "granted unrestricted and unconditional access" to all sites UNSCOM had wished to inspect and also granted unrestricted access to equipment.
- The issue of access to means of transportation and to officials UNSCOM wished to interview had "not arisen".
- Mr Butler hoped that Iraq would provide the records UNSCOM had requested.[202]

510. Mr Butler stated that, "under the circumstances", the requirements of resolution 1137 were being "sufficiently implemented" to allow travel restrictions to be lifted.

511. On 1 May, the President of the Security Council provided members with a letter written to him by Mr Al-Sahaf, which said:

> "The fact that, after eight years, the sanctions against Iraq have not been lifted demonstrates the Security Council's lack of impartiality in dealing with this matter. The Security Council has failed to discharge its responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations, whereas Iraq has satisfied all the requirements and conditions set forth in Security Council resolution 687 (1991), section C. The Security Council must now do its part, meeting its obligations towards Iraq by implementing resolution 687 (1991), paragraph 22, without further delay."[203]

512. An UNSCOM "informal paper" providing a "statement of specific tasks and information" which would need to be completed and verified before a report could be made, pursuant to resolution 687 (1991), that Iraq had completed the disarmament actions required, was presented to the Security Council on 4 June.[204] In addition, the Commission would need to conclude that Iraq had ceased concealment of proscribed programmes.

513. The tasks included:

- Completion of a "material balance" for:
  - missile warheads;
  - "special munitions", including 155mm mustard shells and R-400 chemical/biological aerial bombs;

    - major components used for the indigenous production of missiles;
    - chemical weapons production equipment; and
    - acquisition, production and destruction of materials and equipment, agents and munitions for biological weapons.
- Provision of information and documents relating to:
    - production, filling and deployment of special missile warheads;
    - Iraq's declarations on VX;
    - use and status of equipment evacuated from chemical weapons facilities before the adoption of resolution 687; and
    - destruction of missile propellants.

514. On 16 June, following a visit to Baghdad, Mr Butler reported that, although Mr Aziz did not accept all the tasks listed in the UNSCOM paper were disarmament issues, they had agreed a schedule of work to be carried out over two months to "try to resolve the outstanding disarmament issues".[205] Mr Butler described the talks as "cordial and professional", reflecting "the new spirit of co-operation between both sides" following the signature of the MOU on 23 February. If Iraq met its undertakings to provide full co-operation, it "should be possible for the Commission to resolve remaining issues and begin to formulate reports … pursuant to paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991)".

515. It is clear from the detailed record of the discussions, however, that there were still significant differences between UNSCOM and Iraq.

516. During the talks, Mr Aziz challenged UNSCOM's pursuit of "many trivial matters not related to disarmament": "Iraq had destroyed its proscribed weapons, and the details were unimportant."

517. Mr Aziz also stated that Iraq:

- had not achieved the capability indigenously to produce engines and gyroscopes for proscribed missiles and, therefore, "accounting fully for such components was unnecessary";
- would not clarify the extent of its attempts to produce VX: the issue was "closed" and Iraq was only ready to discuss the evidence available to UNSCOM of incorrect declarations;
- had already presented all the evidence available on biological weapons and no additional information or documentation would be provided; and
- refused to provide access to one document previously seen by the UNSCOM on the grounds that it was unrelated to its work.

[205] UN Security Council, 17 June 1998, 'Report by the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991), on his mission to Baghdad, 11-15 June 1998' (S/1998/529).

518. UNSCOM made clear it did not accept those positions, stressing the "particular importance" of trying "to verify the total amount of proscribed weapons produced by Iraq" and a shift in methodology in the biological weapons area to focus on munitions.

519. The report also stated that Iraq had been informed that France was initiating additional aerial surveillance and further capability was being discussed with Russia, but that this activity would complement the U-2 flights not replace them as requested by Iraq.

520. Mr Butler and Mr Aziz agreed that the results of the work programme should be assessed during their next round of talks, to be held in Baghdad during the second week of August. Mr Aziz declined Mr Butler's invitation to hold a special meeting to discuss concealment activities.

521. UNSCOM later described the method it had used as focusing:

> "… on unaccounted proscribed weapons and to set aside other aspects such as fully verifying production capacities, research activities, etc. Satisfactory resolution of the specific 'priority issues would make it easier to conclude that other unverified elements were of lesser substantive importance. Conversely, the inability of Iraq to satisfy these issues would point to more ominous explanations for other unverified parts of Iraq's declarations. Whether these other parts will ultimately be addressed is an open question, but one which has a direct bearing upon confidence in future monitoring."[206]

522. This approach became the method for establishing whether an "acceptable material balance" could be produced for weapons within UNSCOM's remit.

523. The Butler Report records that there were two meetings between UK officials and UNSCOM representatives, including Col Ritter, in May and June 1998 at which discussions took place about how to make public the traces of VX which had been discovered on missile warheads.[207] A Secret Intelligence Service (SIS) operation, "Operation Mass Appeal" was set up for that purpose, but was abandoned after the UNSCOM report was leaked to the press in Washington.

524. On 17 July, in a speech marking the thirtieth anniversary of the 1968 Iraqi revolution, Saddam Hussein drew attention to the letter to the Security Council of 1 May, which he described as "not just a protest cry", but evidence of "a will and alternative strategy" if "other means and methods" failed "to return life to its natural track".[208]

525. On 18 July, a document relating to expenditure of four types of "special" munitions, a term which denoted chemical and biological agent delivery, was discovered during an inspection of the headquarters of the Iraqi Air Force.[209] UNSCOM was not allowed to copy or remove the document but it was agreed that it would be jointly sealed and stored in the custody of Iraq's National Monitoring Directorate.

526. In a letter to Mr Butler on 23 July, Mr Aziz wrote that the meetings of biological experts in Baghdad on 17 to 22 July had not succeeded in "closing the gaps between the two sides". Iraq deemed it "highly important to devote sufficient time to this issue during our next meeting … to be able to study it intensively from the political and technical angles". That might require a longer visit than planned and the participation of the largest possible number of experts.[210]

527. Mr Butler responded on 24 July that he had not yet seen the Chief Inspector's report of the meetings but:

- He had "a problem with the notion of 'gaps' between the two sides because it, fundamentally, misrepresents both the nature of the relationship" between UNSCOM and Iraq and the terms of reference for the meetings in Baghdad. The relationship was that "Iraq should declare in full and truthfully all relevant proscribed programmes" and UNSCOM "should seek to verify those declarations".
- Describing UNSCOM's inability to carry out its work as "a mere 'gap'" departed "very far from the fact of the inadequacy of Iraq's past declarations".
- The proposal was similar to one Mr Aziz had made in June, when Mr Butler had made clear that the issue was "establishing facts, not of negotiation between two positions".
- If the team's report was "unsatisfactory", they would "need to analyse why". But it was "premature … to conclude that political level discussions … would correct a problem which has been long-standing, repeatedly addressed and has always rested on the failure of Iraq to provide concrete and verifiable technical information".
- UNSCOM's "firm position" continued to be that resolution of the biological weapons issues could "be accomplished with the provision of further documents and other verifiable information" which Iraq possessed.[211]

528. UNSCOM subsequently reported that its team had concluded that none of the components of the material balance for biological weapons could be verified.[212]

529. As requested in the Presidential Statement of 14 May, Dr ElBaradei submitted an "interim status report" on 27 July.[213] The report contained little new information, although it did state that Iraq had been unable to locate any additional documents about the decision to abandon the nuclear programme.

530. In addition, Dr ElBaradei reported that Mr Aziz had reiterated that Iraq's programme of declarations and unilateral destruction had been "an undocumented ad hoc progression of activities undertaken in reaction to events"; and he had stated "unequivocally" that "no Government decree existed which formalised Iraq's abandonment of its nuclear programme". Mr Aziz had added that, "had such a decree existed, it would clearly have been in the best interests of Iraq to make it available to the IAEA".

531. Dr ElBaradei observed:

> "It is perhaps of little practical significance whether a so-called 'high government committee' was formally constituted or was … an ad hoc group of varying composition brought together to deal with problems as they arose."

532. In relation to the actions attributed by Iraq to Lt Gen Kamil, Dr ElBaradei added that it was "beyond debate that concealment of components of Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme continued until at least August 1995", and it remained "difficult for IAEA to distinguish the actions of such a senior Government official from that of the Government itself".

533. Dr ElBaradei also reiterated the importance, given the inherent uncertainties arising from a verification process with the aim of proving the absence of readily concealable items, of continuing intrusive inspections as part of the ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's activities. This was necessary to "provide a significant probability of detecting prohibited equipment, materials or activities at other locations" as well as assurance of the absence of those items at routinely inspected locations.

534. After its visit to Iraq in April 1998, the IAEA reported that it had "found no indications that Iraq has retained the physical capability – in terms of hardware and facilities – to produce weapons-usable nuclear material. Nor are there any indications of Iraq having achieved its programme goal of producing nuclear weapons".[214] The IAEA could not provide assurances that there were no "readily concealable items such as components of centrifuge machines". In addition, because of the progress that it had made in weaponisation technologies before 1991 and the existence of a "cadre of experienced personnel who were employed in the clandestine nuclear programmes", Iraq had the "knowledge and the technical capability to exploit, for nuclear weapons purposes, any relevant materials or technology to which it may gain access in the future".

535. Sir Jeremy Greenstock, UK Permanent Representative to the UN in New York from July 1998 to 2003, told the Inquiry that in July/August 1998, the Security Council had been:

> "… close to agreeing that Iraq was no longer pursuing nuclear weapons capability, but the United States blocked a certification of that status because Saddam Hussein had not fulfilled absolutely all the detailed requirements. The chemical, biological and missile development files were left open."[215]

536. The Strategic Defence Review, published in July 1998, stated that "Saddam Hussein's Iraq" represented a "continuing threat"; and that:

> "The size of the military forces available and the presence and potential spread of ballistic missiles, chemical and biological weapons and even nuclear weapons add to the risks. These dangers seem unlikely to diminish and may grow."[216]

537. On 30 July, the Iraqi leadership made a statement which set out concerns about the deliberations on the "nuclear file" currently under way in the Security Council, "the arbitrary and aggressive position" of the US, and the "failure of the Security Council to adopt a fair and equitable resolution".[217]

538. The statement concluded that, "As a result of the way in which the nuclear file has been dealt with … and of the manoeuvres of the Special Commission", Iraq faced the prospect of the embargo continuing for "an unknown and unspecified period" and the Special Commission continuing to "destroy and squander" the property of Iraq. Iraq had agreed arrangements for access to Presidential sites with the UN Secretary-General with the objective of awakening "the conscience of the Security Council and the international community regarding the facts", and that it would lead to the lifting of the embargo. But there had not been "any perceptible result".

539. The statement declared Iraq's intention to "call for a comprehensive national debate … and on the position that should be adopted" in the near future; and that the forthcoming meeting with the Special Commission would be "an essential indication" of its attitude.

540. During his visit to Baghdad in early August to assess implementation of the work schedule agreed in June, Mr Butler had also proposed to address substantive issues outside the agreed work programme, including VX, concealment and the implications of the document found on 18 July, and to propose a further programme of intensive work "directed at bringing [the] remaining issues in the missile and chemical weapons areas to closure" before UNSCOM's next report to the Security Council in October.[218]

541. Mr Aziz had rejected both proposals and "insisted" that he should immediately report to the Security Council that "there were no more proscribed weapons and [related] materials in Iraq".

542. Mr Aziz also stated that Iraq would "never" give UNSCOM the document found on 18 July and, since Mr Butler was not prepared to report immediately that Iraq was in compliance with its obligations, engaging further with the programme would be "useless". As a result, the discussions were terminated. Mr Butler reported:

> "Under the circumstances, I judged that the best course of action was to report immediately to the Council."

543. Mr Annan wrote that Iraq had "clearly taken a strategic decision to force the issue", demanding that UNSCOM should report Iraq had fully disarmed or lose the regime's co-operation.[219]

544. Mr Annan added that Mr Butler was:

> "… of course … not able to do this – but his position had been weakened further by increasing allegations, including from within UNSCOM itself, that the mission had been used by national intelligence agencies for information gathering un-related to its disarmament mission. The Iraqis seized on this and won support from Russia in denouncing UNSCOM, and Butler in particular as untrustworthy."

545. On 5 August, the Revolutionary Command Council and the Iraqi Regional Command of the Arab Ba'ath Socialist Party issued a statement recording the decision to suspend "co-operation with the Special Commission in its current form" and with the IAEA.[220]

546. The decision also:

- called on the Security Council to apply paragraph 22 of resolution 687 "as a first step on the road leading to the complete and total lifting of sanctions";

[220] UN Security Council, 14 August 1998, 'Statement issued by the Revolution Command Council and the Iraqi Regional Command of the Arab Ba'ath Socialist Party' (S/1998/718).

- requested the Security Council to re-establish the Special Commission, including:
  - creating a "new executive bureau to lead and direct all the activities and functions" of the Commission: it should comprise "an equal number of members who represent the nations that are Permanent Members of the Security Council", with the chairmanship of the bureau filled on a rotation basis. "Iraq should participate as an observer in the bureau's work";
  - restructuring the Commission's offices in New York, Bahrain and Baghdad on the same basis; and
  - moving the Commission's main office from New York to either Geneva or Vienna "to insulate it from the direct influence" of the US;
- stated that "The Security Council and all its members, particularly the Permanent Members, should observe – legally, politically and in practice – the resolutions of the Council which stipulate that the sovereignty of Iraq should be respected". They should also abide by the Charter of the UN and the 23 February MOU;
- stated that the Security Council should "call to account" members who violated those principles, including banning "flights over the northern and southern parts of Iraq by certain Permanent Members of the Council"; and
- stated that, to express "its good intentions" and its desire that "its decisions should be correctly interpreted and not tendentiously explained as non-compliance", Iraq would permit monitoring activities to continue provided that the individuals responsible strictly respected provisions of the 23 February MOU in relation to the sovereignty, security and dignity of Iraq.

547. Providing the context for its decision, Iraq stated that it had fulfilled all the obligations imposed on it in the hope that this would lead to the lifting of "unjust sanctions" but the US had:

> "… resorted to all ways and means to maintain the unjust sanctions … and to obstruct and prevent any action by the Security Council that would recognize what Iraq has achieved in fulfilling the requirements of the Security Council …"

548. Iraq stated that the Special Commission was "foremost" among the instruments used by the US, and that the US controlled its "leadership, activities and mode of operation". This had turned the Commission into a:

> "… disgraced instrument for implementing the criminal American policy against Iraq either by finding pretexts and fabricating crises with a view to maintaining the sanctions or by spying on Iraq and threatening its national security and sovereignty."

549. Iraq also stated that:

- The Commission continued "to fabricate false pretexts and to perpetuate its work indefinitely".

- The US had "committed flagrant and gross violations of Iraq's sovereignty and territorial integrity", including "imposing an illegal air siege" and openly declaring "criminal schemes against Iraq by allocating funds to finance illegal activities aimed at intervening in Iraq's internal affairs to commit acts of sabotage and terrorism".
- Since May 1998, Iraq had been calling on the Security Council, the Secretary-General and the international community to "adopt a fair and firm position".
- Iraq's "serious and sincere statements" had remained "unheeded" and the Special Commission had "refused to endorse officially the substantive facts about Iraq's compliance".
- The US had "rejected" the recent proposals to the Security Council to "move the nuclear item from the status of disarmament to that of monitoring".

550. Iraq concluded that the "current circumstances" confirmed that Iraq would "always be under siege regardless of what it does, and regardless of its fulfilment of the Security Council's requirements".

551. Mr Aziz forwarded the decision in a letter to the President of the Security Council on 5 August.[221]

552. Mr Aziz stated that the Special Commission:

> "… had refused to inform the Security Council of the substantive facts … Instead, the Special Commission has continued its old and well-known methods of concentrating on details of no value with respect to the requirements of section C of resolution 687 (1991). It has also continued with its methods of raising marginal issues, to confuse and mislead the Council and world public opinion into thinking that those issues are of some importance with respect to the requirements of disarmament. In addition, it has attempted to conjure up the crises and provocations which characterized the work of the Special Commission throughout the past years. The purpose of this was entirely clear, namely to perpetuate the embargo pursuant to the policy of the United States of America."

553. Mr Aziz set out in detail Iraq's position on UNSCOM's approach to the agreed work programme and his meeting with Mr Butler on 3 August. The points made by Mr Aziz included:

- The Special Commission teams discussing missiles had raised "trivial" or "marginal" additional questions, rather than focusing on the fact of the destruction of special warheads and Iraq's lack of success in producing engines and gyroscopes for ballistic missiles.
- Iraq had "proved that the material balance for R400 bombs was complete".

[221] UN Security Council, 14 August 1998, 'Letter dated 5 August 1998 from the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq addressed to the President of the Security Council' (S/1998/718).

- The missing 155mm shells were less than 5 percent of the total stock, and had been destroyed in early 1991 when a truck was set on fire. The remnants were still being investigated and they should not be regarded as a serious obstacle to closing the chemical file.
- The Special Commission could have found traces of VX, but there were a number of possible explanations which could be investigated. If Iraq had weaponised VX, there would have been "no reason why it should not declare this"; concealment would have been "a silly act".
- The Special Commission had, since 1996, "been giving a distorted and falsified picture of the biological programme" which "deliberately ignored the fundamental facts" and "raised lies and fabrications using intelligence methods in co-ordination with American parties".
- The biological weapons programme had been "newly established", had not been completed, and "remained without a specialised top management". Iraq had been unable to import any specialised equipment for the production of biological agents. Iraq had "destroyed this programme completely in 1991".
- Since 1995, monitoring teams had interviewed 256 personnel and carried out 1,048 inspections at 334 sites without finding any biological weapons or agents and had not found "any proof on the existence of biological activities, current or previous, in sites other than those declared by Iraq which were destroyed". 95 sites were still under "strict and very intrusive monitoring".
- Iraq had "accepted the sacrifice" involved in the destruction of the Al Hakam plant, including facilities for civilian purposes, "after the Special Commission promised … that … was the most important step for closing the biological file".
- When Iraq had given examples of the verification procedures adopted by the US individual in charge of the biological file to a delegation led by Mr Lakhdar Brahimi on 5 November 1997, they had produced "surprise and sarcasm".
- In the technical evaluation meetings in March and July, the Commission had pursued questions which "bore no relation to the fundamental questions of disarmament".
- In response to the "vicious circle created by the Special Commission", Mr Aziz had proposed on 23 July that he and Mr Butler should supervise the file, but his proposal had been rejected.

554. In the concluding section of his letter, Mr Aziz wrote that Iraq had raised the working methods of the Special Commission many times, and some measures had recently been taken, including the participation of experts from Permanent Members other than the US and UK, but:

- The "real situation" had "not changed", as the US and UK were "still leading all its activities and define all the discussions of the Special Commission".
- It was "well known" that the US and UK had "tendentious political objectives against Iraq".

- The Special Commission was "not prepared to tell the truth by announcing that the main task entrusted to it … has been completed".
- That was "an illegal" and "tendentious political position" which was "not based on any scientific or technical foundation".
- The US and UK had refused to acknowledge when there was a technical basis for closing a file and had "obstructed practically any step which the Security Council attempted to take in the direction of achieving justice and equity".
- That had happened in July in relation to the nuclear file.
- Iraq's warnings on 1 May, 17 July and 30 July had not been heeded.

555. Mr Annan wrote that he had been contacted by Secretary Albright and Mr Samuel (Sandy) Berger, the US National Security Advisor, who insisted that Iraq's stance was an attack on the UN and on Mr Annan's own position as it was his MOU that had been violated.[222] His response to the "standoff" was to propose "a comprehensive review of the UN's relationship with Iraq, including the role of UNSCOM". The US had opposed such a move on the grounds that it was "bargaining" with Saddam Hussein, but:

> "… the broader Council, including the UK, understood the value of engaging the Iraqis in a process whereby they would come back into compliance and we would set out on a path to a conclusion rather than permanent crisis."

556. On 11 August, Dr ElBaradei confirmed that, as a result of Iraq's decision, the IAEA was carrying out limited monitoring and verification tasks which fell "far short of full implementation of the OMV plan" and resulted in a "significantly reduced level of assurance" which could be provided for the Council.[223]

557. On 12 August, Mr Butler reported that Iraq's decision had brought "to a halt" all UNSCOM's disarmament activities, including discussions at the political and technical level, and monitoring activities were "limited to sites previously declared by Iraq or designated by the Commission". UNSCOM fully shared the IAEA's conclusions on the impact on its ability to provide assurance.[224]

558. The President of the Security Council responded to both letters on 18 August, stating that the members of the Council noted "with concern that Iraq's decision to suspend co-operation" prevented the IAEA and UNSCOM from carrying out the full range of its mandated activities and the "significantly reduced level of assurance".[225]

559. The initial reaction of the members of the Security Council was that Iraq's announcement was "totally unacceptable" and that it contravened the MOU signed on 23 February. They also noted "with regret that the announcement was made after a period of improved co-operation and achievement of some tangible results".

560. Members of the Council expressed their support for the IAEA and UNSCOM, and "for the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy". They emphasised the "need for an early resumption of dialogue" and that they would "be ready to respond favourably to future progress made in the disarmament process".

561. In a letter to Mr Aziz of 19 August, Mr Butler proposed that Iraq and UNSCOM should resume the full range of activities and that Iraq should confirm it would co-operate.[226] There was no formal response.

562. Following discussions in the Council on 1 September, Mr Butler provided briefing notes on:

- the discovery of VX degradation products and degradation products of VX stabilisers on warhead remnants;
- the material balance of special munitions; and
- "a change in the accounting of the weaponization of biological warfare agents".

563. On 3 September, Mr Butler briefed members of the Security Council on the current position, including three instances when Iraq blocked UNSCOM's monitoring.

RESOLUTION 1194 (1998)

564. On 9 September, the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1194 (1998), which:

- reiterated the points in the Presidential Statement of 18 August;
- reaffirmed its commitment to comprehensive implementation of its resolutions, in particular resolution 687;
- stressed the unacceptability of any attempts by Iraq to deny access to any site or to refuse to provide the necessary co-operation; and

- welcomed the Secretary-General's proposal for a comprehensive review and expressed "its readiness to consider, in a comprehensive review, Iraq's compliance with its obligations … once Iraq has rescinded its … decision and demonstrated that it is prepared to fulfil all its obligations".[227]

565. Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council:

- condemned Iraq's decision which was a "totally unacceptable contravention of its obligations";
- demanded that the decision should be rescinded and that Iraq should co-operate fully with its obligations and resume a dialogue with UNSCOM and the IAEA; and
- decided not to conduct the review of sanctions scheduled for October and not to conduct any further such reviews until Iraq had rescinded its decision and UNSCOM and the IAEA reported to the Council that they were "able to exercise the full range of activities provided for in their mandates, including inspections".

566. On 20 September, the JIC concluded that:

> "Some biological warfare (BW) production equipment, stocks of agents and even weapons are probably retained by Iraq."[228]

567. Mr Annan wrote that Sir Jeremy Greenstock, in his capacity as President of the Security Council, was authorised "by all members of the Council" to engage Mr Aziz on the terms proposed by Mr Annan but because of the "fundamental mistrust between Iraq and UNSCOM", the "standoff continued for another month".[229]

UNSCOM AND IAEA REPORTS, OCTOBER 1998

568. Mr Butler's consolidated UNSCOM report of 6 October rehearsed the developments over the preceding six months.[230]

569. Mr Butler reported that the outstanding issues in relation to missile warheads were:

- UNSCOM was "able to account for the destruction of between 43 and 45 of the 45 operational special warheads declared by Iraq as having been unilaterally destroyed". That was a "major accomplishment".
- The VX issue needed to be resolved.

[230] UN Security Council, 6 October 1998, 'Report of the Executive Chairman on the activities of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991)' (S/1198/920).

- UNSCOM had “arrived at an assessment … that Iraq’s declarations on the unilateral destruction of the special warheads did not match all the physical evidence”. Iraq was asked to discuss the issue on 3 August.
- UNSCOM and Iraq had been “able to identify jointly steps to clarify some of the problems related to Iraq’s actions of 1991 to hide special warheads”, but the effort was terminated by Iraq on 30 July when it refused to provide access to relevant sites or to discuss the issue any further.
- There were outstanding issues relating to the remnants of “some 50 conventional warheads … that have not been recovered”. Some 30 of those had been indigenously produced.

570. In relation to missiles, the outstanding issues were:

- Iraq’s missile force was in possession of seven indigenously produced missiles in 1991. Iraq maintained that they were training missiles which had been unilaterally destroyed, but no remnants of the missiles or their engines had been found.
- A team of international experts had assessed in July that, by the end of 1990, Iraq had the capability to assemble a limited number of engines for its indigenously produced proscribed missiles and Iraq should account for the key components from that programme. A “rough material balance” had been developed but additional verification work was recommended.
- Iraq had refused to address proscribed liquid missile propellants.
- Iraq continued its development of the Al Samoud missile system which had a declared range of less than 150km, but the issue of its reuse of Volga engines from surface to air missiles was “unresolved”.

571. In relation to chemical weapons, outstanding issues were:

- Iraq had provided “only preliminary information” on its investigation of the 550 missing 155mm shells filled with mustard.
- Accounting for about 500 of the 1,000 bombs unilaterally destroyed was “not possible owing to the state and extent of destruction”. UNSCOM wanted to verify the maximum number of R-400 aerial bombs to facilitate the final accounting for chemical bombs. The quantity and composition of biological bombs was still an issue.
- There were “serious discrepancies” between Iraq’s declarations and the report of its consumption of special munitions in the 1980s.
- UNSCOM’s view was that Iraq was “certainly able to produce VX, and probably produced it in quantity”. There was “significant doubt” about Iraq’s claim that it had not weaponised VX.
- Iraq had provided clarification of the production equipment removed from al-Muthanna in July 1998 but field verification had been “blocked” since 5 August.

572. In relation to biological weapons:

- UNSCOM had been unable to verify the production and destruction warheads for the Al Hussein missile. Iraq had declared that five warheads had been filled with anthrax and 16 with botulinum toxin. A week after the July meeting of experts in Baghdad, a senior Iraqi official had stated that there had been 16 warheads filled with anthrax and five filled with botulinum toxin. The "new explanation contradicted all accounts of the unilateral destruction of special warheads" provided over "the previous three years by Iraqi personnel directly involved in warhead filling and destruction activities".
- No evidence existed about the number of R-400 bombs filled with biological agent, and Iraq had provided "no consistent explanation" for the allocation of biological agents to weapons.
- Iraq had pursued the development of drop tanks for dissemination of biological agent "with the utmost vigour", but the team of international experts had assessed that Iraq's account of the project could not be verified.
- Iraq had modified commercial chemical insecticide equipment to develop aerosol generators to disseminate biological agents. A document submitted by Iraq reported successful testing of such devices in August 1998. Iraq had not accounted for the "final disposition" of the devices produced.
- The level of production of biological agents remained unverifiable, and it was not possible to determine if agents had been dried to enhance storage stability.
- The material balance of biological growth media acquired and consumed was "full of uncertainties".

573. Mr Butler stated that, after Lt Gen Kamil's departure from Iraq, UNSCOM had been "confronted with the fact that Iraq had successfully implemented concealment on a large scale". UNSCOM's understanding of Iraq's programmes had been achieved "largely through forensic methods". The verification of Iraq's declarations had been made "far more difficult than should have been the case" as a result of Iraq's:

- "policy and practice of concealment";
- "unilateral destruction" of weapons and related materials; and
- "repeated denial of the existence of relevant documents on proscribed activities, with the exception of those Iraq unilaterally chooses to provide".

574. UNSCOM also continued to find dual-use items and materials which should have been declared by Iraq.

575. The report stated that Iraq had rejected a request for a Russian AN-30 aerial surveillance aircraft and its support unit to be based at the Rasheed airbase on security grounds. The Commission had rejected an Iraqi suggestion that the aircraft be based at Habbaniyah, 120km from Baghdad.

576. Mr Butler concluded that:

- Disarmament of Iraq's proscribed missile and chemical weapons was "possibly near its end", but a "satisfactory resolution" of the questions on VX would be necessary.
- This was not the case for biological weapons where Iraq's declarations were "neither credible nor verifiable" and it had "failed to take" the opportunity to disclose its activities.
- Development of monitoring was "vital to the future", but Iraq was permitting activity "only at a less than satisfactory level". Monitoring would be particularly important if UNSCOM was unable to provide 100 per cent verification of items unilaterally destroyed by Iraq.
- Full disclosure of materials and information was the "crucial ingredient for both an end to the disarmament process and future monitoring". Iraq's demands that UNSCOM should prove that Iraq continued to possess prohibited weapons and associated capabilities would, if accepted, "reverse the onus of disclosure clearly placed on Iraq by the Security Council".

577. In his report of 7 October, Dr ElBaradei confirmed that there was no evidence or indications of prohibited activity at sites inspected before Iraq's decision of 5 August to cease co-operation.[231] There were still some difficulties, including Iraq's instructions that personnel should not respond to any questions about Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme, the quality of Iraq's declarations. Greater transparency "would contribute considerably to clarifying the few remaining questions and concerns".

578. These issues "would not of themselves prevent the full implementation" of the Agency's plan for ongoing monitoring and verification (OMV). That was:

> "… predicated on the assumption that Iraq has the knowledge and technical expertise to exploit, for nuclear weapons purposes, any relevant materials or technology to which it may gain access in the future. Nonetheless, it must be recognised that Iraq's direct acquisition of weapon-usable material would present a serious technical challenge to OMV measures, and great reliance must continue to be placed on international controls."

579. Following informal consultations in the Security Council on 13 October, Mr Butler submitted an experts' report of the findings from analysis of special missile warhead fragments excavated in Iraq to the President of the Security Council on 26 October.[232]

580. Mr Butler stated that he would also be giving the report to Iraq's Permanent Representative to the UN in New York, asking him to transmit it to the authorities in Baghdad. Mr Butler also wrote that the Commission would be willing "to resume work at the earliest possible moment with competent Iraqi authorities in order to address the questions posed by the report".

581. The report recommended that Iraq be invited to explain:

> "… the presence of degradation products of nerve agents … [T]he presence of compound known as VX stabiliser and its degradation product, and to provide more information on the Iraqi efforts during the period from mid-1998 to the end of 1990 to develop and produce VX by improved synthetic routes."[233]

Iraq and VX

Mr Butler's report included a report of a meeting of international experts on VX, held in New York on 22 and 23 October. The report revisited the sequence of events in relation to VX sampling as follows.

In April 1997, following Iraq's declaration of a VX production facility and a dump site where agent had been disposed of, samples of equipment and soil at the site, taken and analysed in the US, were found to contain VX degradation products as well as compounds known as VX stabiliser and its degradation products. This was confirmed in further analysis of samples from the same site in February 1998.

The US laboratory was also asked to analyse samples of 46 fragments from 45 "special warheads" to verify Iraq's declaration that 25 had been filled with biological agent and 20 with a mixture of "alcohols" (isopropanol and cyclohexanol).

In June 1998, the laboratory reported to UNSCOM that it had found chemicals similar to those found at the VX dump site.

In July 1998, UNSCOM asked the US laboratory to analyse samples from different fragments from the 20 warheads Iraq had declared had been filled with alcohols. No chemical warfare compounds were found, but degradation products from a decontamination compound were found in five samples. In addition "signatures of unidentified non-phosphorous compounds were found in many samples".

A French laboratory analysing samples from 40 different fragments from the same 20 warheads reported the presence of a degradation product from a "G- or V-" nerve agent in one sample.

A Swiss laboratory analysing samples from the same 40 fragments did not find any chemical-warfare-related chemicals.

Both the French and Swiss laboratories identified chemicals known to be the degradation products of a decontamination compound and found that a large number of the samples contained the same unidentified non-phosphorous compounds as the US laboratory had identified.

[233] UN Security Council, 26 October 1998, 'Report of the Group of International Experts on VX' (S/1998/995).

The French experts "noted that the decontaminant could also have been used for … chemical destruction of biological warfare agents".

There was "no obvious explanation" for the presence of compounds in the June/July samples which were "completely absent" from the April samples.

The US laboratory reported that it had re-evaluated all activities to confirm that no cross-contamination or other mistakes had occurred.

As a result of further French investigation, ethyl – and methyl – phosphoric compounds could no longer be confirmed in two samples.

582. After intensive consultations, a letter from the President of the Security Council to Mr Annan was agreed on 30 October, "describing the Council's initial views" on the proposed comprehensive review of Iraqi compliance in two phases: the first dedicated to disarmament and the second other requirements, including those relating to Kuwaiti missing persons and property.[234] The letter reflected a consensus that the assessment should be designed to lead to the definition of an agreed course of action and timetable which, if followed, would allow the Council to act.

583. On the evening of 31 October, the National Monitoring Directorate of Iraq (NMD) informed UNSCOM's representative in Baghdad that the Revolutionary Command Council and the Ba'ath Party had decided "to suspend, stop or cease all activities of the Special Commission, including monitoring".[235] Iraq made clear that it was not asking the monitoring teams to leave Iraq and its cameras and other equipment would remain in place. The IAEA would be allowed to continue its monitoring activities, provided they were independent of UNSCOM.

584. In a statement to the press on 31 October, the President of the Security Council reported that the members had "unanimously condemned" Iraq's decision and demanded that it should be rescinded "immediately and unconditionally".[236] Once Iraq had rescinded this decision, and its decision of 5 August to limit co-operation, the members of the Council remained ready "to implement a comprehensive review of Iraq's compliance".

585. The statement described Iraq's decision and the continuing restrictions on the work of the IAEA as "deeply disturbing". The Council would "remain actively seized of this matter, in order to ensure the full implementation of the relevant resolutions and secure peace and security in the region".

[236] UN Security Council Press Statement, 31 October 1998, 'Text: UNSC Condemns Iraq's decision on weapons inspectors'.

586. In response to a request from the Security Council, Mr Butler submitted a report on the consequences of Iraq's decision of 31 October, on 2 November.[237]

587. Mr Butler stated that Iraq's decisions of 5 August and 31 October made it "impossible for the Commission to implement its disarmament and monitoring rights and responsibilities" and that it was "not in a position to provide the Council with any level of assurance regarding Iraq's compliance with its obligations".

588. Mr Butler's report also confirmed that routine logistic and maintenance work had not been prohibited.

US policy: regime change in Iraq

On 26 January 1998, a Washington think tank, the Project for the New American Century, published an open letter to President Clinton calling for a stronger approach:

> "The only acceptable strategy is one that eliminates the possibility that Iraq will be able to use or threaten to use weapons of mass destruction. In the near term, this means a willingness to undertake military action as diplomacy is clearly failing. In the long term, it means removing Saddam Hussein and his regime from power."[238]

The 18 signatories included Mr Donald Rumsfeld, Mr Paul Wolfowitz, Mr John Bolton, Mr Richard Armitage and Mr Robert Zoellick, each of whom became prominent members of the administration of President George W Bush.

In February, a wider, bipartisan US group, the "Committee for Peace and Security in the Gulf", published a further open letter to President Clinton, which said:

> "For years, the United States has tried to remove Saddam by encouraging coups and internal conspiracies. These attempts have all failed … Saddam must be overpowered; he will not be brought down by a coup d'état … Iraq today is ripe for a broad-based insurrection."[239]

A bipartisan group of members of Congress drafted a bill, which made it the policy of the US to support efforts to remove the regime headed by Saddam Hussein from power in Iraq and to promote the emergence of a democratic government to replace that regime. It authorised expenditure of US$97m to provide military support to the Iraqi opposition. It was approved by the House of Representatives by 360 votes to 38, and unanimously by the Senate. It was signed into law by President Clinton on 31 October 1998 as the Iraq Liberation Act, and regime change in Iraq became the official policy of the US.

589. The Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1205 (1998), condemning Iraq's decision to cease co-operation with UNSCOM, on 5 November.[240]

590. The resolution:

- noted "with alarm" Iraq's decision to cease co-operation";
- stated that the Council was determined to ensure Iraq's "full compliance … without conditions or restrictions with its obligations under resolution 687 (1991) … and other relevant resolutions"; and
- reaffirmed the Council's "readiness to consider" Iraq's compliance in a "comprehensive review" once Iraq had "rescinded" its decisions of 5 August and 31 October and "demonstrated that it is prepared to fulfil all its obligations, including" the MOU of 23 February.[241]

591. Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council:

- condemned Iraq's decision to cease co-operation with UNSCOM "as a flagrant violation" of resolution 687 and other relevant resolutions;
- demanded that Iraq rescind its decisions of 5 August and 31 October;
- reaffirmed its full support for UNSCOM and the IAEA and their efforts to implement their mandates;
- expressed full support for the efforts of the Secretary-General to seek full implementation of the 23 February MOU;
- reaffirmed its intention to act in accordance with the relevant provisions of resolution 687 "on the duration of the prohibitions" in that resolution and noted that by failing to comply with its obligations, Iraq had "delayed the moment when the Council can do so"; and
- decided "in accordance with its primary responsibility under the Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security, to remain actively seized of the matter".

592. The record of the Security Council's discussion demonstrates the surprise and incomprehension which Iraq's decision caused amongst the members of the Council.

593. Russia and other members of the Council explicitly stated that the resolution did not authorise the use of force.

594. Mr Dejammet stated that the Security Council's decision demonstrated its unity and sent a firm message to Iraq in response to its "unacceptable and irrational" decision.[242] Iraq was "turning its back on the Council's clearly expressed intention to proceed without delay to a comprehensive review of the implementation of its resolutions as soon as the restrictions imposed … on 5 August were lifted".

595. Mr Danilo Türk, Slovenian Permanent Representative to the UN, described Iraq's reaction as "really astonishing":

> "While the Council was patiently moving towards meeting Iraqi concerns, Iraq chose to move in the opposite direction. It is difficult to understand the motives for this reaction. It is also difficult to see how this grave challenge to the Council's authority can result in anything other than a serious aggravation of the situation."

596. Mr Lavrov stated that Iraq's decision had "jeopardised the search of recent months for a solution to the Iraqi problem" and ran "counter to the agreements" reached with Mr Annan that Baghdad "would rescind its decision of 5 August and that the Security Council would conduct a comprehensive review", which had "opened the way to the lifting of sanctions on Iraq".

597. Mr Lavrov added:

> "The way to overcome this new crisis lies … exclusively in political and diplomatic efforts alongside the active role of the Secretary-General. Any attempt to resolve the problem by force would have highly unpredictable and dangerous consequences, both for the United Nations ability to continue to monitor proscribed military activity in Iraq and for peace and stability in the region and in the Middle East as a whole.
> "We are pleased to note that the draft resolution … seeks precisely a political solution … and contains no language that could be arbitrarily interpreted as some kind of permission to use force …
> "Without in any way attempting to justify Iraq's actions, I wish to stress the exceptional importance of total clarity with regard to the Security Council's intentions to implement its own resolutions. The draft resolution clearly reaffirms the Council's intention to take a decision on the current sanctions in accordance with the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991)."

598. Mr Antonio Monteiro, Portugese Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that Iraq's decision had been greeted with "dismay and incomprehension".

599. Mr Dahlgren stated that it was Sweden's "sincere hope" that Baghdad would not miss the "exit sign … for the route out of sanctions". He added that the final paragraph of the resolution reflected the "very important principle" that:

> "The Security Council's primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security … must not be circumvented. We see this paragraph as an expression of the desire of members to safeguard that responsibility."

600. Mr Amorim stated that Mr Annan's "possible concept of a comprehensive review" constituted a "thoughtful and balanced approach which could allow for progress" and that Brazil had learned of Iraq's decision "with a deep sense of dismay". He also drew attention to the "special importance" of the provisions in the resolution which stressed "that the Security Council will continue to be seized of this issue, in accordance with its primary responsibility … for the maintenance of international peace and security".

601. Mr Mahugu stated that the resolution contained "nothing that could open the door in any eventuality for any kind of action without the clear and precise authority of the Security Council".

602. Mr Qin Huasun stated that the Council "should seriously reflect on the root causes of the present situation". There was "no doubt" that Iraq had to fulfil its obligations in a comprehensive manner, but the Council also had "the responsibility to make a fair and objective assessment" of Iraq's compliance. China's view was that some weapons files were "ripe to move" to the next phase of monitoring and verification. The fact that the Security Council had been "unable to make such a political decision" was "regrettable".

603. Mr Qin Huasun added that Mr Annan's proposals and ideas, which had been "warmly received and supported by an overwhelming majority of the Council members". China believed that conducting a comprehensive review was "still a way out of the present impasse". Dialogue, consultation and confidence building was the only way out. He appealed "to all sides to exercise restraint" and to "refrain from any actions that might sharpen the conflict and exacerbate tensions".

604. Mr Qin Huasun concluded that there were "still elements" in the draft resolution which were "not totally to our liking", but he would vote in favour because it had:

> "… incorporated amendments put forward by China and other interested countries by taking out the part which determines that the situation in Iraq poses a threat to international peace and security, and by adding that it is the primary responsibility of the Security Council to maintain international peace and security, reiterating its support for the Secretary-General in his efforts to ensure the implementation of the Memorandum of Understanding …
> "… We hope that this resolution will facilitate the resumption of co-operation between Iraq, on the one hand, and UNSCOM and IAEA, on the other, to allow an early comprehensive review which will in turn free the Iraqi people from sanctions."

605. Speaking after the vote, Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated that Iraq's decisions of 5 August and 31 October had put it "in flagrant violation of its obligations" and it was "right that the Council should react formally and unanimously to this latest attempt to challenge its authority and that of the United Nations as a whole". "Co-operation not confrontation" was "the only way out from sanctions for Iraq".

606. Commenting on the views expressed by other speakers on the meaning of this resolution as regards the possible use of force, Sir Jeremy added that the view of the UK was that it was:

> "… well established that the authorisation to use force given by the Security Council in 1990 may be revived if the Council decides that there has been a sufficiently serious breach of the conditions laid down by the Council for the cease-fire.
> "In the resolution we have just adopted, the Council has condemned the Iraqi decision to cease all co-operation as a flagrant violation of its obligations.
> "This resolution sends a clear message to Iraq: resume co-operation now. If Iraq does so, the Council has spelt out unambiguously that it stands ready to conduct a comprehensive review of Iraq's compliance with its obligations … and what steps remain to be taken. We hope that Iraq will respond positively and resume full co-operation soon."

607. Mr Peter Burleigh, US Deputy Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that the Council had "sent a clear and unmistakable message to Iraq" that "non-compliance will not be rewarded or tolerated". The restrictions which Iraq had imposed on UNSCOM and the IAEA were "intolerable". Mr Annan had "expressed his own view" that Iraq's decision of 31 October was a "serious breach and major violation" of the 23 February MOU. President Clinton and Secretary Albright had "emphasized that all options are on the table", and the US had "the authority to act".

608. Mr Burleigh concluded:

> "Iraq should recognise the gravity of the situation it has created. Iraq must turn back from the dangerous and self-defeating course it has chosen. The United States sincerely hopes that Iraq will heed the clear message of this resolution and take the necessary steps without delay."

609. On the evening of 10 November, Mr Butler decided to remove all UNSCOM personnel from Iraq.[243] He stated, in a letter to the President of the Security Council the following day, that the "prime consideration which motivated the decision, and the speed at which it was executed, was the safety of the Commission's staff". He had consulted the President of the Security Council, Dr ElBaradei and the Chilean Acting Permanent Representative to the UN in New York. "Discussions were also held" with Mr Annan's office. Mr Butler regretted that it had not been possible to hold wider consultations.

610. In his memoir, Mr Annan recounts learning of UNSCOM's withdrawal through a telephone call from Dr ElBaradei at 0330 on the morning of 11 November and his anger at what he considered to be Mr Butler's "deeply unprofessional behaviour".[244]

611. On 11 November, Mr Annan issued a press statement containing a personal appeal to Saddam Hussein to take the necessary steps for a diplomatic solution to the crisis.[245] It expressed "surprise" at Iraq's decision when the Security Council had "agreed a way forward on a comprehensive review".

612. Mr Blair wrote in his memoir that Saddam Hussein had "thrown out the weapons inspectors, who had written a damming report on the outstanding issues relating to weapons of mass destruction and Saddam's continuing ambitions to develop a programme for them" and "President Clinton was contemplating a military strike".[246] At a meeting with Mr Robertson, Mr Cook and General Sir Charles Guthrie, Chief of the Defence Staff, on 11 November, Mr Blair had been briefed on the military options. Cabinet had been taken through the issue the following day, with Mr Robertson warning that it was "the most serious development" since the Gulf Conflict.

613. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Robertson had told Cabinet that Saddam Hussein had broken the cease-fire agreement, broken his word to Mr Annan, and was rebuilding chemical and biological weapons programmes.[247] He was weaponising nerve agents. These were "ferocious weapons" and "his neighbours believe there is intent". Mr Campbell wrote: "TB made clear this was the US demanding and us complying, but that our own independent judgement was that he [Saddam Hussein] must be forced to comply. He said there was a real breach, not a technical breach."

614. On 12 November, the Iraqi Permanent Representative to the UN in New York was given a private warning that, if Iraq did not return to full compliance very quickly it would face a substantial military strike.[248]

615. Following discussions in the Security Council in which "all the members … expressed preference for a diplomatic solution", Mr Annan wrote to Saddam Hussein on 13 November asking for "an early response" to the appeal in his press statement of 11 November, which had been "unanimously endorsed" by the Security Council.[249]

616. Mr Aziz's response on 14 November stated that Iraq had put its trust in Mr Annan and his good faith but, because of US objections, the deliberations of the Security Council on the procedures for the comprehensive review had not provided a clear picture.[250] On the basis of Mr Annan's appeal and messages from Russia, China, France, Brazil and other States, Iraq had "decided to resume working with the Special Commission and the IAEA and to allow them to perform their normal duties". He also provided points which had been passed to Russia, France and China on how the comprehensive review should be conducted.

617. In a press statement on 15 November, the President of the Security Council noted Mr Aziz and the Iraqi Permanent Representative had informed the Council that:

- "Iraq has decided, clearly and unconditionally, to co-operate fully with the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA)".
- The decision constituted "a rescinding of the decisions of 5 August and 31 October, and that Iraq's co-operation with the Special Commission and the IAEA will allow the return of inspectors to resume all their activities on an immediate, unconditional and unrestricted basis, in accordance with the relevant resolutions and with the Memorandum of Understanding of 23 February 1998."[251]

618. The press statement also said that "Taking note of past experience", Council members had "underlined that their confidence in Iraq's intentions" needed to be "established by unconditional and sustained co-operation", and:

> "… reaffirmed their readiness to proceed with a comprehensive review, once the Secretary-General has confirmed, on the basis of reports from the Special Commission and the IAEA, that Iraq has returned to full co-operation, on the basis of resolution 1194 (1998) and the Council President's letter of 30 October to the Secretary-General."

619. The US and the UK had already authorised air strikes when Mr Aziz's letter was received.

620. Mr Blair wrote that air strikes had been due to begin at 4.30pm on 14 November, but President Clinton "had decided to pause" when Iraq's letter was received. Mr Blair described Iraq's response as "full of holes, typical Saddam rubbish", but early on 15 November action was suspended.[252]

621. Mr Blair wrote that Mr Cook was relieved, but he had been "determined to keep the US alliance intact and functioning at what was a crucial moment".

622. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair understood why President Clinton had decided to pause, "but our general view was that we should have gone ahead".[253] He wrote: "TB was worried we would end up diluting the support we had. Clear breach would get us support. If we were signalling we weren't sure, or it didn't matter, we would dissipate it." Mr Blair and President Clinton spoke eight times over an 18-hour period.

[253] Campbell A & Stott R. The Blair Years: Extracts from the Alastair Campbell Diaries. Hutchinson, 2007.

623. Mr Campbell recorded in his diary a conversation with Mr Blair on the morning of 15 November, in which he said that "the US were still talking about going in today. This was a nightmare, he said."

624. In a statement to the House of Commons on 16 November, Mr Blair explained why the UK Government had been prepared to take military action, why it had stayed its hand and why it remained "ready to strike" if Iraq failed to comply fully with its obligations.[254]

625. Mr Blair stated that Iraq had "built up a vast arsenal of weapons of mass destruction" before the Gulf Conflict and that, since then, he had "been trying to hide them, and to acquire more". After the agreement of the MOU in February 1998, Iraq had "resumed superficial co-operation", but that changed on 5 August. The issue was not "technical breaches of UN resolutions, but … a pattern of behaviour" that continued "to pose actual huge risks".

626. Mr Blair stated that two hours before the attacks were due to start, word had been received that Iraq had told Mr Annan that they would be responding positively to his appeal. The US and UK had decided to put the attack "on hold for 24 hours to give us a chance to study the details of the Iraqi response".

627. Mr Blair added:

> "The first Iraqi letter appeared to agree to resume co-operation with UNSCOM and the IAEA. It was described as unconditional by Iraqi spokesmen, but the full text of the letter, and in particular nine assurances that the Iraqis were seeking about the comprehensive review … left that unclear. We and the Americans spelled out that that was unacceptable, and that there could be no question of any conditions.
> "During the course of Saturday night and Sunday morning, the Iraqis offered a stream of further written and oral clarifications, making it clear that their compliance was unconditional …
> "The clarifications, taken together, mean that Saddam Hussein has completely withdrawn his positions of August and October. No concessions of any kind were offered to him in exchange. There was no negotiation of any kind. Nor could there have been. Nor will there be in future."

628. Mr Blair cautioned:

> "We do not take Iraqi words at face value. Long experience has taught us to do the opposite … we and the Americans have suspended further military action while we bolt down every detail of what the Iraqis have said, and while we test the words in practice …

[254] House of Commons, Official Report, 16 November 1998, columns 607-623.

> "As ever, we do not rely on the good faith of Saddam Hussein. He has none. We know, however, that under the threat of force, we can make him move. We will be watching him with extreme care and a high degree of scepticism … we and the Americans remain ready, willing and able to go back to the use of force at any time. There will be no further warnings. The inspectors will now carry out their work."

629. Mr Blair emphasised that the position was different from that in February 1998. There was "now a very clear diplomatic basis for action without further need for long discussion in the Security Council or elsewhere". If there was "a next time … everyone will know what to expect … I shall have no hesitation in ordering the use of force."

630. Mr Blair concluded:

> "This is far from over. It is merely in a different phase. Our course is set: complete compliance and nothing less, and we shall not be moved from that course."

631. Mr William Hague, the Leader of the Opposition, asked whether, given Saddam Hussein's "continued breaches of faith, and the continuing threat to peace that he presents to the whole of the Middle East and thus to the interests of the United Kingdom", meant that, although there would be "formidable difficulties", the "prime objective of western policy should now be the removal of Saddam from power?"

632. Mr Blair responded:

> "Of course we want to see the Iraqi people governed by a regime other than that of Saddam Hussein. We are looking with the Americans at ways in which we can bolster the opposition and improve the possibility of removing Saddam Hussein altogether. I entirely share the sentiments that President Clinton expressed on that point."

633. In a press conference on 14 December looking at the challenges ahead in the coming year, asked whether Iraq deserved a comprehensive review, Mr Annan responded that the Security Council itself "would want to know, after eight years of sanctions, where it stands, what has been achieved, what needs to be done, and within what reasonable time frame it can be done".[255]

634. Asked about "any inherent conflict of interest" between multilateral interests in the UN and the US, Mr Annan stated that there were "areas" where Washington's policies diverged from the UN, including:

> "… Iraq, where the Council has made it clear that we should disarm Iraq, and the moment we get the indication from the inspectors … that Iraq has been disarmed, sanctions will be lifted. American policy goes beyond that, but I am guided only by the United Nations policy."

[255] UN Press Release, 14 December 1998, 'Transcript of Press Conference by Secretary-General Kofi Annan at Headquarters, 14 December' (SG/SM/6837).

635. Mr Annan submitted reports from the IAEA and UNSCOM covering the period since 17 November to the President of the Security Council on 15 December.[256]

636. The report from Dr ElBaradei, of 14 December, was very short, simply listing the IAEA's activities and reporting that Iraq had "provided the necessary level of co-operation" to enable it to complete the tasks "efficiently and effectively". In discussions on "the few remaining questions and concerns related to Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme", Iraq had "expressed its intention to continue to co-operate with the IAEA on the resolution of the issues".[257]

637. Mr Annan told the Security Council that the report from UNSCOM presented "a mixed picture" and concluded that "UNSCOM did not enjoy full co-operation from Iraq".[258]

638. In his report of 15 December, Mr Butler briefly rehearsed the impact of Iraq's policies on UNSCOM's ability to carry out its tasks before 17 November, adding that, since its return on 17 November, UNSCOM had focused on four main areas:

- requests for information through access to documents and interviews of Iraqi personnel;
- monitoring inspections;
- inspection of capable sites; and
- disarmament inspections relating to proscribed weapons and activities.[259]

639. Mr Butler reported that UNSCOM had asked for 12 sets of documents related to chemical weapons and missiles and access to the archives of Iraq's Ministry of Defence and the Military Industrialisation Corporation. In response, Iraq had provided only one set of documents, and a preliminary assessment indicated that they did not contain the information sought.

640. Other points included:

- UNSCOM had repeated its request for the return of the document seized at the Iraqi Air Force headquarters in July 1998, which detailed Iraq's consumption of special warheads in the 1980s. Iraq had refused, stating that it was "ready only to 'consider' … relevant portions of the document" in the presence of the Secretary-General's Special Representative.

[259] UN Security Council, 15 December 1998, 'Letter dated 15 December 1998 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) addressed to the Secretary-General' (S/1998/1172).

- Iraq had provided a report on its analysis of samples from special warhead fragments.
- Iraq had claimed that VX contamination of missile fragments from special warheads, found by a US laboratory, was the result of a deliberate act of tampering with the samples.
- Iraq had refused to allow missile engine components to be removed for analysis.
- Iraq did not provide specific documents requested by a biological inspections team and had not responded to a request for new, substantial information on its biological weapons programmes.
- There had been some difficulties in interviews with students in a university where declarable research on biological weapons had taken place.

641. In relation to monitoring inspections:

- Iraq was reconsidering its refusal since 5 August to provide data collected by Iraq during tests on indigenously produced missiles and rocket engines.
- Iraq had placed unacceptable conditions on photographs during a chemical inspection on 5 December.
- Undeclared dual-capable items and materials subject to chemical and biological monitoring had been discovered.
- A team had been refused access on 11 December in line with Iraq's policy of facilitating entry "during the working days of the week, except Fridays".

642. In relation to disarmament inspections, Mr Butler reported that, "In the light of clear evidence that Iraq had taken advance actions at certain of the locations planned for inspection", he had "decided not to conduct the full range of inspections the team had planned". The examples given included:

- There had been some difficulties negotiating access at one site designated as sensitive which resulted in Iraq's introduction of new requirements, including a formal letter of request indicating what was being sought at the site.
- At the former headquarters of the Special Security Organisation, the building had been emptied and Iraq would not disclose where the materials were held.
- At the management offices of the Military Industrialisation Corporation, the site "had been prepared to avoid any disclosure of relevant materials and the team assessed Iraq had expected their arrival".

643. Mr Butler reported that Iraq had still not taken action to enact the required legislation to prohibit activity which was prohibited by Security Council resolutions and to enforce such legislation.

644. Mr Butler concluded that it was "evident" from the report that Iraq had not provided the full co-operation promised on 14 November, and:

"… during the period under review, Iraq initiated new forms of restrictions upon the Commission's work. Amongst the Commission's many concerns about this retrograde step is what such further restrictions might mean for the effectiveness of long-term monitoring activities.

"In spite of the opportunity presented … including the prospect of a comprehensive review, Iraq's conduct ensured that no progress was able to be made in either the fields of disarmament or accounting for its prohibited weapons programmes.

"… in the absence of full co-operation by Iraq, it must regrettably be recorded … that the Commission is not able to conduct the substantive disarmament work mandated … by the Security Council and, thus, to give the Council the assurances it requires with respect to Iraq's prohibited weapons programmes."

645. Mr Annan also circulated a letter of 14 December from Mr Aziz, reporting in detail on the activities of the IAEA and UNSCOM between 18 November and 13 December and stating that, despite concerns about aspects of UNSCOM's actions, Iraq had provided full co-operation.[260]

646. Mr Aziz's concerns included:

- A large inspection team to address allegations of concealment had arrived without the agreed advance notification and had "carried out its work in an intrusive and provocative manner, showing no respect for the procedures agreed between Iraq and UNSCOM".
- UNSCOM had not responded to Iraq's requests to send teams to work with Iraq to investigate two areas of importance in relation to the material balance of chemical weapons: "the fate of the 155mm shells with mustard" and verification of the "tail units of the R-400" which were "at the Iraqi Air Force stores".

647. Mr Annan suggested that the Council might want to consider three possible options:

- "That the experience over the period since 17 November 1998 does not provide a sufficient basis to move forward with a comprehensive review at this time."
- "That Iraq has not provided full co-operation but that it should be permitted additional time to demonstrate its commitment to do so."
- "That the Council may wish to proceed with a comprehensive review on the premise that it is sufficiently important to know precisely what has been achieved in the area of disarmament over the entire period since 1991."[261]

648. Mr Campbell wrote that a meeting of DOP took place on 15 December.[262] Mr Cook considered that Mr Butler's report was sufficient reason for action. Mr Blair had given explicit authority for the UK to participate if the US decided to go ahead with strikes.

UNSCOM and IAEA withdraw

649. On 16 December, a spokesman for Mr Annan briefed the press that, overnight, Mr Annan had received a telephone call from Mr Burleigh, who had advised him that US personnel in Iraq were being asked to leave.[263] Mr Butler had also been advised to withdraw UNSCOM personnel, and had instructed them to do so.

650. On the same day, Dr ElBaradei informed the Council that he had decided IAEA personnel should be "temporarily" relocated to Bahrain once UNSCOM, "on whose logistic support IAEA activities in Iraq" depended, had decided to withdraw its personnel.[264]

651. During Prime Minister's Questions on 16 December, action against Iraq was raised.[265]

652. Mr Hague assured Mr Blair "of the full support of the Opposition for the use of military action … provided that action has clear and achievable objectives" and asked whether removing Saddam Hussein "must now be a prime objective of western policy".

653. Mr Blair responded that no-one who read Mr Butler's report could seriously doubt its conclusion that UNSCOM was unable to do its job properly, and that it stated there were "greater restrictions now than previously". The report detailed "not merely the obstruction", but the fact that it related to:

> "… documents, sites and personnel that would give a clue to the whereabouts of the weapons of mass destruction and the capability to make them. It is not obstruction simply for the sake of it, but a plan of deceit to prevent those weapons of mass destruction from being located and destroyed."

654. Mr Blair added that, if he was allowed to develop those weapons, Saddam Hussein would pose a threat "not only to his neighbourhood but to the whole world".

655. Subsequently, in response to a question from Mr Tony Benn suggesting that military action would be illegal and that he should take "an independent view" rather than do as he was told by President Clinton, Mr Blair responded that the question was how to stop Saddam Hussein building weapons of mass destruction. He added that the cease-fire in 1991 had depended on the fulfilment of obligations accepted by Iraq. The requirement for Iraq to fulfil those obligations had been confirmed in successive Security Council resolutions.[266]

656. Mr Blair added that, when the MOU between Mr Annan and Iraq had been agreed in February:

> "… the Security Council said that any breach by Iraq of its obligations … would result in 'the severest consequences'. The Council has condemned Iraq's decision to end co-operation again and again. On 14 November, we gave Iraq a further chance to come back into compliance. Given Iraq's manifest failure to co-operate in the past month, I am satisfied that, if we should choose to use force, we have the necessary legal authority to do so."

Operation Desert Fox

657. The US and UK launched air attacks against Iraq, Operation Desert Fox, at 2200 on 16 December.[267]

658. Military action began while the Security Council was holding informal discussions on the IAEA and UNSCOM reports and the options identified by Mr Annan.[268]

659. Mr Annan issued a press statement in which he said it was "a sad day for the United Nations, and for the world" as well as a "very sad day" for him personally. Throughout the year, he had "done everything" in his power "to ensure peaceful compliance with Security Council resolutions, and to avert the use of force". It had "not been an easy or a painless process", but "the United Nations had to try as long as any hope for peace remained".[269]

660. Mr Annan concluded:

> "I deeply regret that today these efforts have proved insufficient.
> "What has happened to day cannot be reversed. Nor can any of us foresee the future. All we know is that tomorrow, as yesterday, there will still be an acute need, in Iraq and the wider region, for humanitarian relief and healing diplomacy. In both these tasks, the United Nations will be ready, as ever, to play its part."

661. In a public statement, President Clinton said that, while other countries had weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles, the international community had good reason to impose restrictions on Iraq because it had "repeatedly" used them, including against civilians. He had "no doubt" that "left unchecked" Saddam Hussein would use them again.[270]

662. President Clinton described the conclusions in Mr Butler's report as "stark, sobering and profoundly disturbing". Iraq had "abused its final chance". The situation presented a "clear and present danger to the stability of the Persian Gulf and the safety of people everywhere". Action was necessary because:

- "… without a strong inspection system, Iraq would be free to retain and begin to rebuild its chemical, biological and nuclear weapons programmes in months, not years."
- If Saddam Hussein "crippled the weapons inspection system and got away with it, he would conclude that the international community – led by the US" had "simply lost its will". He would "surmise that he has free reign to rebuild his arsenal of mass destruction".
- "Third, in halting … air strikes in November" Saddam Hussein had been given "a chance, not a license". If the US turned its back on his defiance, "the credibility of US power as a check against Saddam" would be "destroyed". That would "fatally undercut the fear of force" that stopped Saddam "from acting to gain domination in the region".

663. The air strikes were "designed to degrade Saddam's capacity to develop and deliver weapons of mass destruction, and to degrade his ability to threaten his neighbours". The US was pursuing "a long-term strategy to contain Iraq and its weapons of mass destruction and work toward the day when Iraq has a government worthy of its people", through being prepared to use force when necessary and maintaining and enforcing sanctions for as long as Iraq remained "out of compliance".

664. But President Clinton added that, as long as Saddam Hussein remained in power, he threatened:

> "… the well-being of his people, the peace of the region, the security of the world.
> "The best way to end that threat once and for all is with a new Iraqi government … Bringing change in Baghdad will take time and effort. We will strengthen our engagement with the full range of Iraqi opposition forces and work with them effectively and prudently."

665. In a statement on 16 December, Mr Blair said:

> "This action could have been avoided. Since the Gulf War, the entire international community has worked to stop Saddam Hussein from keeping and developing nuclear, chemical and biological weapons and from continuing to threaten his neighbours.

"For the safety and stability of the region and the wider world, he cannot be allowed to do so. If he will not, through reason and diplomacy, abandon his weapons of mass destruction programme, it must be degraded and diminished by military force."[271]

666. Mr Blair said that Saddam Hussein had "no intention of abiding by the agreements he has made". The report from Mr Butler had been "damning"; it was "a catalogue of obstruction" based on a desire to develop weapons of mass destruction. There was a threat "now" to Saddam Hussein's neighbours, his people, "and to the security of the world". If he was not stopped, the consequences would be "real and fundamental", and that could not "responsibly" be allowed to happen.

667. Mr Blair concluded that there was "no realistic alternative to military force": "We have exhausted all other avenues. We act because we must."

668. Mr Burleigh informed the President of the Security Council that "Coalition forces" were making "substantial" military attacks against "Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programmes and its ability to threaten its neighbours".[272]

669. Mr Burleigh stated that:

- The action was a "necessary and proportionate response to the continued refusal of the Iraqi Government to comply with the resolutions of the Security Council".
- It had been "undertaken only when it became evident that diplomacy had been exhausted". The coalition had "acted out of necessity" and the Government of Iraq bore "full responsibility" for the consequences of the military action. The US had not acted "precipitately", but had worked "with its partners in the Security Council over the past months in a sincere and sustained effort to bring about a peaceful resolution of the confrontation created by Iraq". "For reasons best known to Saddam Hussein, Iraq chose to reject that effort."
- Iraq had "repeatedly taken actions" which constituted "flagrant material breaches" of the provisions in relevant Security Council resolutions: "On a number of occasions, the Council has affirmed that similar Iraqi actions constituted such breaches, as well as a threat to international peace and security." The US view was that "the Council need not state these conclusions on each occasion".
- Iraq had "once again, acted in flagrant and material breach of Security Council resolution 687 (1991)" by "refusing to make available documents and information requested by UNSCOM … by imposing new restrictions on the weapons inspectors and by repeatedly denying access to facilities which UNSCOM wished to inspect".

- The coalition was exercising "the authority given by the Security Council" in resolution 678 (1990) "for Member States to employ all necessary means to secure Iraqi compliance with the Council's resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area".
- The resort to military force was "necessitated" by Iraq's "policy of unremitting defiance and non-compliance".

670. In a parallel letter to the President of the Security Council, Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated that the action was taken "following a long history of non-co-operation by Iraq".[273] Iraq had promised on 14 November to co-operate fully, but Mr Butler's letter of 15 December stated "clearly that Iraq did not provide the full co-operation it promised", and that UNSCOM was "unable as a result to conduct the substantive work mandated to it by the Security Council".

671. Sir Jeremy added that the UK's objective was:

> "… compliance by the Iraqi Leadership with the obligations laid down by the Council. The operation was undertaken when it became apparent that there was no prospect of this being achieved by peaceful means. It will have the effect of degrading capabilities which have been the subject of Security Council resolutions over the past nine years. Targets have been carefully chosen to avoid civilian casualties."[274]

672. In the subsequent meeting of the Council, Mr Hamdoon condemned the "aggression" of the US and UK and the decision to flout international law and the UN Charter.[275]

673. Mr Hamdoon also criticised Mr Butler's "partiality, lack of integrity and lack of objectivity" by singling out five incidents from 300 inspections as "categorical evidence of lack of co-operation" when the circumstances did not justify that conclusion, and for withdrawing the inspectors without the knowledge or authority of the Council "to pave the way completely for the military aggression".

674. Sir Jeremy Greenstock recalled the "long road" to the crisis citing Iraq's use of chemical weapons against Iran and its own civilians and its behaviour since 1991, including:

- "never" giving UNSCOM the co-operation it needed to complete its tasks;

- concealing the “evidence of its past and current programmes”;
- engaging in a “policy of harassment and deceit”;
- blocking inspections “whenever it feared that anything incriminating would be found”; and
- failing to produce documents.

675. Sir Jeremy added that Iraq had “deliberately provoked a series of crises” since October 1997 “in an attempt to wear down the will of the international community”. When military action had been called off on 14 November, Saddam Hussein had been warned that, if he broke his word “once more, there would be no second chances”.

676. Sir Jeremy stated that Mr Butler’s report of 15 December made clear that Iraq had “yet again failed to keep its promises”.

677. Sir Jeremy stated that resolutions adopted by the Security Council provided:

> “… a clear legal basis for military action … Resolution 1154 (1998) made it clear that any violation by Iraq of its obligations to allow the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency unrestricted access would have the severest consequences … Resolution 1205 (1998) established that Iraq’s decision of 31 October 1998 to cease co-operation with the Special Commission was a flagrant violation of resolution 687 (1991), which laid down the conditions for the 1991 cease-fire. By that resolution, therefore, the Council implicitly revived the authorisation to use force given in resolution 678 (1990). And Ambassador Butler’s report makes clear that, despite its undertakings … Iraq has not only failed to resume full co-operation with the Special Commission but has imposed new restrictions on its work.”

678. Mr Burleigh rehearsed the points in his letter to the President of the Security Council. He also praised the “outstanding professional work” of UNSCOM and Mr Butler.

679. Slovenia and Japan supported military action but China and Russia were sharply critical of unilateral action.

680. Mr Lavrov stated that the military action had caused casualties, destroyed “valuable material goods” and created a threat “to peace and security not only in the region but beyond it”.

681. Mr Lavrov added that the action had done “Grave harm” to the work on a post-crisis settlement and to dismantle Iraq’s weapons of mass destruction and their delivery systems. It also “called into question” the system which had been “so carefully set up over a long period of time to monitor” Iraq’s prohibited programmes. Russia objected to the US and UK action. It was “an unprovoked act of force” which “grossly violated the Charter of the United Nations, the principles of international law and the generally recognized norms and rules of responsible behaviour on the part of States in the international arena”.

682. Mr Lavrov stated that "the Security Council alone" had "the right to determine what steps should be taken … to maintain or restore international peace and security". Russia rejected "the attempts" of the US and the UK "to justify the use of force on the basis of a mandate that was previously issued by the Security Council". The actions were a violation of Security Council resolutions. No one was:

> "… entitled to act independently on behalf of the United Nations, still less assume the functions of a world policeman."

683. Although there were problems in respect of Iraq's co-operation, the crisis had been "created artificially". Partly that was the result of "irresponsible acts" by Mr Butler in presenting a report on 15 December which "gave a distorted picture of the real state of affairs and concluded that there was a lack of full co-operation on the part of Iraq", which was "not borne out by the facts". He had also "grossly abused his authority" by withdrawing UNSCOM without consultation and the media had received a leaked copy of his report before the Security Council itself.

684. Mr Qin Huasun said that the US and UK had "started a military attack … which violated the … Charter and norms governing international law". China was "deeply shocked" and condemned the "unprovoked military action" which was "completely groundless". The differences between UNSCOM and Iraq could "properly be settled through dialogue and consultation" while the use of force:

> "… far from helping to reach a settlement, may create serious consequences for the implementation of Security Council resolutions, for relations between Iraq and the United Nations and for peace and stability in the world and in the region."

685. Mr Qin Huasun called on the US and UK immediately to stop all military action. He added that Mr Butler had "played a dishonourable role" in the crisis, submitting reports to Mr Annan that "were one-sided and evasive regarding the facts". The purpose of those reports might have been to provide "the main argument for the use of force", but there was "in fact no excuse or reason for the use of force".

686. Costa Rica, Kenya and Sweden voiced more muted but still explicit criticism.

687. Mr Bernd H Niehaus, Costa Rican Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that Costa Rica had learned of the air strikes "with great and profound disquiet" and reaffirmed its "long-standing position rejecting the unilateral use of force and insisting on adherence to international legal instruments". Nonetheless, it had "witnessed with frustration" Iraq's policy of "defying and ignoring international obligations" and "forcefully and vigorously" appealed "to Iraq to put an end, once and for all and unconditionally, to its provocative actions."

688. Mr Dahlgren stated that Iraq had "again and again … refused to abide by the clear obligations that a unanimous Security Council" had decided upon, and that Sweden would have been ready "to support a decision in the Council on military action as a last resort" when Iraq "seriously violates its obligations, and when all diplomatic means have been exhausted". But, "that would be a decision for the Security Council". Instead "without such a decision", military action had been taken while the Council were meeting in informal consultations. Sweden regretted the attacks and the consequences they might have for civilians in Iraq, and the "fact that the Security Council has been presented with a fait accompli". It feared that the strikes would "not be of much help in getting the inspections going again" when the "Council's overriding aim must remain to rid Iraq of its programmes" for developing weapons of mass destruction.

689. Mr Mahugu reiterated Kenya's position that "any decision to take further action against Iraq remains the sole responsibility of the Security Council", and that it was "difficult to understand the reason's for today's attack". The reports to the Council did not "in any way indicate that UNSCOM suffered a total lack of co-operation".

690. Mr Mahugu added:

> "Any decision taken to force compliance by Iraq with resolutions without the Council's prior authority … is contrary to the spirit and purpose of those very resolutions, because it also deprived the Council of an opportunity to analyse the reports … and to take a collective decision on them."

691. Brazil, France, Gabon, Gambia and Portugal each adopted a more equivocal position.

692. Mr Amorim deplored the fact that circumstances had led to the use of force, but also stated that, when the use of force was contemplated, it "should take place within a multilateral framework".

693. Mr Mamour Jagne, Gambian Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that the die was cast, but Gambia "would like to see the unity of the Council restored". If it was not, the Council's primary responsibility for maintaining international peace and security would be "seriously impaired".

694. Mr Dejammet stated that France:

- deplored "the chain of events that led to American military strikes … and the serious human consequences that they may have";
- regretted that Iraqi leaders had not been "able to demonstrate the spirit of full co-operation" called for by the February MOU; and
- thanked Mr Annan and supported his "tireless and persistent actions to ensure that the law prevails, despite the obstacles and pitfalls encountered".

695. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry:

"The US and UK came under intensive criticism from all other members of the Council, and the UN as a whole, for taking matters in their own hands in this way but there was no formal motion of condemnation put forward."[276]

696. The military action was supported by the main political parties in the UK.

697. Mr Blair made a statement to the House of Commons on 17 December.[277] He said that the objectives of the military operation were:

"… clear and simple: to degrade the ability of Saddam Hussein to build and use weapons of mass destruction, including command and control and delivery systems, and to diminish the threat that Saddam Hussein poses to his neighbours by weakening his military capability.

"… the action is proportionate to the serious dangers Saddam Hussein poses … The targets, throughout Iraq, have been very carefully selected to reflect these objectives …"

698. Other points made by Mr Blair included:

- The inspectors had been "constantly harassed, threatened, deceived and lied to. A special and elaborate mechanism to conceal Iraqi capability was out in place involving organisations close to Saddam, in particular his Special Republican Guard."
- UNSCOM had achieved a huge amount, but "too much" remained "unaccounted for", and Iraq had "consistently sought to frustrate attempts to look at the records and destroy the remaining capability".
- A report by the UN Special Rapporteur on Human Rights in October 1998 had "documented massive and extremely grave violations of human rights".
- Saddam Hussein's obstruction had begun "in real earnest" after "the full extent of the weapons programme was uncovered in 1996 and early 1997". It included casting doubt on the independence of the inspectors and seeking to exclude US and UK nationals.
- Saddam Hussein had been given a "last chance" in mid-November, and warned that, if he broke his word and obstructed the work of the inspectors, "there would be no further warnings or diplomatic arguments … we would strike".
- Saddam Hussein was "a man to whom a last chance to do right is just a further opportunity to do wrong. He is blind to reason."
- Saddam Hussein's attitude was "as much deliberate obstruction as he thought he could get away", which he had used "deliberately to try to blackmail the international community into lifting sanctions".

[277] House of Commons, Official Report, 17 December 1998, columns 1097-1102.

- There had been “a stark choice” between letting “the process continue further, with UNSCOM more and more emasculated” or, “having tried every possible diplomatic avenue and shown endless patience”, tackling Saddam Hussein’s “remaining capability through direct action”. In Mr Blair’s view, there was “only one responsible choice”.

699. Addressing the issue of whether the objective was to remove Saddam Hussein, Mr Blair stated:

> “The answer is: it cannot be. No one would be better pleased if his evil regime disappeared as a direct or indirect result of our action … Even if there were legal authority to do so, removing Saddam through military action would require the insertion of ground troops on a massive scale – hundreds of thousands … Even then, there would be no absolute guarantee of success. I cannot make that commitment responsibly.”

700. Mr Blair concluded:

> “Whatever the risks we face today, they are as nothing compared to the risks if we do not halt Saddam Hussein’s programme of developing chemical and biological weapons of mass destruction.”

701. Mr Hague supported the action, adding that the Conservative party believed that “the overall objective” of policy towards Iraq should be “to remove Saddam from power rather than temporarily checking his ambitions”.

702. Mr Blair agreed that “a broad objective” was “to remove Saddam Hussein and to do all that we can to achieve that”, but he did not think he could “responsibly” make a commitment to that outcome as an “objective of this military action”. Mr Blair expected that military action would “significantly degrade and diminish Saddam as a threat to his neighbours and his weapon-making capability”.

703. Mr Menzies Campbell stated that the Liberal Democrats supported the action “as a painful necessity and last resort to which we have been driven when all other options have been exhausted”. Without Saddam Hussein’s “repeated defiance and deception, the issue … could have been resolved several years ago”.

704. The Rev. Martin Smyth stated that “the greater number of people in Northern Ireland support the attacks whole-heartedly”.

705. Mr Blair’s statement was followed by a debate on the military action.[278]

706. Mr Cook stated that action had been taken because of Saddam Hussein’s failure to keep the commitments he had made, and “with the full authority of repeated Security Council resolutions, supported by all members of the Council”. The background was

"the 10 months since Saddam first threw out the inspectors last February" when "two successive resolutions have given us the authority to carry out this action".

707. Mr Cook described the threat as, "not an arsenal of completed weapons" but the "capacity to produce weapons of terror … within months if we turn our backs". The Government had two objectives. The first was "to defeat Saddam's ambitions to continue to develop such weapons, with which he could terrorise his neighbours". The second was "to reduce the threat to Saddam's neighbours by diminishing his military war machine".

708. In the debate that followed the statement, the majority of speakers supported military action.

709. There was, however, a significant minority which spoke against the action, questioning the legal basis for the action, whether it would help to disarm Iraq, and its potential impact on radicalising opinion in the region. A procedural device was used to avoid a vote.

710. At a press conference on 20 December, Mr Blair explicitly rejected what he called "an 'if you can't remove him [Saddam Hussein], do nothing' fallacy". He argued:

> "I do not accept that for instance we could only guarantee to bring him [Saddam Hussein] down by a land war in Iraq … But just because we can't get in the cage and strike him down it doesn't mean we should leave the cage untouched and the bars too fragile to hold him. What we have done is put him back securely and firmly in the cage …
> "We have reduced the danger Saddam poses consistent with common sense and a proportionate use of force."[279]

711. In Mr Blair's view, military action had sent:

> "… a very clear message indeed to Saddam Hussein that we will not sit by; it also sends a message to others … that the patience of the international community cannot be tried indefinitely and that when it is right and when the will of the international community is at stake we will act to enforce it because the first stirrings of a new global reality are upon us. Those who abuse force to wage war must be confronted by those willing to use force to maintain peace … We cannot do everything … but what we can do reasonably we should do."

712. In relation to Iraq, Mr Blair called for:

- "… a future strategy that is based on containment and stability for the region. First and foremost, we must maintain a threat of force which Saddam now knows to be credible … ready to strike … if he again poses a threat to his neighbours or develops weapons of mass destruction";

- radical improvement of sanctions-enforcement;
- "… an intensive diplomatic process … to forge a new strategy for stability in relations between the international community and Iraq"; and
- "… ways in which an effective inspections and monitoring regime … can be resumed".

713. The UK would "continue to engage with the Iraqi opposition to help them develop their vision of a better Iraq".

714. Mr Blair stated that nearly 100 sites were attacked, US and UK forces fired more than 400 cruise missiles and there were more than 200 aircraft strikes between 16 and 19 December.[280]

715. The sites which were targeted comprised:

- 30 sites which the UK government described as being involved in Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programmes;
- 20 command, control and communications targets, which Saddam Hussein used to control military and internal security forces;
- 10 Republican Guard targets;
- 27 air defence targets;
- six airfields, including those associated with helicopter forces used for internal repression; and
- an oil refinery near Basra associated with sanctions breaking.[281]

716. The International Institute for Strategic Studies stated that "a limited number of workshops in half a dozen declared missile facilities were bombed and damaged, including the final assembly and production lines of the al-Samoud".[282]

717. In an Assessment in May 2001, the JIC recorded that Operation Desert Fox had targeted:

"- WMD related industrial facilities, including those connected with ballistic missile production and a castor oil plant that could be used to support the production of BW;

- Airfield facilities housing the L-29 remotely piloted aircraft;
- Sites used by regime security organisations also involved in WMD."[283]

718. The Assessment added: "Other WMD-related facilities were not targeted."

719. In February 1999, the MOD assessed that the effect of Operation Desert Fox on Iraq's military programmes had been:

- to set back the ballistic missile programme by between one and two years; and
- to disrupt for several months WMD related work of the Iraqi Ministry of Industry and Military Industrialisation Headquarters in Baghdad.[284]

720. The bombing had "badly damaged, possibly destroyed outright" the L-29 unmanned aerial vehicle programme. The rebuilding of the Republican Guard infrastructure was estimated to take up to a year.

721. Following the 1998 Strategic Defence Review, which had identified the importance of preparations to overcome the possible threat from biological and chemical weapons particularly in the Gulf, the MOD published a paper in July 1999 setting out the results of a further review.[285] In his foreword to the paper, Mr Robertson stated that knowing what the threat was, how to reduce it, and how to protect against it, was "a constantly developing process" which he regarded as one of his "highest priorities".

722. The paper stated that many countries of concern had biological or chemical weapons capabilities, or both; and several were in areas in which the UK was most likely to face challenges to its interests, including in the Gulf. The potential threat from those weapons was "now greater than that from nuclear weapons". Iraq had already used chemical weapons. No country of concern had ballistic missiles which could threaten the UK with chemical or biological warheads, but capabilities continued to improve and the ballistic missiles being developed could threaten British forces deployed overseas.

723. The UK's policy rested "on four inter-related pillars":

- Arms control. Since the First World War, the UK had been at the forefront of international efforts to control and eliminate biological and chemical weapons through arms control agreements.
- Preventing supply. Export controls at national and international levels were "effective in preventing a significant number of undesirable transfers".
- Deterring use. Potential aggressors should be assured that: the use of biological and chemical weapons would "not be allowed to secure political or military advantage"; it would "on the contrary, invite a proportionately serious response" and those "responsible for any breach of international law relating to the use of such weapons" would be "held personally accountable".

- Defending against use. Possession of an effective range of defensive capabilities was required to enhance the other three pillars "by helping to make clear to a potential aggressor that the threatened, or actual, use of biological or chemical weapons" would "not limit our political options, or determine the outcome of a conflict".

724. The paper stated that the UK's military posture comprised three elements:

- the "ability to remove or reduce the threat by taking direct action";
- measures to minimise vulnerability to the weapons; and
- capabilities, training and equipment which protected British forces and allowed them to manage battlefield risks.

725. Eliminating or reducing a threat before an aggressor was able to use biological or chemical weapons was "preferable to having to manage the consequences of their use". Action to reduce the threat would "take a variety of forms". The UK would, "In broad terms, where legally justified", take "whatever action" was "required to reduce an opponent's capability to use biological and chemical weapons against the UK, our interests, or British and coalition forces". The possibilities included "Attacks on production facilities, storage sites, logistics chain and delivery systems".

726. The paper also emphasised the importance of "accurate and timely intelligence" on which direct action was "heavily" dependent, "both to alert us to the threat and … provide vital targeting information".

727. The paper stated that the threat from the proliferation of nuclear weapons was "well known", but biological and chemical weapons had a longer history and posed "the greater potential threat" in the current operational environment. The foundation for managing the risks was diplomatic, but a "balanced range of military capabilities" was also needed, including defensive and protective measures "and the ability to take action where necessary to remove or reduce a specific threat". The UK had an important dialogue with the US on biological and chemical defence issues and the UK would "continue to pursue close consultations with them and with other allies".

728. In relation to Iraq, the paper stated that it had:

> "… made significant efforts to develop a wide range of biological agents and their delivery means, including missile warheads. The programme has included the development and production of anthrax and botulinum toxin, and other agents, including ones that can attack plants and animals.
> "We also know that Iraq has a programme to convert L29 trainer aircraft for use as Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAVs). We assess that, if equipped with spray tanks to deliver chemical and biological agents, these would be capable of causing large-scale casualties.

"In 1998 we judged that, unless stopped:

- Iraq would be capable of regenerating a chemical weapons capability within months;
- Iraq had the expertise and equipment to regenerate an offensive biological weapons capability within weeks;
- work on 650km range missiles which could hit important targets in the Middle East might have begun. It could have been completed within a year, and biological weapons produced in the same timeframe;
- if Iraq could procure the necessary machinery and nuclear materials, it could build a crude air delivered nuclear device in about five years."

729. The paper stated that UNSCOM had "destroyed, or made harmless, a 'supergun'; 48 SCUD missiles; 38,000 chemical munitions, 690 tonnes of chemical agents; 3,000 tonnes of precursor chemicals; and biological and chemical warfare-related factories and equipment". The IAEA had "found a nuclear weapons programme far more advanced than suspected, and dismantled it". Saddam Hussein had "consistently sought to avoid his responsibility to declare his entire biological and chemical capabilities" and had "deliberately and systematically sought to conceal and retain them":

"UNSCOM has discovered a document, which the Iraqi regime refuses to release, appearing to indicate major discrepancies in Iraq's declarations over the use of chemical munitions during the Iran-Iraq war. Iraq also claims that it unilaterally destroyed 31,000 chemical munitions and 4,000 tonnes of precursor chemicals, but these still have to be properly accounted for. And Iraq has consistently denied that it weaponised VX, one of the most toxic of the nerve agents. But analysis by an international team of experts of the results of tests on fragments of missile warheads has shown that, contrary to its claims, Iraq did weaponise VX."

730. The attacks on Iraq's missile production and research facilities and the destruction of infrastructure associated with the concealment of biological and chemical programmes in December 1998 had caused Saddam Hussein "severe difficulties". They had:

- "damaged or destroyed" 87 percent of the 100 targets attacked;
- "severely damaged" the base for the L-29 trainer "which could be used to deliver biological and chemical agents";
- "significantly degraded" some key facilities associated with Iraq's ballistic missile programme, "setting this back one to two years";
- "seriously weakened" Iraq's "ability to deliver biological or chemical weapons by ballistic missile";

- destroyed some key buildings of the Iraqi Directorate of General Security, which were believed to contain "key equipment and documents"; and
- "set back" Iraq's ability to regenerate its biological and chemical capability.

731. The UK could not afford to ignore the problem of Iraq. Saddam Hussein continued "to pose a significant threat to his neighbours" and would "reconstitute his biological and chemical weapons capabilities if allowed". UK forces would stay in the region for as long as it was judged necessary and sanctions would remain in place until Iraq complied with its obligations.

LEGAL AUTHORISATION FOR OPERATION DESERT FOX

732. The USA and the UK did not seek specific authorisation from the UN Security Council for Operation Desert Fox and instead drew their authority from previous resolutions, especially resolution 1205.

733. Their interpretation of the legal authority provided by those resolutions was not supported by other Security Council members. Russia in particular disputed the legal basis for military action. Resolution 1205 had used the formulation "flagrant violation" rather than "material breach", the recognised phrase derived from the law of treaties for a breach which would entitle another party to argue that a cease-fire had been broken.

734. Sir Jeremy told the Inquiry:

> "… my use of resolution 1205 seriously annoyed my Russian counterpart, because he realised that I had succeeded in establishing … a declaration of material breach[286] of Iraq which he hadn't intended should be allowed by the resolution, which then lay the basis for the use of force in December 1998."[287]

735. On 24 September 1998, the JIC had assessed:

> "We cannot rule out the possibility that Saddam retains a handful of missiles … these could be available for use within a matter of weeks or perhaps even days. Provided it still has key components – and that is unclear – Iraq could within a few months build, with little risk of detection, missiles capable of hitting Israel and key targets in Saudi Arabia. If it needs to make or acquire the components, production of such missiles could begin within a year …"[288]

736. The Butler Report concluded that JIC readers in December 1998 would have had the impression that Iraq had the ability "to regenerate a small number of ballistic missiles, either through bringing back into use missiles that had been hidden or by re-assembling missiles from hidden components".

After Operation Desert Fox

737. All No-Fly Zone patrols were suspended during Operation Desert Fox and France withdrew from operations stating that the aim was no longer humanitarian. US and UK patrols resumed in the southern zone on 22 December 1998 and in the northern zone on 28 December.

738. In a speech on Iraq on 23 December, Mr Berger dismissed the proposition that the threat from Saddam Hussein could be downgraded, stating that his "external aggression and internal repression" still posed a "genuine threat to his neighbours and the world".[289] Saddam Hussein had proved he sought WMD "not for some abstract concept of deterrence, but for the very real purpose of using them". His "history of aggression" left "little doubt that he would resume his drive for regional domination and his quest for weapons of mass destruction if he had the chance".

739. The US had "met that threat with a consistent policy of containment". In the face of "periodic challenges", this strategy had "essentially held Saddam Hussein in check". But "over the past year in particular", he had "tried to cripple the UN inspection system" and:

> "If Saddam could eviscerate UNSCOM without a firm response, not only would there be no effective UNSCOM; there would be no deterrence against future aggression because the threat of force would no longer be credible. And there would be no prospect for keeping his program of weapons of mass destruction in check."

740. Mr Berger admitted that Iraq could not be disarmed from the air "as precisely as we can from the ground", but inspections had been "thwarted" by Saddam: for "much of the last year", Iraq had only allowed UNSCOM to look where it knew there was nothing to be found.

741. Mr Berger stated that the purpose of Operation Desert Fox had not been to "dislodge Saddam from power", and ruled out the idea of deploying American ground troops:

> "The only sure way for us to effect his [Saddam Hussein's] departure now would be to commit hundreds of thousands of American troops to fight on the ground inside Iraq. I do not believe that the costs of such a campaign would be sustainable at home or abroad. And the reward of success would be an American military occupation of Iraq that could last years."

742. Addressing the policy for the future, Mr Berger stated that the strategy the US could and would pursue was, therefore, to:

> "… contain Saddam in the short and medium term, by force if necessary, and to work toward a new government over the long term."

[289] Speech to the National Press Club by Samuel (Sandy) Berger, National Security Advisor to the President, 23 December 1998.

743. The best option was for Saddam Hussein to allow the inspectors to return and Mr Butler had "proposed a roadmap to compliance that would take between three and six months to complete" if Saddam Hussein had the will to end confrontation. But intransigence should not be rewarded by "watered down monitoring mechanisms" or "helping Iraq create the illusion of compliance".

744. Without verification that Iraq had fulfilled its obligations, however, Mr Berger argued that force should be used if it was determined that Saddam Hussein was reconstituting his biological, chemical or nuclear programme or the missiles to deliver his WMD. The US strategy would be simple: "if he rebuilds it, we will come".

745. Mr Berger recognised that containment would be a "difficult policy to sustain in the long run". It was "a costly policy in economic and strategic terms", and "even a contained Iraq" was "harmful to the region" and condemned "the Iraqi people to a future of unending isolation in a murderous police state". That was why the US was "doing all we can to strengthen the Iraqi opposition so that it can seek change inside Iraq".

746. Mr Berger stated that the "responsibility to mount an effective movement that appeals to people inside Iraq and inspires them to struggle for change" lay with the opposition leaders, but there was much that the US could and would do. It had "reconciled the two Kurdish factions and worked with them to improve the lives of the three million Iraqis" who lived outside Saddam Hussein's control in the North; set up Radio Free Iraq; and was "intensifying … contacts with the entire spectrum of opposition groups … to help them become a more effective voice for the aspirations of the Iraqi people".

747. Mr Berger concluded:

> "When the time is right and the opposition is ready, we will decide what kind of additional support it will need to overcome Saddam's apparatus of violence and terror. We will not overreach. But we are willing to use whatever means are appropriate to advance our interests in Iraq, as long as the means are effective.
> "We will also stand ready to help a new government in Iraq …
> "We will pursue this strategy with patience and resolve and with confidence that our goals will be met … We know from experience that when people struggling for freedom gain the moral and material support of the American people, they usually prevail …
> "Change will come to Iraq, at a time and in a manner that we can influence but cannot predict …"

748. The approach set out by Mr Berger remained the strategy of President Clinton's Administration towards Iraq during its remaining two years in office.

749. In his memoir, Mr Blair wrote that following the UNSCOM report in mid-December, President Clinton had decided to act.[290] The air strikes had been "nerve wracking" and the operation was "a limited success". He added:

> "The general feeling was that Saddam had got away with it again."

750. In his memoir, Mr Annan wrote that Mr Butler's management and leadership had been:

> "… a gift to Saddam – allowing him, with a growing body of evidence – to claim that he was all for disarming and co-operating with the international community, but that UNSCOM's approach made this impossible."[291]

751. Mr Annan wrote that this was "entirely untrue"; but Mr Butler "and his backers in Washington and London" had "failed to understand" how it "undermined his own position" and that of the inspections.

752. Mr Annan also wrote that whenever the military option had been floated during negotiations in the previous year, he had asked what would happen after any bombing of Iraq; but that question had never been answered. Desert Fox had:

> "… ushered in a four year period without inspections and without a dialogue with Iraq about its place in the international system, even as sanctions continued to devastate its people and hand Saddam the ultimate propaganda tool – to be able to blame the West, and not his own misrule for the misery of his people."

753. Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote in his statement for the Inquiry:

> "When those attacks were called to a halt, the Security Council was left divided and the inspectors were unable to return to the country."[292]

The impact of Operation Desert Fox

The MOD assessed that the effect of Operation Desert Fox on Iraq's military programmes had been to set back the ballistic missile programme by between one and two years, that the WMD-related work of the Iraqi Ministry of Industry and Military Industrialisation Headquarters in Baghdad had been disrupted for several months at least, and that the bombing had "badly damaged, possibly destroyed outright" the L-29 unmanned aerial vehicle programme.[293] Rebuilding the Republican Guard infrastructure was estimated to require up to a year.

Mr Webb told the Inquiry the MOD had looked at how effective the action in 1998 had been in "keeping the WMD lid on by bombing … and we concluded that it was not effective and we were not able to offer any reassurance that you have been able to deal with the WMD problem solely by air power."[294] In response to a further question, he said it was "Not conclusively ineffective, but it hadn't achieved a result of which one felt assured". Mr Webb added: "It did have a very useful effect on reducing the capacity of the Iraqi Integrated Air Defence System, which was posing a threat to the aircraft."

Dr Condoleezza Rice wrote in her memoir that, in July 2003, it became clear that "the air assault on Iraq's WMD in 1998 had been more successful than we had known, and serious damage had been done to Saddam's capabilities at the time".[295]

The Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction concluded in 2004 that JIC assessments in 1998 would have left the impression "of suspicion and concern about Iraq's break-out capability, coupled with possible possession of chemical [and biological] agent stockpiles, in breach of its [Iraq's] United Nations obligations" and "concern about the ability of Iraq to regenerate a small number of ballistic missiles" in the minds of readers.[296]

Professor Marc Weller, Professor of International Law and International Constitutional Studies at the University of Cambridge, suggests that Operation Desert Fox had three important consequences for future policy towards Iraq:

> "First, Iraq terminated all co-operation with the UN arms inspection regime, arguing that the action demonstrated that inspections would only be used to prepare for further military action. Second, support for any further action by the Council resulted in a stalemate due to the 'breakdown in the Security Council' after the bombing campaign … Finally, and most damaging for the negotiations leading up to resolution 1441 (2002), several states resolved not to be lured again into the finding of a breach that might be invoked to justify the use of force, as had been the case with resolution 1205."[297]

754. Operation Desert Fox had created a deep fissure at the United Nations and within the P5. The Kosovo campaign, bitterly opposed by Russia and not mandated by the Security Council (because of the certainty of a Russian veto), was a further complicating element.

755. After Operation Desert Fox, Iraq embarked on a policy of uncompromising defiance of the UN rather than partial and intermittent co-operation.

756. Iraq repudiated the NFZs, and attacks on aircraft became a common occurrence. Iraq fired surface-to-air missiles and anti-aircraft artillery or targeted aircraft by fire control radar, although no coalition aircraft were ever shot down. In response to this threat, coalition aircraft targeted a variety of different elements of Iraq's Integrated Air Defence System (IADS), such as radar sites and associated communications and control networks, surface-to-air missile batteries and anti-aircraft artillery positions.

RAF Jaguars flying reconnaissance operations in the northern NFZ did not carry or drop air-to-ground ordnance, but RAF Tornado aircraft in the southern NFZ did so on numerous occasions.

757. Although Iraq did not succeed in shooting down an aircraft the risk was taken extremely seriously by both the US and the UK. That raised a number of serious issues about the extent of the actions which could be taken in self-defence and the nature of operations to rescue any downed aircrew. Those are addressed in Section 1.2.

758. The Butler Report stated that a JIC Assessment on 7 January 1999 had reached "somewhat firmer judgements than in 1997" that:

- "Following the 1991 Gulf War Iraq concealed BW [biological warfare] production equipment, stocks of agents and perhaps even BW weapons …"
- "… Iraq has sufficient expertise, equipment, and materials to produce BW agents within weeks."[298]

759. The Butler Review was told that the reason for shortening the timescales for production of biological agent to "within weeks" was "intelligence of Iraqi requests for large quantities of growth media", which was "judged to be greatly in excess of Iraq's likely legitimate requirements".[299] But it was "not known" if Iraq had actually obtained the growth media.

UNSCOM's findings, January 1999

760. Mr Butler produced two reports on 25 January 1999, one on the disarmament of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and one on monitoring and verification, which were formally circulated to the Security Council on 29 January.[300]

761. The report on disarmament described the work of UNSCOM since 1991 and its methodology, and set out "material balances" for the proscribed missile, chemical and biological weapons in three detailed annexes. It also included an annex "on actions by Iraq to obstruct disarmament".

762. The report drew a distinction between UNSCOM's activities before and after Lt Gen Kamil's departure from Iraq in August 1995, commenting that Iraq's subsequent disclosures:

> "… indicated that, during the first four years of its activities, the Commission had been very substantially misled by Iraq both in terms of its understanding of Iraq's > proscribed weapons programmes and the continuation of prohibited activities … Positive conclusions on Iraq's compliance … had to be revised … Analysis of the new material shaped the direction of the Commission's work including the emphasis on: obtaining verifiable evidence including physical materials or documents; investigation of the successful concealment activities by Iraq; and, the thorough verification of the unilateral destruction events."

[300] UN Security Council, 29 January 1999, 'Letter dated 25 January 1999 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) addressed to the President of the Security Council' (S/1999/94).

763. The report also stated that the Commission had been "obliged to undertake a degree of forensic work which was never intended to be the case". Iraq's "inadequate disclosures, unilateral destruction and concealment activities" had made that task more difficult and continued "in many cases" after 1995. The "concerted obstructions" raised the question of Iraq's motives.

764. UNSCOM could not verify Iraq's claims that it had fulfilled all its disarmament obligations, ceased concealment activities, and had neither proscribed weapons nor the means to make them. Despite Iraq's denials, the Commission's "strong view" was that documentation still existed in Iraq; and that its provision was "the best hope for revealing the full picture" on Iraq's activities.

765. The "priority issues" for disarmament identified in June 1998 had focused on unaccounted for weapons and "set aside other aspects such as fully verifying production capacities, research activities". This approach was based on the view that "satisfactory resolution" of the specific priority issues "would make it easier to conclude that other unverified elements were of lesser substantive importance".

766. The report added, however, that:

> "Conversely, the inability of Iraq to satisfy these issues would point to more ominous explanations for other unverified parts of Iraq's declarations."

767. The report stated that Iraq had "once considered" mobile production facilities.

768. UNSCOM described Iraq's declarations as "fraudulent" and "wholly lacking credibility". Iraq had declared in August 1995 that it had filled 25 Al Hussein missile warheads with BW agents. It also declared that 200 R-400 aerial bombs had been produced for BW purposes but the number filled with agents was a "guess". Iraq had also pursued aerial drop tanks, aerosol generators and helicopter spray tanks and there were questions about programmes for other munitions.

769. UNSCOM was concerned about the uncertainties surrounding the extent of weaponisation, the production of bulk BW agent, imports of raw materials, organisation and planning, research and development, and past and continuing efforts of deception. UNSCOM could report with confidence on the destruction of some facilities, but it had "no confidence that all bulk agents have been destroyed; that no BW munitions or weapons remain in Iraq; and that a BW capability does not still exist in Iraq."

It also raised "serious doubts" about Iraq's claim that it had "obliterated" the BW programme in 1991.[301]

770. UNSCOM recorded uncertainties about the destruction of Iraq's "special weapons", warheads for ballistic missiles filled with chemical and biological agent. It also recorded its inability to verify Iraq's destruction of seven indigenously produced Al Hussein missiles, and imports of proscribed liquid propellant and major components, particularly missile engines and guidance systems.

771. The Commission stated that actions by Iraq "in three main respects" had "had a significant negative impact upon the Commission's work". Those were:

- "Iraq's disclosure statements have never been complete".
- "… contrary to the requirement that destruction be conducted under international supervision, Iraq undertook extensive unilateral and secret destruction of large quantities of proscribed weapons and items".
- "… a practice of concealment of proscribed items … and a cover up of its activities in contravention of Council resolutions".

772. The annex on "Actions by Iraq to obstruct disarmament" stated that UNSCOM's work in Iraq had been "plagued by co-ordinated efforts to thwart full discovery of Iraq's proscribed programmes" which had begun "immediately following the adoption" of resolution 687 (1991).[302]

773. In a "brief summary" of its "current understanding of the evolution of these concealment policies and practices", the report stated:

- The Iraq Presidency had "collected reports on weapons remaining with Iraq's Armed Forces" in spring 1991.
- A "decision was taken by a high-level committee", of which Mr Aziz was a member, to provide UNSCOM with "only a portion of its proscribed weapons, their components and production capabilities and stocks".
- UNSCOM "deduced" that Iraq's policy was based on:
  - providing "a portion of their extant weapon stocks, with an emphasis on those which were least modern";
  - retaining "production capability and the 'know-how documentation' necessary to revive programmes when possible";
  - concealing "the full extent of chemical weapons programmes, including its VX project" and retaining "production equipment and raw materials";

[301] UN Security Council, 29 January 1999, 'Letter dated 25 January 1999 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) addressed to the President of the Security Council' (S/1999/94).
[302] UN Security Council, 29 January 1999, 'Letter dated 25 January 1999 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) addressed to the President of the Security Council' (S/1999/94).

  - concealing “the number and type of BW and CW warheads for proscribed missiles”;
  - concealing “indigenous long-range missile production” and retaining “production capabilities, specifically with respect to guidance systems and missile engines”; and
  - concealing “the very existence of its offensive biological weapons programme” and retaining “all production capabilities”.
- After an incident at Abu Ghraib in June 1991, when IAEA inspectors had obtained photographic evidence of retained nuclear weapons production components, Iraq had decided “in late June 1991 to eliminate some of these retained proscribed materials, on its own, and in secret and in such a way that precise knowledge about what and how much had been destroyed would not be achievable”.
- Iraq did not admit its programme of unilateral destruction until March 1992, when UNSCOM had “indicated it had evidence that Iraq retained weapons after its supervised destruction”.
- Iraq stated that “The unilateral destruction was carried out entirely unrecorded. No written and no visual records were kept, as it was not foreseen that Iraq needed to prove the destruction to anybody.”
- In 1992, UNSCOM had not recognised that the programme “was a determined measure taken to conceal evidence which would reveal retained capabilities”.
- It was only after 1995 that UNSCOM had become aware of “concerted deception efforts and was forced to re-examine the 1991-1992 period”.
- Investigations, including “extensive excavation efforts with Iraq”, “extensive interviews with Iraqi participants in the destruction”, and analysis of overhead imagery, had produced “mixed” results. There was “some evidence supporting Iraqi declarations” but other data raised “serious concerns about the true fate of proscribed weapons and items”.
- Questions arose about the reasons for Iraq’s actions including the following:
  - Iraq made an admission in August 1997 that missile launchers had been destroyed in October not July 1991.
  - The precise locations of warhead filling and destruction had been revised several times.
  - Claimed movements of concealed warheads had “been proven to be false”.
  - Explanations of concealment and movement of retained chemical weapons production equipment had been “shown to be false”.
  - Iraq had not declared the concealment of “production equipment and critical components related to Iraq’s indigenous proscribed missile programmes” in a private villa in Abu Ghraib, until March 1992, when it had been retrieved and moved by the Special Republican Guard.

- Iraq "conceded" in July 1998 that it had misled UNSCOM over the previous two years about "unilateral destruction of components for its indigenous missile engine programme".
- Imagery showed that "several shipping containers had been removed" from the Haider farm "shortly before" Iraq led UNSCOM to the site to hand over documents; and there were "clearly defined gaps" in the records handed over by Iraq in relation to WMD production techniques, the military and the Ministry of Defence.

- Iraq's deception and concealment activities involved a number of Iraqi organisations:
  - Iraq had admitted the continued involvement of the Military Industrial Corporation.
  - Direct evidence of the involvement of the Iraq General Intelligence Service, the Mukhabarat, in procurement activities was provided when imports of equipment for long-range missiles was discovered in late 1995.
  - Movements of material by the Special Republican Guards.
  - UNSCOM "assessed" that the Special Security Organisation (SSO) "appeared" to provide "overall direction" for concealment activities.
- Iraq claimed all concealment activities had been terminated in 1995.
- UNSCOM had used interviews and inspections in an attempt to elicit "a true picture of concealment actions and confirmation it had or would be ended" in 1996-1998, but "missing files, cleansed rooms, purged computers and other techniques were encountered on a regular basis at sites under inspection". Convoy movements in response to inspection activity "provided still more evidence that concealment was ongoing".
- UNSCOM had "recently" received information "from multiple sources" identifying organisations which "direct and implement the concealment effort in Iraq", which agreed that:
  - Concealment-related decisions were made "by a small committee of high ranking officials", chaired by "The Presidential Secretary, Abed Hamid Mahmoud".
  - The committee directed a unit "responsible for moving, hiding, and securing the items which are being concealed from the Commission".
  - The SSO played "a key role in the operation of this unit and in the tracking and surveillance" of UNSCOM's activities.

774. There was no mention in the report of plague.

775. An intelligence report issued in 1999 stated that the informant was unaware of any Iraqi work on plague as a BW agent.[303]

The Amorim Review

776. In late January 1999, the Security Council established three panels chaired by Mr Amorim, who was the President of the Security Council at that time:

- a panel on disarmament and current and future ongoing monitoring and verification issues which would "assess all the existing and relevant information available … relating to the state of disarmament in Iraq", and make recommendations to re-establish an effective regime;
- a panel on humanitarian issues to "assess the current humanitarian situation in Iraq and make recommendations" for improvements; and
- a panel on prisoners of war and Kuwaiti property which would "make an assessment … of Iraqi compliance" and make recommendations.[304]

777. The panel on "disarmament and current and future ongoing monitoring and verification" reported on 27 March.[305]

778. The report stated that the panel's "main objective" was "to make recommendations … on how … to reestablish an effective disarmament/ongoing monitoring and verification [OMV] regime in Iraq". To meet that remit, it had considered "refocusing … the approach towards disarmament/ongoing monitoring and verification, without departing from the existing framework of rights and obligations laid down in Security Council resolutions" as a way "to enlarge the scope of policy options" for the Council. While the panel "could not ignore the political and … legal context", its recommendations were technical.

779. The report briefly rehearsed the panel's discussions on what UNSCOM and the IAEA had achieved and the priority issues which remained, noting that "different shades of opinion were expressed". It concluded that it would be possible to pursue "the resolution of remaining issues" within an OMV framework.

780. The panel acknowledged that "some uncertainty" would be "inevitable", and the extent to which that would be acceptable would be "a policy judgement".

781. The panel suggested changes to the practices and procedures of UNSCOM to ensure an effective and credible system, including:

- restructuring the Commission as a collegiate body which could provide the Executive Chairman with independent advice, guidance and general oversight as agreed by the Security Council;
- recruiting staff as international civil servants in accordance with the provisions of the UN Charter;
- training programmes, including "Particular emphasis … on the importance of understanding national sensitivities";
- ensuring that the Commission's relationship with intelligence providers should be "one-way only";
- ensuring that public comment was "limited and restricted to the factual", leaving "political evaluations or comments that carry obvious political implications" to the Security Council.

782. The panel also noted that "the longer inspection and monitoring activities remain suspended, the more difficult the comprehensive implementation of Security Council resolutions becomes". This increased "the risk that Iraq might reconstitute its proscribed weapons programmes or retain proscribed items" and, if that risk materialised as a result of the absence of inspections, it "would have extremely negative consequences for the credibility of international non-proliferation efforts in general, and for the credibility of the United Nations and IAEA in particular".

783. The panel added that it was:

> "… essential that inspections teams return to Iraq as soon as possible. The current absence of inspectors in Iraq has exponentially increased the risk of compromising the level of assurance already achieved, since it is widely recognised that the re-establishment of the baseline [of the status of Iraq's activity] will be a difficult task. The loss of technical confidence in the system could become irretrievable."

784. The panel concluded that the "effectiveness of the monitoring and verification regime" depended on its being "comprehensive and intrusive" with the "full exercise of the rights of full and free access set forth in relevant Security Council resolutions". At the same time, the mandate should be "carried out objectively in a technically competent and thorough manner with due regard to Iraqi sovereignty, dignity and sensitivities".

785. "Given the difficulties experienced in the past" this was likely to require "firm and active support by the Security Council":

> "To be effective, any system has to be deployed on the ground, which is impossible without Iraqi acceptance. How this acceptance will be obtained is the fundamental question before the Security Council."

786. The final reports of the panels on humanitarian issues and prisoners of war and Kuwaiti property were delivered on 30 March.[306]

787. Work began in the Security Council to follow up the recommendations of the three Amorim panels, but agreement proved elusive. A number of different approaches and draft resolutions were discussed informally over the following months and it was eventually decided that the subject should be remitted to the P5, although not all the elected members were happy with that approach.[307]

788. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry:

> "Under initiatives proposed by Canada and Brazil, the Council again attempted to complete a comprehensive review of the degree of Iraqi compliance with the relevant resolutions. This laid the ground for a long negotiation, mostly between the Permanent Members of the Security Council, over the creation of a new inspection organisation for Iraq. The US and UK argued for continuation of the regime stemming from SCR 687, but with tougher measures to ensure co-operation with and access for the inspectors, under the continuing threat of sanctions if Iraq did not comply; while Russia, France and China opposed the continuation of sanctions, but were interested in getting the inspectors back into the country."[308]

Mr Blair's Chicago speech

789. In the context of a visit to the US, for a Summit in Washington to mark the 50th anniversary of NATO's creation and an attempt to persuade the US that ground forces were needed in Kosovo, Mr Blair made a widely publicised speech to the Economic Club of Chicago on 23 April 1999.[309]

790. In response to a request from Mr Jonathan Powell (Mr Blair's Chief of Staff), Sir Lawrence Freedman submitted ideas for the speech. These were set out in the attachment to Sir Lawrence's letter to Sir John Chilcot on 18 January 2010.[310]

791. Mr Blair argued that globalisation was not just economic it was also a political and security phenomenon. This meant that problems could only be addressed by international co-operation. New rules were needed for that, and new ways of organising international institutions. The time was right to work in earnest "in a serious and sustained way" on the principles of the doctrine of "international community" and on the institutions that delivered them.

792. In a reference to international security, Mr Blair identified "two dangerous and ruthless men – Saddam Hussein and Slobodan Milosevic" as the cause of "many of our problems". Iraq had been "reduced to poverty, with political life stultified through fear". Mr Blair suggested that international security should be addressed at the NATO Summit by establishing a new framework:

> "No longer is our existence as states under threat … our actions are guided by a more subtle blend of mutual self-interest and moral purpose in defending the values we cherish. In the end values and interests merge. If we can establish and spread the values of liberty, the rule of law, human rights and an open society then that is in our national interest too.
> "The most pressing foreign policy problem we face is to identify the circumstances in which we should get actively involved in other people's conflicts. Non-interference has long been considered an important principle of international order. And it is not one we would want to jettison too readily … But the principle of non-interference must be qualified …
> "So how do we decide when and whether to intervene."

793. Mr Blair set out "five major considerations" to guide such a decision:

> "First, are we sure of our case? War is an imperfect instrument for righting humanitarian distress; but armed force is sometimes the only means of dealing with dictators. Second, have we exhausted all diplomatic options? We should always give peace every chance, as we have in the case of Kosovo. Third, on the basis of a practical assessment of the situation, are there military operations we can sensibly and prudently undertake? Fourth, are we prepared for the long term? In the past, we talked too much of exit strategies. But having made a commitment we cannot simply walk away once the fight is over; better to stay with moderate numbers of troops than return for repeat performances with large numbers. And finally, do we have national interests involved?"

794. Mr Blair argued that acts of genocide could never be a purely internal matter, and that when oppression produced massive flows of refugees which unsettled neighbouring countries, that could "properly be described as 'threats to international peace and security'"; a reference to the provisions of the UN Charter (see Box, 'The Charter framework for the use of force', earlier in this Section).

795. The five considerations were not to be "absolute tests"; they were the "kind of issues we need to think about in deciding in the future when and whether we will intervene".

796. Mr Blair also argued that the new rules would only work if there were reformed international institutions to apply them and that "If we want a world ruled by law and by international co-operation then we have to support the UN as its central pillar."

797. In a message specifically to the US, Mr Blair warned that "those nations which have the power, have the responsibility" and that the US should "never fall again for the doctrine of isolationism". He added:

> "… in Britain you have a friend and an ally that will stand with you, work with you, fashion with you the design of a future built on peace and prosperity for all, which is the only dream that makes humanity worth preserving."

798. The speech attracted considerable attention and acclaim, including in the US. In his memoir, Mr Blair described it as "an explicit rejection of the narrow view of national interest".[311] The Inquiry addresses the military intervention in Iraq in relation to the principles set out in the speech and Mr Blair's message to the US in Section 3.

Cabinet discusses Iraq strategy, May 1999

799. Mr Cook and Mr Robertson circulated a Joint Memorandum on Future Strategy towards Iraq to members of DOP on 17 May 1999.[312] It set out the short, medium and long-term objectives for UK policy against a background of international concern about the adverse humanitarian impact of sanctions and a shortfall in "Oil-for-Food" revenues (US$4bn in the previous year) against assessed need (US$10.6bn per annum recommended by Mr Annan). There had been "extensive deterioration of essential infrastructure and social services, a sharp decline in industrial and agricultural output and worsening social indicators". The Joint Memorandum identified the Government's policy objectives towards Iraq since 1991 as:

> "… in the short term, to reduce the threat Saddam poses to the region, including by eliminating his Weapons of Mass Destruction (WMD) programmes; and, in the longer term, to reintegrate a territorially intact Iraq as a law-abiding member of the international community."

800. The Joint Memorandum recorded that the UK had sought to achieve those aims "by a policy of containment, through active support of UNSCOM/IAEA efforts to complete WMD disarmament in Iraq, diplomatic pressure and sanctions, backed by the threat and, as necessary, use of military force". That had been the US approach "although they flirt with a harder line".

801. On the success of that policy and its longer-term prospects, the Joint Memorandum stated:

> "Containment has kept the lid on Saddam … But containment has disadvantages: it does not produce rapid or decisive results; it is resource-intensive, requiring constant diplomatic effort and a significant military presence; and it is not always easy to justify to public opinion, as criticisms of UK/US air strikes and of the humanitarian impact of sanctions has shown."

802. Addressing future policy, the Joint Memorandum stated:

"However difficult it may become to sustain a policy of containment, it is not clear what the alternative would be. To simply walk away from the problem would be an admission of failure, and leave Saddam free to pose once more a major threat to regional security and British interests. On the other hand, a policy of trying to topple Saddam would command no useful international support …

"Containment, therefore, remains the only viable option for achieving our policy objectives. If Iraq complied with UNSCRs, we should then lift sanctions …

"If, on the other hand, Iraq does not co-operate with the UN (let alone comply with the UNSCRs), we face the prospect of indefinite containment from outside Iraq, based on sanctions, external monitoring and control, and the threat of military force if Saddam seeks to threaten his neighbours or reconstitute his WMD capabilities …"

803. The Joint Memorandum recommended that securing international support would require a willingness to agree a package of measures "which 'middle-ground' UNSC opinion would regard as reasonable". It suggested a draft UNSCR, offering a balanced package based on increasing and improving the "Oil-for-Food" programme, the prospect of permitting foreign investment in Iraq's oil infrastructure to increase output, and the possible suspension of export restrictions in return for co-operation and substantial progress towards compliance and effective arms control with some prospect of sanctions lift. The ideal would be an in-country arms control regime but "not at any price": the UK should continue to press the US to offer "light at the end of the tunnel", but not "buy Iraqi co-operation by prematurely suspending or lifting sanctions".

804. The Joint Memorandum concluded that the policy of containment remained the only viable way to pursue the UK's policy objectives. Iraq was unlikely to accept the package immediately but "might be persuaded to acquiesce eventually".

805. Ms Clare Short, the International Development Secretary, commented that containment would not solve the pressing issue of ensuring that the basic needs of the Iraqi people were met; and that, although there had been "an extensive exchange of correspondence", she hoped it would be "possible to have the opportunity to discuss these very difficult issues with Ministerial colleagues".[313] Mr Phillip Barton, a No.10 Private Secretary, advised Mr Blair that there was no need for a DOP discussion "unless you [Mr Blair] particularly want one".[314] Mr Blair endorsed the conclusions of the Joint Memorandum,[315] and a revised draft UNSCR, including language on sanctions suspension, was agreed.[316]

806. Throughout 1999, debate and negotiation continued in the UN Security Council about the degree of Iraqi compliance with UN resolutions and the creation of a new inspection organisation to replace UNSCOM against a background of growing unpopularity for sanctions and the desire of a number of States, including P5 members, to remove sanctions and resume normal relations with Iraq.

807. The deadlock on a resolution addressing all the outstanding issues on Iraq led to difficulties in agreeing the bi-annual rollover of the "Oil-for-Food" programme and the adoption, on 19 November, of resolution 1275 (1999) which extended the programme until 4 December. That was followed on 3 December by resolution 1280 (1999), which extended the regime for a further seven days to allow extra time for negotiations among the Permanent Members on a "comprehensive resolution".

808. Mr Dejammet stated that the draft resolution, which had been submitted by the US, was drafted in such a way that it would be incapable of implementation, and that France had been told that the vote was being used to bring pressure to bear on the members of the Security Council in relation to discussions on a separate resolution (the resolution which became resolution 1284).

809. Mr Tan Sri Hasmy Agam, Malaysian Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that the seven-day extension clearly established a linkage to the discussions on the comprehensive resolution. Malaysia was unhappy about the underlying assumptions of that linkage, including that the difficulties could be resolved within a week when the Permanent Members of the Council had already been discussing a draft for five months and had not reached agreement.

810. Mr Gennadi Gatilov, Russian Deputy Permanent Representative to the UN, referred to an earlier Russian draft resolution proposing an extension of UN humanitarian operations in Iraq, reflecting recommendations from the UN Secretary-General and the recommendations of the humanitarian panel chaired by Mr Amorim. Russia regarded the attempt to set "artificial time limits" on the need to reach agreement on the remaining serious problems in the comprehensive resolution as "totally inappropriate".

811. Mr Qin Huasun stated that the resolution was "mainly intended to force the Council to adopt, as soon as possible, a new omnibus resolution on Iraq". China was "extremely dissatisfied and disappointed" by the deadlock, but the unilateral military strike in December 1998 was the "main reason" the UN arms-verification programme had been suspended and those countries which had launched those strikes "should now show flexibility".

812. Resolution 1284, adopted on 17 December, welcomed the reports of the three panels chaired by Mr Amorim, which had been subject to "comprehensive consideration" by the Council, and stressed the "importance of a comprehensive approach to the full implementation of all relevant Security Council resolutions … and the need for Iraqi compliance with those resolutions".[317]

813. The resolution also acknowledged the "progress made by Iraq towards compliance with the provisions of resolution 687", but noted that "as a result of its failure to implement the relevant Council resolutions fully, the conditions do not exist which would enable the Council to take a decision … to lift the prohibitions referred to in that resolution".

814. The resolution comprised four sections: disarmament; repatriation of Kuwaiti and third-country nationals and property; the humanitarian situation; and the arrangements for considering the suspension and lifting of sanctions.

815. The provisions on disarmament included that the Security Council:

- decided to replace UNSCOM with the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC), which would operate as the Amorim panel recommended, to provide "a reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification, which will implement the plan approved by the Council in resolution 715 (1991) and address unresolved disarmament issues";
- reaffirmed the role of the IAEA;
- reaffimed the provisions of relevant resolutions requiring Iraq's compliance and affirmed that Iraq's obligations to co-operate with the Special Commission would apply in respect of UNMOVIC;
- decided "in particular" that Iraq should "allow UNMOVIC teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access" to all sites or facilities it wished to inspect and to all individuals under the authority of the Iraqi Government it wished to interview;
- requested the Secretary-General to appoint an Executive Chairman and, in consultation with him and Council members, to appoint "suitably qualified experts as a College of Commissioners for UNMOVIC" which would "meet regularly to review the implementation" of the resolution and other relevant resolutions, and "provide advice and guidance to the Executive Chairman, including on significant policy decisions and on written reports to be submitted to the Council through the Secretary-General";

- requested the Executive Chairman to put forward proposals for the organisation of UNMOVIC within 45 days of his appointment;
- decided that UNMOVIC and the IAEA would, "not later than 60 days after they have both started work in Iraq", each draw up a work programme for the discharge of their mandates for approval by the Council; the programmes would "include both the implementation of the reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification, and the key remaining disarmament tasks to be completed by Iraq pursuant to its obligations";
- further decided that what was "required of Iraq for the implementation of each task shall be clearly defined and precise";
- requested the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC and the Director General of the IAEA were also to review and update the list of items and technology controlled by resolution 1051 (1996); and
- requested the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC to "report immediately when the reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification [OMV] is fully operational in Iraq".

816. The resolution reiterated Iraq's obligations in respect of Kuwait and third-country nationals and property, and called on the Government of Iraq to resume co-operation with the Tripartite Commission and asked the Secretary-General to report to the Council every four months on Iraq's compliance.

817. The provisions on humanitarian issues included:

- abolishing the ceiling on the export of Iraq's petroleum and petroleum products by authorising States to permit the import of "any volume", notwithstanding the provisions of resolution 661 (1990);
- deciding that only items subject to the provisions of resolution 1051 (1996) would need to be submitted for approval to the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), and requesting that Committee to appoint a group of experts which would be mandated speedily to approve "contracts for the parts and equipments necessary to enable Iraq to increase its exports of petroleum and petroleum products";
- requesting the Secretary-General to maximise the benefits of the arrangement set out in resolution 986 (1995) and to ensure that all supplies under the humanitarian programme were utilised as authorised;
- calling on the Government of Iraq to:
  - "take all steps to ensure the timely and equitable distribution of humanitarian goods";
  - "address effectively the needs of vulnerable groups … without any discrimination";
  - "prioritise applications for humanitarian goods";

- "ensure that those involuntarily displaced receive humanitarian assistance"; and

- requesting the Secretary-General to establish a group of experts, to report within 100 days of the adoption of the resolution, "on Iraq's existing petroleum production and export capacity and to make recommendations … on alternatives for increasing" that capacity.

818. Finally, the resolution expressed the Council's intention "upon receipt of reports from the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC and the Director General of the IAEA" that Iraq had "co-operated in all respects with UNMOVIC and the IAEA and in particular in fulfilling the work programmes …. for a period of 120 days after" the reinforced system of OMV was reported to be fully operational, to "suspend" sanctions on the import of materials originating in Iraq or the export of items to Iraq (other than those referred to in paragraph 24 of resolution 687 (1991) or controlled by the mechanism established by resolution 1051 (1996)), "for a period of 120 days renewable by the Council". Action to suspend sanctions would be considered "no later than 12 months" from the adoption of the resolution, "provided the conditions set out" in this paragraph had been "satisfied by Iraq".

819. The draft resolution had been tabled by the UK, and many members of the Council praised the skill and perseverance of Sir Jeremy Greenstock and his delegation in producing a draft which the majority of the Council could support after almost a year of deadlock on Iraq.[318] It is clear, however, that there were still significant differences about the interpretation of the resolution and the way ahead. As a result, China, France, Malaysia and Russia abstained in the vote, but there was no veto.

820. Mr Lavrov explicitly blamed the use of force by the US and UK in December 1998 for the deadlock in the Council, stating that the action had been "provoked by the biased and tendentious report" from UNSCOM. Russian proposals in April 1999, for a draft resolution approving the recommendations of the Amorim panels and instructing the Secretary-General "to prepare practical steps for implementing them", had been "blocked by those who wanted … to continue using the burden of anti-Iraq sanctions in order to attain their own unilateral goals, going beyond the scope of United Nations decisions".

821. Mr Lavrov welcomed the provisions to suspend sanctions, the "radical improvements in the humanitarian programme", and the measures related to speeding up action on missing persons and Kuwaiti property. He also welcomed the corrections to "harmful provisions" in previous drafts of the resolution, including:

- removing the "discredited argument about full co-operation"; Russia had "always stressed that the wording 'full co-operation'" was "extremely dangerous", and "Nobody has forgotten that it was under the pretext of an absence of full co-operation from Iraq that the former Special Commission provoked large-scale strikes by the United States and Great Britain against Iraq in December last year, circumventing the Security Council";

- introducing a "clarification … to the effect that progress on the remaining disarmament tasks – not their virtual completion – would be grounds for assessing the conditions necessary to the suspension of sanctions"; vague wording in an earlier draft would have "provided certain members of the Council" with "an opportunity to … require virtually full completion of the key disarmament tasks … and then, on that pretext, to postpone suspension endlessly";
- removing wording about "control of the financial aspects of the suspension, which essentially predetermined the continuation of the sanctions regime in another guise"; and
- spelling out more clearly the reference to Chapter VII "so as not to provide any legal grounds for unilateral actions of force against Iraq contrary to positions held in the Security Council".

822. Russia could not support the draft resolution because of "deficiencies of the draft resolution and some hidden dangers that remain" and it would "not forget that certain countries still have their own agendas with respect to Iraq that may be at variance with the collective position of the Security Council". The Council had "never authorized the establishment of the 'No-Fly Zones'", nor had it authorised "subversive acts against the Iraqi Government". If the Council sought "truly new approaches … to a long-term settlement in the Gulf, such illegal, unilateral actions must end".

823. But Russia had decided "not to hinder" adoption of the resolution because "serious changes" had been introduced which offered "an opportunity to break the Iraqi stalemate".

824. Mr Lavrov warned:

> "The fact that we are not blocking the adoption of this imperfect draft resolution should not be taken to indicate that we are obliged to play along with attempts to impose its forcible implementation …
> "… Judging from existing objective assessments, Iraq is already no threat to international and regional peace and security. In any event, no concrete proof has been submitted to the Council in recent years.
> "It is now up to the Security Council to act objectively and in an unbiased way …
> "… it is important that … it has been possible to avoid a split … and to confirm the key role of the Council in the political settlement of the most important problems of the world today … Russia will continue to do its utmost to strengthen that role."

825. Mr Hasmy stated that the issue before the Council was "not just … asserting its authority and reclaiming its credibility … but equally importantly … restoring confidence and trust between the Council and Iraq". The draft resolution did not incorporate concerns expressed by Malaysia and others, including:

- the omission of financial modalities;
- the vague language "full of conditionalities" in respect of the triggering of suspensions;
- the absence of a definite benchmark or timeframe for the final lifting of sanctions;
- the indefinite continuation of the sanctions which violated "the very spirit and purposes" of the UN Charter;
- the improvements in arrangements for humanitarian programmes which were "selective" and would "only lead to incremental improvements and address a small fraction of the needs of the Iraqi people"; and
- Malaysia's proposal that the Council should give a hearing to Iraq's views, on the basis that "engaging Iraq, rather than isolating and demonizing it".

826. The draft resolution was:

> "… driven largely by political, rather than humanitarian, considerations. It is aimed at keeping Iraq under continued isolation rather than bringing it out into the mainstream of international life … The language of the draft resolution is ambiguous in some important parts, so that it may lend itself to unilateral interpretation and/or action in its implementation, which must be avoided."

827. Mr Qin Huasun stated that three core issues would have to be addressed in formulating new policies on Iraq:

- An "objective, impartial, transparent and accountable" inspection commission should replace UNSCOM which "under the leadership of its previous Executive Chairman … continuously concealed information from the Council, deceived and misled the Council and even went so far as to act presumptuously without authorisation by the Council, thus playing a dishonourable role in triggering the crisis".
- The remaining disarmament issues should be "defined clearly and precisely and resolved gradually and effectively".
- There was "an urgent need to relieve the … tremendous, inhumane suffering" of the people of Iraq.

828. Mr Qin Huasun added that those issues could be resolved only if the resolution could be implemented; and that was "highly questionable" because it did not give Iraq the "light at the end of the tunnel". The Council was being "rushed … into action" which would "not help to resolve" the issue. Nor would it "really help to preserve the authority and role of the Council". There had been "a worrying trend" over the past year. Iraq and Kosovo had "clearly demonstrated that the wilful use of force, especially unilateral actions taken without the Council's authorisation", severely damaged the status and authority of the Council and complicated the situation.

829. Mr Qin Huasun concluded by calling for an end to the NFZs, which flew "in the face of international law and the authority of the Council".

830. Mr Dejammet stated that France had observed in January 1999 that the top priority was the restoration of security and stability with the "long-term presence on the ground of professional inspectors" to prevent the arming of Iraq and ensuring that sanctions did not punish the Iraqi population. The Council had agreed that the "relationship between Iraq and the United Nations needed to be set on a new footing".

831. Mr Dejammet stated that the draft resolution called upon Iraq "to accept the return of the inspectors without knowing what arrangement will exist in the period after suspension". If the interpretations of the text diverged, the Chairman of the new Commission would not be able to carry out his mandate and it was not clear how the Council would be able to reach a decision on when sanctions should be suspended.

832. Mr Burleigh stated that the resolution did not raise the bar on what was required of Iraq on disarmament, but nor did it lower it. There was no lack of clarity about the sequence of events, Iraq's compliance "must precede all else". Identifying the "key remaining disarmament tasks" needed to be addressed. If Iraq fulfilled those tasks and met the requirements in the resolution:

> "… the Council, including the United States, can decide whether to recognize that co-operation and compliance by suspending sanctions.
> "Similarly, if Iraq meets the full range of obligations … the Council can make a decision regarding the lifting of sanctions."

833. Mr Burleigh added that the US was "not seeking an excuse to use force", but Iraq held the key. The US had "no illusion that the Iraqi regime" was "likely to change its spots". Compliance was "highly unlikely" while Saddam Hussein remained in power.

834. Mr Burleigh also stated that, before sanctions could be suspended, there would be a need to decide the exact terms for lifting prohibitions to "prevent any revenues from being diverted for prohibited purposes" and "effective control measures" for civilian imports into Iraq were of the "utmost importance".

835. Mr Jassim Mohammed Buallay, Bahraini Permanent Representative to the UN, drew attention to the fact that Iraq "had already declared its total rejection of the resolution".

836. Mr Peter van Walsum, Dutch Permanent Representative to the UN, said that the statements of the Iraqi authorities gave no indication that they would be prepared to co-operate "other than on the basis of an unconditional lifting of the sanctions, and no member of the Council has shown any readiness to meet that condition". He also disputed the suggestion that Iraq could not see light at the end of the tunnel. The existing resolutions already clearly illuminated "the exit" and the present resolution added "significantly to that by offering Iraq a possible suspension of sanctions well before full compliance". But co-operation was not "a question of attitude" but about "performance"; and he thought it was "not realistic to expect an early positive signal from Baghdad".

837. Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated that holding Iraq to its obligations and containing the threat to the peace and security of the region was "one of the most important responsibilities of the international community, and in particular of the Security Council". Throughout 1999, the Council had worked to find a "new approach" to business with Iraq which was "firmly set in the framework of a collective responsibility exercised within the United Nations". The resolution preserved "the original disarmament standards for Iraq" and met humanitarian concerns while belatedly recognising "just how dire Iraq's response has been to its obligations with regard to missing Kuwaiti citizens and property". "Most significantly", it set out "a series of clear, logical steps, using the new concept of suspension to bring Iraq out of sanctions and back into the international community". But that would happen "only if Iraq at last begins to act according to the rules of international law"; and its track record and recent rhetoric were "hardly encouraging".

838. Sir Jeremy concluded by calling for full support in the Council in bringing the provisions of the mandatory resolution into effect, for the benefit of "the peoples of Iraq and of the region" and in the "interests of the future authority" of the UN.

839. The UK's short-term objective had been "an agreed Security Council approach on the way forward … allowing us to draw a line under the differences which developed over Operation Desert Fox".[319]

840. A note for No.10 on the background to the inspections process, produced in March 2002 by FCO Research Analysts, stated that the "main feature" of resolution 1284 was that it offered Iraq "a suspension of sanctions in return for co-operation with the weapons inspectors, including progress on key disarmament tasks", in contrast to resolution 687 (1991) which offered lifting of sanctions "only when the inspectors say disarmament is complete".[320] Iraq regarded the latter as "an unattainable goal", claiming that the resolution was "so ambiguous" that the US could "easily deny" that co-operation had been "adequate".

841. The paper also stated:

> "We recognise there are ambiguities … They are there for a good reason: the P5 was unable to reach agreement. If positions remain as entrenched as they were during … negotiations, there is little prospect of the situation changing …"

842. Mr Ekéus commented to the Inquiry that the Security Council had "dissolved … arguably [the] most successful inspection regime in disarmament history" and suggested it was "the British Government and its Foreign Secretary Robin Cook that enforced the dissolution of UNSCOM … in spite of American doubts and hesitations".[321]

UNMOVIC begins work

843. Dr Hans Blix, the Director General of the IAEA until November 1997, was appointed Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC and took up his appointment in New York on 1 March 2000.

844. Dr Blix wrote:

> "The inspectors were gone. The sanctions were condemned by a broad world opinion and … they had become less painful, and were eroding … The revenues from the Oil-for-Food Program provided many billions of dollars and huge purchase orders were so placed as to produce maximum political benefit – or punishment."[322]

845. In an interview published in March 2000, Mr Ekéus stated that UNSCOM had been "highly successful", but had not destroyed "everything"; and the "contradictions" in Iraq's declarations meant that there was "reason to be careful".[323] There was "new information about procurement efforts by Iraq" and useful information from individuals who had left Iraq.

846. Mr Ekéus added that, in his view, there were "no large quantities of weapons". Iraq was not "especially eager in the biological and chemical area to produce such weapons for storage" because it viewed them as "tactical assets" and its aim was "to keep the capability to start up production immediately should it need to".

847. Mr Ekéus stated that it was "striking" that resolution 1284 (1999) said "nothing about investigation and elimination" of Iraq's prohibited weapons, but focused on monitoring activities. The Security Council was trying to get UNMOVIC "to be more precise" about its tasks. He considered that Iraq would "probably co-operate" if it judged the provisions on suspending sanctions were acceptable. The unity of the Security Council was essential; political problems in the Council were "the single, dominant and only reason" for the failure of UNSCOM.

848. In his statement to the Inquiry, Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote:

> "In 2000, little new work was done on Iraq, with the Security Council largely exhausted with the subject … Sanctions continued, but the regime remained vulnerable to Iraqi non-co-operation and deceit and the feeling that sanctions were gradually unravelling increasingly took hold internationally. The Oil-for-Food programme also attracted greater criticism because of the loopholes and corruption which surrounded the handling of the programme in Iraq. And the Security Council remained divided."[324]

849. Sir Jeremy also wrote that UNMOVIC had stronger investigative powers than UNSCOM and that the abstentions had diminished the political force of the resolution.

850. Mr Tom McKane, Principal Private Secretary to the Defence Secretary from 1997 to 1999 and subsequently the Deputy Head of the Overseas and Defence Secretariat in the Cabinet Office from 1999 to 2002, told the Inquiry that the resolution was:

"… designed to make progress on controlling Iraq's WMD while at the same time alleviating the impact of sanctions on the Iraqi people by lifting the ceiling on Iraq's oil exports under the Oil-for-Food programme".[325]

851. Mr McKane subsequently told the Inquiry that, after resolution 1284 until the spring of 2001, there was a sense that Iraq was in "a more manageable state" and "didn't need urgent day-to-day attention".[326]

852. The UK's short-term objective in 1999 had been "an agreed Security Council approach on the way forward, allowing us to draw a line under the differences which developed over Operation Desert Fox".[327]

853. Although resolution 1284 was a step forward for the Security Council and a hard-won compromise, it did not bridge the gap between opposing viewpoints.

Introduction

1. This Section addresses:

- the development of the UK's Security Sector Reform (SSR) strategies, policies and plans;
- the decision to disband the Iraqi Army;
- the UK contribution to US-led SSR strategy developed in Baghdad;
- the implementation of SSR in the South of Iraq; and
- the deployment of UK police officers to Iraq.

2. This Section does not address:

- broader planning and preparation for the conflict in Iraq and its aftermath, which is described in Section 6.5;
- the decision to remove some members of the Ba'ath Party from public office after May 2003, a process known as de-Ba'athification, which is described in Section 11.1;
- the UK contribution to the reconstruction of Iraq, which is described in Sections 10.1 to 10.3; or
- the wider deployment of civilians to Iraq, which is described in Section 15.1.

Definition of terms

Security Sector Reform

The term "Security Sector Reform" (SSR) is used in this report to refer to work to rebuild and reform Iraq's security and justice institutions. The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) defines SSR as development work that helps societies to "escape from a downward spiral wherein insecurity, crime and underdevelopment are mutually reinforcing".[1]

The OECD defines the security and justice sectors to include the following:

- core security actors (for example, armed forces, police, gendarmerie,[2] border guards, customs and immigration, and intelligence and security services);
- security management and oversight bodies (for example, ministries of defence and internal affairs);
- justice and law enforcement institutions (for example, the judiciary, prisons, prosecution services, traditional justice systems); and
- non-statutory security forces (for example, guerrilla armies and private militias).

[1] OECD DAC, Handbook on Security System Reform, 2007.
[2] A gendarmerie is a military force charged with policing duties in a civilian population.

The term "Security Sector Reform" is not used consistently, and is sometimes used interchangeably with phrases such as "security system reform" and "Rule of Law". The term "Rule of Law" is often used to refer specifically to the justice sector.

Disarmament, Demobilisation and Reintegration

Disarmament, Demobilisation and Reintegration (DDR) programmes are designed to improve security and stability in post-conflict environments.[3] DDR aims to deal with the post-conflict security problem that arises when those who were fighting in a conflict (combatants such as soldiers or militia) are left without livelihoods or support networks.

DDR programmes usually include a process of removing weapons from combatants, taking combatants out of military structures and helping them to reintegrate into society, sometimes including integration into new security structures.

Iraqi Security Forces and Iraqi Police Service

The Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) includes both the Iraqi Army and the Iraqi Police Service (IPS). However, these terms are not used consistently and the ISF is sometimes used to refer solely to the Iraqi Army.

Police officers

For the purposes of the Report, the Inquiry has used the terms "civilians" and "police officers" but not "civilian police officers". That adheres to the widespread distinction between police officers from the wide range of staff working within police forces who are civilians.

Some of the documents referenced in the Report refer to "civilian police officers" as a way of describing serving police officers seconded to Iraq. It appears that this description is to draw a distinction between the military police (Royal Military Police and Ministry of Defence police) and police officers from territorial forces in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. While the Inquiry may have reproduced the term "civilian police officers" (sometimes abbreviated to CivPol) in footnotes or in direct quotes, it has otherwise referred to "police officers" or "military police officers" in order to establish the same distinction.

Pre-conflict consideration of SSR

3. Planning and preparation for the post-conflict period is described in detail in Section 6.5. One of the earliest references to SSR in Iraq identified by the Inquiry is in a paper prepared for the Chiefs of Staff Strategic Think Tank on Iraq on 18 June 2002.[4] The paper, by the Ministry of Defence (MOD) Strategic Planning Group (SPG), was circulated to a limited number of senior MOD addressees.

[4] Minute Driver to PSO/CDS, 13 June 2002, 'Supporting Paper for COS Strategic Think Tank on Iraq – 18 June' attaching Paper [SPG], 12 June 2002, [untitled].

4. The paper identified "post-conflict strategy" as one of eight components of a UK military strategy for Iraq, recognising the need to "acknowledge that there will be a post-conflict phase with an associated commitment, manpower and finance bill". Development of an SSR model, support for training and provision of equipment were identified as tasks to be undertaken in the "medium term (six months to two years)".

5. From 20 September, the Cabinet Office-led Ad Hoc Group on Iraq (AHGI) co-ordinated all non-military cross-government work on post-conflict issues. The creation and role of the AHGI is addressed in Section 2.

6. In preparation for the first meeting of the AHGI, Mr Jim Drummond, Assistant Head (Foreign Affairs) of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), wrote to Mr Desmond Bowen, Deputy Head of OD Sec, suggesting departmental responsibilities for different strands of post-conflict planning.[5] Mr Drummond proposed that reform of the security sector and civil service should be led by the MOD and the Department for International Development (DFID).

7. On 27 September, the AHGI discussed a Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) paper on scenarios for the future of Iraq.[6] The paper stated:

> "… we would not expect the armed forces and security services to switch allegiance to any new government en masse in the event of wholesale regime change. It is more likely that key tribal leaders would seek to establish tribal/regional power bases."

8. The paper concluded that, in order to achieve its overarching priorities, the UK should "if possible avoid the root and branch dismantling of Iraq's governmental and security structures".

9. The AHGI called for the material on SSR in the paper to be expanded.[7]

10. The following week, the FCO produced a paper entitled 'Models for Administering a Post-Saddam Iraq'.[8] Early drafts described the military challenge of providing security, including starting a Disarmament, Demobilisation and Reintegration (DDR) programme (see Box, 'Definition of terms', earlier in this Section), but did not address comprehensive reform of the security sector.

11. A later version of the paper, provided to the AHGI on 11 October, contained an additional recommendation that:

> "… the US and Coalition partners would need to retain overall responsibility for Iraq's security for some time after the conflict. How the different security-related tasks (including Security Sector Reform) should be carried out and by whom needs further consideration."[9]

12. The record of the 11 October AHGI meeting did not mention SSR.[10] A document describing "contingency planning work" circulated alongside it recorded that the FCO was drafting a paper on the topic.

13. During October and November 2002, the FCO produced several drafts of a paper on SSR.[11] An early version, forwarded to the Cabinet Office on 18 October, listed a range of post-conflict security issues that would need to be addressed in Iraq, including:

- What security structures would be appropriate for a post S[addam] H[ussein] Iraqi Government? How do we arrive at an answer? What are the threats, internal and external? Should we undertake a comprehensive review of the armed forces?
- To what extent do the size, task and organisation of the new security structures depend on whether Iraq develops into a federation?
- To what extent should the Kurds be integrated into the national structures? How might this be achieved?
- How do we replace an excessively large security apparatus with something 'right sized'? Reform or abolition? Which parts of the security apparatus might be loyal to a new government and which not?
- To what extent should we punish those members of the security apparatus who have committed crimes against the Iraqi people (eg torture)?
- Are we obliged to work with the new Iraqi Government on SSR or can it be imposed?
- How do we reform the working culture of the security sector so that it operates on the basis of humanitarian values in support of legitimate government?
- How can we resettle or rehabilitate those pre-Saddam individuals removed from the security sector so that they do not work clandestinely for the re-establishment of a S[addam] H[ussein]-type regime?"

14. The draft FCO paper on SSR informed a Cabinet Office paper of 1 November which explored what Iraq could look like after Saddam Hussein.[12] The Cabinet Office paper drew together strands of work from across Government and was written as a steering brief for talks on post-conflict issues in Washington with the US and Australia.

15. The paper assumed that the international community and UN would be willing to assist with reconstruction. Following a period of transitional military government (up to six months), the UN was expected to "rule" Iraq for about three years. SSR planning was considered in the context of preparation for a UN administration.

16. The paper stated:

> "There will need to be a Security Sector Reform process … Having dismantled Saddam's security apparatus, there will need to be a new one. This will require a comprehensive plan agreed with and led by the US. The judiciary will need a total rebuild as will the police. Decisions will need to be taken on the size and scope of the Army and intelligence services."

17. The first round of talks between the US and UK on post-conflict planning took place in Washington on 6 November.[13] Reporting on the talks to Sir David Manning, the Prime Minister's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of the OD Sec, Mr Drummond wrote:

> "We are agreed on the need for rapid and comprehensive reform of existing security structures. Very few of the many current structures can be allowed to remain. We can expect the US to maintain a tight grip on this, but urged them to think about the wider security sector including police and the need to arrive with a plan (ie not as in Afghanistan)."

18. Mr Drummond chaired a meeting of the AHGI on 8 November.[14] The Washington talks were discussed in the meeting, but SSR was not.

19. In mid-December, the FCO Middle East Department produced a paper describing different models of interim administration for Iraq.[15] That was shared with the US on 12 December. The FCO identified "initiating Security Sector Reform, especially the reform of the police" as a "key element" that any international administration would need to address in the short term.

20. The FCO Middle East Department explored further the issue of SSR in a separate paper which was completed on 10 December.[16]

21. The final version of that SSR paper was produced in consultation with officials from the MOD and DFID.[17]

22. As in earlier drafts, the paper did not propose how to conduct SSR, but instead sought to identify which issues would need to be addressed by an SSR strategy.[18] Building on the earlier paper, it listed the issues in six categories:

- What security structures would be appropriate? That should be based on an assessment of the internal and external threats to Iraq, as well as consideration of its future constitutional shape and the relative affordability of its armed forces.
- Who should be in charge? The organisation of the international body that would manage SSR activity should be given a high priority, "ideally before military action". That body would need to interact closely with the post-conflict interim administration.
- Methodology. To what extent could reform be imposed by the US military or UN-led government, and how far should the exclusion of members of the Tikriti clan (Saddam Hussein's clan) be taken?
- DDR. Reducing the "bloated security sector" raised questions about resettling those who had been removed and identifying mechanisms to bring perpetrators of crimes against humanity to justice.
- Qualitative and quantitative change. How to reform the working culture of the security sector, "particularly the police and the courts, so that it operates on the basis of humanitarian values in support of a legitimate government"?
- Accountability. The new SSR structures should "ideally" be accountable to civilian control. Enshrining the principle of civilian oversight would be "key to establishing a fully accountable security apparatus".

23. The FCO offered some "provisional" conclusions, including:

- From the outset, SSR should be at the centre of post-conflict work, rather than outside it as happened in Afghanistan … we should begin discussing the mechanism for the international community's engagement in SSR before military action begins.
- As any SSR plan will have to address a number of complicated issues, we should set up a UK working group now to start the detailed assessment to enable us to engage with the US (and the academic community in the UK) on SSR.
- The new Iraqi administration should be involved as early as possible in the process so as to feel ownership of the new structures.

- There are some security organisations, staffed with Tikritis and Saddam's kinsmen and with a record of oppression, which should have no further future in a post-S[addam] H[ussein] Iraq.
- We need to find out more about the civilian police and the judiciary.
- Ministers will need to decide the level of engagement of the UK in SSR, given our limited and stretched resources."

24. The paper was tabled as a living document "open to comment and improvement" at the AHGI meeting on 13 December.[19] The AHGI was told that "a Whitehall working group on SSR in Iraq has now been established and can undertake further work". The SSR paper was one of four that the FCO had handed to Mr Zalmay Khalilzad, US National Security Council (NSC) Senior Director and Ambassador at Large to the Iraqi Opposition, "in an attempt to shape US thinking".

25. The second series of meetings between the UK, US and Australia to discuss post-conflict planning took place on 22 January 2003.[20] In preparation, the FCO Middle East Department drafted an "Annotated Agenda/overarching paper". That was submitted to Mr Jack Straw, Foreign Secretary, for approval of the "general line" that the UK proposed to take in discussion.

26. On SSR, the paper stated:

> "Our handling of the defeated Iraqi forces will be critical. We shall need a DDR plan for them, consistent with our vision for the future of Iraq's armed forces. Experience in Sierra Leone and Afghanistan has shown that we need to ensure consistency between first steps and a longer-term vision on Security Sector Reform. As well as ensuring the efficient use of our own resources, we shall want to find a way to allow partners to join in SSR implementation. Does this work require new impetus?"

27. Mr Straw approved the recommendations on 20 January. He reported that Mr Colin Powell, US Secretary of State, had told him the US working assumption was that the US and UK would be in Iraq for a long time after military action.[21]

28. The FCO paper was also shared with the US and Australia.[22]

29. On 16 January, Mr Tony Brenton, Deputy Head of Mission at the British Embassy Washington, wrote to Mr Elliott Abrams, Senior Director for Near East and North African Affairs in the US NSC, to propose a draft agenda for the talks, attaching a copy of the paper.[23] The first suggested agenda item was security. “Key issues” for discussion included:

- how to dismantle Iraq’s secret security agencies, and to handle the defeated armed forces?
- how to provide legitimate and transparent law and order, and the necessary civil structures to deliver them?
- the co-operation of the Iraqi police …
- longer-term Security Sector Reform and DDR planning.”

30. Reporting to Mr Straw after the talks, Mr Edward Chaplin, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa, said that the exchanges had gone “better than expected”, but also explained that “as we suspected, apart from on humanitarian relief and immediate post-conflict reconstruction, the US have not yet made much progress on a lot of the day-after agenda”.[24]

31. No discussion of SSR was recorded in reports of the Washington talks to Ms Clare Short, International Development Secretary, or Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary.[25] Neither was it referred to in the reporting telegram from the Embassy.

32. An FCO official who attended the talks reported to Mr Dominick Chilcott in the Middle East Department that the “key message” was that Mr Donald Rumsfeld, US Secretary of Defense, had ordered his staff to plan both the military and civil administration of Iraq, and that this work was “going ahead fast, whether we like it or not”.[26] Plans were expected to be signed off in about a week’s time. Once that had happened, the official judged that it would be “very difficult to reverse what had been decided”.

33. Following the talks, Mr Drummond proposed that six working groups should be established to “pursue issues which require further planning”.[27] None of those groups were tasked to consider planning for SSR.

34. On 20 January, the MOD Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ) proposed the creation of a 'Common Document' to provide a framework for UK Phase IV[28] planning.[29] That was conceived as a "cross-Government agreed UK 'manifesto', from which we would be able to guide subsequent engagement with the US". It would also provide a "mechanism for systematically identifying issues that needed to be resolved".

35. The draft described a number of elements of SSR work, including:

- disarmament/demobilisation and the future shape of the military;
- aspirations for the criminal justice system; and
- consideration of the military role in police mentoring.

36. The Chiefs of Staff discussed the Common Document at their meeting on 29 January and concluded that it "would establish a framework UK policy, which would … provide guidance to the embedded UK staffs charged with influencing US thinking".[30]

37. The same day, Mr Bowen shared a draft paper on UK campaign objectives for Iraq with Sir David Manning.[31] The paper identified a number of "immediate military priorities" for the Coalition in the aftermath of hostilities, including "lay plans for the reform of Iraq's security forces". Mr Bowen commented that "it will be important … that we share the same military objectives with the US, otherwise the strategic direction of the campaign risks falling apart". The objectives are addressed in further detail in Section 6.5.

38. On 4 February, Mr Drummond proposed that a special meeting on "aftermath" should replace the AHGI scheduled for 7 February.[32] That meeting would be used to co-ordinate a response to two US planning papers on post-war reconstruction and would also cover the "state of preparedness" on a range of issues, including an agenda item on SSR.

39. The AHGI appears to have used the meeting to focus on preparing key messages on post-conflict issues for Mr Hoon and Sir David Manning's visit to Washington the following week.[33]

40. A meeting about the post-conflict period took place at PJHQ offices on 5 February.[34] To support the discussion, PJHQ tabled a paper entitled 'Iraq – Phase IV Subjects'.[35]

41. That document described for the first time some of the short and medium-term SSR objectives for the post-conflict management of Iraq. Following the US planning of the time, those were divided into a "stabilisation" phase covering the first six months and a "reconstruction" phase covering months six to 18.

42. The desired end state for the military and security forces was to have laid:

> "… plans for the reform of Iraq's security forces … Security Sector Reform (SSR) … to include the restructuring of the intelligence agencies, armed forces, police and criminal justice system. All elements of the Security Sector to be affordable and accountable."

43. The military and security objectives for the UK during the stabilisation phase were described as:

- all units of Iraqi military have been accounted for and (if appropriate) disarmed;
- stability, law and order in Iraq; and
- inter-agency or international organisation efforts to reorganise and train Iraqi law enforcement agencies begun (supported by the UK).

44. The military and security objectives for the UK during the reconstruction phase were described as:

- reform of Iraqi Armed Forces under way, with a view to organisations able to defend Iraq without threatening Iraqi citizens or neighbours;
- elimination of the Iraqi NSC and the Iraqi Special Security Organisations;
- exploitation and subsequent disbandment of the Directorate of General Security, the Directorate of General Intelligence, the Miltary Security Service, the Special Republican Guard, and Saddam's Martyrs (Fedayeen Saddam); and
- vetting and reintegration of acceptable elements of the Republican Guard Forces Command, regular army and police.

45. The desired end state for law enforcement was to have: "Rule of Law established. Police reformed and conforming to human rights."

46. The law enforcement objectives for the UK during the stabilisation phase were described as:

- early implementation of a clear plan for development of Iraqi police;
- framework to provide military provision of law enforcement within UK Area of Operations (see Box, 'Area of Operations and Area of Responsibility', later in this Section); and
- police vetted and initial capability established.

47. The law enforcement objectives for the UK during the reconstruction phase were described as:

- responsibility for law enforcement passed back to Iraqi police; and
- joint police/military police, transitioning to police operating alone.

48. The desired end state for justice was to have a reformed legal system established under vetted judiciary, with unjustly jailed prisoners released.

49. The justice enforcement objectives for the UK during the stabilisation phase were described as:

- martial law in place for minimum time possible;
- new laws agreed and promulgated;
- judges vetted, and unsuitable judges removed;
- military management of prisons; and
- unjustly jailed prisoners released.

50. The law enforcement objectives for the UK during the reconstruction phase were described as:

- Iraqi legal system up and running before transmission. International mentoring system provided to support judges.
- If possible, management of prisons passed over to Iraqi citizens. If not possible, support programme to re-establish in UK AO.

51. On 7 February 2003, Mr Peter Ricketts, FCO Political Director, informed Mr Straw that there was inter-departmental agreement that "the FCO should lead policy work on planning for post-conflict Iraq".[36]

52. There were two sections in different directorates within the FCO that had a role in relation to SSR:

- the Iraq Planning Unit (IPU); and
- the United Nations Department (UND), which had previous experience recruiting and deploying UK police for UN missions.[37]

53. Lord Jay, the FCO Permanent Under Secretary from 2002 to 2006, told the Inquiry:

> "I cannot recollect any discussions specifically about policing, nor have I been able to come across any papers."[38]

Iraq Planning Unit

The Iraq Planning Unit (IPU) was established on 10 February with Mr Dominick Chilcott, FCO Middle East Department as its head. Its remit was "to develop policy guidance to enable the administration of Iraq pending the appointment of a transitional civil administration, consistent as far as possible with the longer-term vision for the future of Iraq".[39] Mr Bowen, defining the purpose of the Unit, wrote:

> "They would need to work their way, with the US, through issues as diverse as humanitarian relief, policing, administration of justice, local government and provision of utilities, environmental recovery and priorities for the return to normality."

The IPU was inter-departmental but based in the FCO.[40]

54. On 12 February, responsibility for the 'Iraq Stage IV Subjects Document' was transferred to the newly formed inter-departmental IPU.[41]

55. On 29 January, Mr Peter Gooderham, Political Counsellor at the British Embassy Washington, reported that the NSC had asked whether the UK, as one of the Occupying Powers, would be willing to take lead responsibility for reforming the Iraqi judicial system and Iraqi Police Service (IPS).[42] The NSC said that the justice sector would be run by the military Coalition in the immediate aftermath, but the Iraqis should "regain responsibility for law and order as quickly as possible". That was described as having "something up and running within 60 days". The UK would be "best suited" to take on this role because of its "wealth of experience and expertise".

56. On 31 January, the UND submitted advice to Mr Straw, alerting him to the request and stating that "this would be a massive undertaking, with implications for the UK's role as an 'Occupying Power', that should more properly be an international effort mandated by the UN".[43]

57. Mr Straw commented that the UK "should help the US on police and judicial matters as much as possible", but "this help has to be on the basis of what is practical".[44]

58. On 4 February, Mr Drummond wrote to Mr Chilcott following a meeting between the Cabinet Office, the FCO, the MOD and DFID to consider the US request.[45] He observed that the management of the Iraqi police and judicial system in the first 60 days of Occupation would "condition the longer term". The UK would need to know more about:

- Whether the US envisaged dismantling the Ba'ath Party.[46] While this is probably justified it would leave big gaps in the apparatus of the State.
- How much of the Saddam Hussein security structure they [the US] plan to retain.
- Whether the US envisaged a Kosovo style pillar structure, with a Coalition member leading each part. If so, what were the other pillars and who had been invited to lead them.
- What would the UN role be? We would need the UN to legitimise Security Sector Reforms. We accept that the UN would not deliver in time to manage the initial 60 days, but could play a useful role in the medium term on all aspects of judicial reform."

59. It was agreed at the meeting that Mr Chilcott would pursue those questions in Washington at the next round of talks on 5 February between the UK, US and Australia. The issue would then be considered at a meeting on 7 February. If it was decided to "proceed further", a scoping exercise would be undertaken by DFID, the MOD and "probably" the Home Office.

60. The British Embassy Washington's report of the talks on 5 February did not mention the proposal of the US that the UK take lead responsibility in reform of the judicial system and the IPS.[47]

61. On 10 February, Mr Drummond wrote to Mr Chilcott to share a draft of "key messages for the Defence Secretary and David Manning to put to Donald Rumsfeld and Condi Rice [Dr Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's National Security Advisor]".[48] The US request that the UK lead on the IPS and judiciary was not addressed in the paper.

62. On 12 February, in a brief written to prepare Mr Straw for a meeting with Mr Blair on "Day After issues", the FCO advised that the UK was still considering whether it should accept the US request that it become "lead nation on justice throughout Iraq".[49] The FCO stated that "it would be very difficult to do this without a UNSC [UN Security Council] Resolution authorising a transitional administration".

> "We have asked for clarification of whether they see this as a short term revival of existing structures minus the Ba'ath influence or a much longer term reform agenda."

64. The following week, Mr Chilcott informed Mr Straw that an assessment of UK capabilities in the field of police and judicial reform had been sent to the US, and that a minute on the subject was in preparation, but was awaiting "greater clarity on UK commitments".[51] In an accompanying document, Mr Chilcott described the UK position as:

> "No commitment, but UK could consider providing support for UN-led justice sector reform, providing we had the right UN cover."

65. Mr Straw responded the following day without comment on the UK's role in judicial reform.[52] The Government has been unable to supply evidence of any further consideration of the US request.

SSR planning during the build-up to invasion

66. In February and early March 2003, the main effort within the FCO and No.10 was the pursuit of a further UN Security Council Resolution, as described in Section 3.7. During this period, much of the debate around post-conflict management of Iraq focused on the prospect of the UK taking responsibility for a geographical region following the invasion, as described in Section 6.5.

67. The MOD Iraq Secretariat briefed Mr Hoon on 10 February ahead of a visit to Washington.[53] They advised that US aftermath planning was "impressive on details", but "riddled with holes at the political and strategic levels". The MOD identified a number of factors for consideration:

> "SSR will be a huge issue, both in dismantling the current infrastructure and growing a new one. Will the US look to the current Iraqi police to maintain law and order, or will it train a new force? If US AID [Agency for International Development] are legally prevented from paying police or military salaries, how will SSR be funded prior to the utilisation of oil revenues? What will the new security apparatus look like, and how can it (particularly internal security organs) be made transparent and > accountable? … At a tactical level, UK forces will need guidance on how to treat various wings of the Iraqi security infrastructure as they are encountered in country."

68. On 11 February, Mr Mike O'Brien, FCO Minister of State for the Middle East, was briefed on "Day After issues".[54] That included detail on SSR preparations. On policing, Mr O'Brien was told that the UK's experience in other areas, such as Bosnia, "should mean we would be well placed to share our expertise with the US and help influence their thinking on the issue". A scoping paper "which could be shared with the US" on the establishment of an independent Iraqi judiciary was also commissioned.

69. More broadly, the briefing stated:

> "It was agreed that the US saw themselves as the lead nation. On Security Sector Reform, we should ensure that we feed in to their decision making process. We could suggest leading on those areas where we have expertise eg: good governance."

70. On 14 February, Mr Drummond produced a note for Sir David Manning on "key messages for the US" which outlined a number of decisions that needed to be taken.[55] On SSR he wrote:

> "If we are not to replicate the problems seen in Afghanistan, we will also need the US to agree early to [sic] single holistic plan for Security Sector Reform. We have offered outline proposals on the security sector. We should offer a plan."

71. The following week, the US hosted a Rock Drill: an inter-agency rehearsal for the post-conflict administration of Iraq. It was attended by a team of UK officials led by Mr Chilcott and is described in detail in Section 6.5.

72. On 20 February, Mr Chilcott submitted advice to Mr Straw, including an IPU guidance note for officials participating in the Rock Drill.[56] There was a brief mention of SSR activities in the context of maximising "involvement of the Iraqis in most tasks, including: policing … judiciary … and some security forces".

73. In an update to Mr Blair shortly after the Rock Drill, Mr Nicholas Cannon, Mr Blair's Assistant Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, provided an overview of work undertaken by the IPU, including on humanitarian and economic issues.[57] Mr Cannon did not mention SSR.

74. On 25 February, the IPU produced a 'UK Vision for Phase IV'.[58] The paper was sent to Sir David Manning the following day, copied to the offices of Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr Hoon and Ms Short.[59] The vision was that the UK "should aim to leave Iraq radically changed for the better".[60]

75. The paper listed a number of mission objectives, including the formation of an Iraq which "has appropriately sized, reformed armed forces and intelligence/security agencies" and "has a fair justice sector".

76. The paper was structured to match the US organisation of Phase IV into three stages:

- Alpha – military administration while UN agencies and Non-Governmental Organisations (NGOs) "tackle the humanitarian crisis".
- Bravo – an "international civil transitional administration", supported by UN-mandated Coalition military, which would "take forward the programme of ambitious reforms … to transform Iraq along the lines of the vision".
- Charlie – the handover to a democratically elected Iraqi Government, during which the international community would continue to support the restructuring of Iraq's economy and public administration. "Training of the armed forces and of the police and judiciary may also continue in Phase IV Charlie."

77. The FCO sent a draft 'Vision for Iraq and the Iraqi People' to No.10 on 28 February.[61] That version made no reference to the security sector, but did state that the UK would "help" by "supporting institutional and administrative reform".

78. The UK's objectives were described again in a paper prepared by the IPU for a meeting chaired by Mr Blair on 6 March.[62] The paper sought Ministerial agreement to a number of objectives for the UK's post-conflict Occupation of Iraq, including that Iraq:

- "Has armed forces and intelligence services that are of an appropriate size (striking a balance between not threatening its neighbours and protecting the territorial integrity of Iraq) and are well on the way to being reformed"; and
- "Respects human rights and has made significant progress towards a fair and effective justice sector."

79. The IPU paper was not discussed at the meeting, so the draft objectives for post-conflict Iraq were incorporated into another IPU paper describing "the UK overall plan for Phase IV" and submitted to Mr Blair by Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, on 7 March[63] and again by Mr Cannon on 12 March.[64]

80. The MOD produced a number of papers in March that discussed SSR.

81. On 7 March, an MOD "Red Team", which had been established within the Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) (as described in Section 6.2), produced a report seeking to identify "the optimum structure of the Immediate and Interim Administrations in Iraq and other measures most likely to obtain and retain the support of the Iraqi people".[65] The report stated that "law and order, including the judicial process, will require special handling". It stated that:

- … once an assessment has been made of the effectiveness of local police forces it should be increasingly possible to include them in military-led law and order operations;
- the judicial system is largely dysfunctional and … some form of interim judicial system may be necessary;
- the prison system is likely to require a complete overhaul and supervisory regime, although the infrastructure may be useable."

82. The Red Team advised that:

> "Expectations that the Coalition Forces will be able to deliver these responsibilities [those of an Occupying Power under international law] are high; so if there is doubt over our ability to meet them in an 'exemplary' fashion we should take steps to lower expectations as early as possible."

83. On 11 March, the DIS issued a further assessment of the "political and security environment" that Coalition troops would encounter in Basra.[66] Though not specifically focused on SSR, some of the judgements in the document illustrate the UK's pre-invasion understanding of the Iraqi security sector in what would become its Area of Operations (AOR).

Area of Operations and Area of Responsibility

Area of Operations (AO) refers to the UK military's area of combat operations during the invasion of Iraq (Phase III of operations).

Area of Responsibility (AOR) refers to the area for which the UK military was responsible during the post-conflict Occupation of Iraq (Phase IV of operations).

The two terms were often used interchangeably, sometimes in the same document.

84. On the Iraqi police, the assessment stated:

> "We have very little reporting on the organisation of Iraq's Civil Police. And we have no information specific to Basra … We have little idea as to how the police will act during a Coalition attack or in the aftermath. Limited anecdotal reporting suggest [sic] that they are likely to disappear from the street."

85. The establishment of law and order was described as an "important" factor in the reaction of the Basra populace to Coalition control. However, the DIS judged that "in the absence of a civil police force and other security forces this will prove difficult".

86. The paper also addressed the dismissal of Ba'ath Party members from the military and civil administration. The DIS assessed that:

> "Directorate of General Security (DGS), DGI (Directorate of General Intelligence), SSO (Special Security Organisations) elements and Ba'ath Party militia should be disbanded. Ba'ath leadership (Udw Firqa/Fara) might also need to be detained …
> "… But within Basra City there seems to [sic] no organisation with a better understanding of tribal relationships, the civil populace, internal security matters and provision of public services than the Ba'ath Party. Many party members will not have been involved in repressive activity. We assess that Ba'ath Party members will have to be utilised by any military administration, at least in the early phases of control."

87. On 18 March, the day before the invasion began, the MOD Defence Advisory Team (DAT) produced a paper on SSR and the future Iraqi armed forces.[67] The paper was designed "to inform UK policy making and assist in advancing US thinking on these topics". Much of its content revisited the themes discussed in the FCO paper of 10 December 2002, which had already been shared with the US.

88. The MOD paper listed the range of SSR activities in which the UK could be expected to participate as follows:

- DDR;
- clearance of unexploded ordnance (de-mining);
- reconstruction of the Iraqi armed forces;
- non-military security forces and intelligence services;
- police and law enforcement;
- border control; and
- judicial systems.

90. The DAT described a number of "high-level risks", including the potential for "a lack of coherence between primary Coalition partners over SSR Policy". The paper stated:

> "Whilst the UK may try and influence the shape and content of such an SSR strategy, the reality is that it will have to accommodate to the plans of the senior Coalition partner/lead international body and their intentions for this area of activity."

91. The Cabinet Office circulated an agreed set of "Military Campaign Objectives" on 18 March.[68] The "immediate military priorities" included to:

- "contribute to the creation of a secure environment so that normal life can be restored"; and
- "lay plans for the reform of Iraq's security forces".

92. The military objectives were placed in the Library of the House of Commons by Mr Hoon on 20 March.[69]

93. On 19 March, Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), issued his Directive to Lieutenant General John Reith, Chief of Joint Operations (CJO) authorising the commencement of Operation TELIC (UK military action in Iraq).[70] The tasks of relevance to SSR were:

- "Protect, and be prepared to secure, essential Iraqi political, administrative and economic infrastructure from unnecessary destruction in order to reassure the Iraqi people and facilitate rapid regeneration."
- "Deter opportunistic inter-ethnic and inter-communal conflict."

- "As quickly as possible, contribute to a safe and secure environment within which humanitarian aid agencies are able to operate."
- "If directed, be prepared to contribute to the reform of Iraq's security forces."

94. A later Directive, issued on 30 July, included a "key" priority:

"To support the Coalition wider SSR effort where this can be done within the appropriate UK scale of effort."[71]

95. This Directive included a further task:

"Maintain public order and safety using, where possible, local law enforcement organisations supervised by military and civil police in order to achieve Iraqi support for stability operations."

Planning the deployment of police officers

96. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Mr Stephen Pattison, Head of UND until June 2003, described UND's involvement in police matters as "essentially operational".[72] Since 1997 UND had managed a Whitehall system to identify, train and deploy civilian police overseas. Mr Pattison said:

"Obtaining sufficient UK police officers to take part in international policing was always a struggle. We needed to get the co-operation of Chief Police Officers. And we needed to find ways of attracting volunteers … We cast the net as wide as we could, including canvassing recently retired officers.

"In most cases the overseas requirement was for armed police, which rules out most UK officers. So we focused on getting UK officers into niche roles where their expertise would add to the international police force's skills, rather than into front line executive policing.

"… And deploying UK police was not straightforward: all UK overseas police officers are volunteers, ACPO [Association of Chief Police Officers] and the Home Office would only agree to deployment when certain conditions were met (security, in mission support structure) and the funding had to be identified."

97. Mr Pattison told the Inquiry that UND had not been tasked to undertake any preparatory work, but had identified a potential problem and acted to address it.[73] He said that there was no-one in Whitehall pulling together knowledge of policing to design the kind of police operation needed in Iraq. In his recollection, "awareness of our responsibilities under the Geneva Convention and Hague regulations did not inform our thinking about policing in the run-up to the war."

98. Responsibilities under the Geneva and Hague regulations included that, as an Occupying Force, the UK would assume responsibility for ensuring public order and safety within their AO.[74]

99. UND had assumed that the UK would not provide an "executive" police force ("a force to do actual policing") for Iraq, which would be a "massive undertaking".[75] Instead the focus would be on supplying a "small number" of UK police to provide training and advice on SSR, as had happened in other international policing missions. It was judged that those police would need to be armed.

100. Mr Pattison told the Inquiry:

> "We were aware of the constraints and we were aware of roughly how many police we could provide to do training and it wasn't very many. This would have to be a wholly voluntary force. Any police deployed would need the approval of their Chief Constable. There were duty of care issues.
> "You know, this was not going to be one of those situations where you could simply turn on a tap of British police to go and help. It was going to be very difficult. We [UND] certainly understood that, but I'm not aware that there was ever a serious discussion of post-conflict police issues."[76]

101. On 23 January, a junior official wrote to the Head of the UND Peacekeeping Section to seek authorisation to proceed with "plans for the training of a small contingent (30 officers) of Ministry of Defence Police for immediate deployment should they be required".[77] The Minute stated:

> "… we are taking these steps mindful of our experience in Kosovo, where the Prime Minister committed us to deployment of UK civpol shortly after the liberation of Pristina … In that exercise police were on the ground within a month but only following a great deal of effort."

102. Following a Cabinet meeting on 10 April, Mr David Blunkett, the Home Secretary, told officials that he wanted to be in a position to offer, or react very quickly to a request for, assistance in re-establishing policing in Iraq.[78] He was reported to have been thinking more of offering specialist advice than substantial numbers of police officers.

103. Home Office officials were told by Mr Pattison that the FCO's preferred approach was to proceed with the initial deployment of a small MOD police contingent before deciding whether to ask the Home Office for any assistance from other forces.

104. Mr Blunkett was said to be "disappointed" by that response and told Mr Blair that he was "very keen to make his own contribution". He instructed his officials to make contact with the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) to explore the possibilities, which they did on 14 April.

105. Chief Constable Paul Kernaghan, the lead on international affairs for ACPO, responded:

> "ACPO and I are very keen to play a full and appropriate part in supporting the UK's contribution to liberating the people of Iraq. The form of assistance we can provide depends on the mission envisaged and crucially clear political direction."[79]

106. Mr Blunkett relayed CC Kernaghan's offer to Mr Straw, confirming his own "commitment to the rehabilitation of Iraq, and in particular to the principle of the provision of UK policing assistance as soon as practicable".[80] Mr Blunkett emphasised that both CC Kernaghan and he were "ready and willing to engage with you in working towards identifying civilian policing requirements in Iraq and how they might best be met".

107. CC Kernaghan wrote to Mr Pattison, offering his services and suggesting that the FCO might wish to convene a meeting to bring together the key players from the FCO, Home Office and relevant policing interests to ensure a co-ordinated approach.[81] He had already discussed the matter with the Chief Constable of the MOD police and they were "agreed that an integrated response between all elements of the UK police service is the best approach".

108. On 23 April, a meeting between the FCO, the Home Office, the MOD and ACPO agreed that the MOD police would deploy two officers – at the rank of Superintendent and either Inspector or Chief Inspector – "to enhance the police advice available to GOC [General Officer Commanding] 1 UK Armoured Division" and that the FCO would try to place a UK Chief Inspector inside the Office for Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance (ORHA).[82] It was confirmed that, in the meantime, CC Kernaghan should visit Iraq to gather information "to enable FCO/ACPO/Home Office to plan the UK's contribution".

109. CC Kernaghan's record of the meeting concluded that "at this point in time there is no clear shared vision of the future but instead a strong determination by the agencies represented to provide meaningful support based on a professional assessment of the situation".

110. The Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq Rehabilitation (AHMGIR – see box later in this Section) discussed an IPU paper on SSR on 8 May.[83] No Home Office Minister was available to attend the meeting but Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, did attend. In advance of the meeting Mr Blunkett spoke to Lord Goldsmith and confirmed the Home Office's willingness to contribute resources and expertise to assist UK efforts to shape SSR work in Iraq. They agreed that it would be useful for their two departments to work together on the matter.

111. The Home Office recognised that its potentially relevant expertise covered a range of areas, including terrorism and security, immigration and asylum, drugs, policing and prisons.

112. Lord Goldsmith reported to the AHMGIR that he and Mr Blunkett were willing to put more resources into helping the police and justice work in Iraq.[84]

113. CC Kernaghan visited Iraq in late May.[85] In his visit report he observed: "Effective policing in Iraq requires operational officers to be armed." Given that, and the fact that the vast majority of police officers in the UK did not routinely carry firearms and so were not trained in their use, he did not believe that they would be effective in an operational role in Iraq.

114. CC Kernaghan thought that UK involvement in police training would be more appropriate. He commented that the pressure to deploy police officers on operational duties was likely to be immense.

115. Following an agreement for the UK to provide a Chief Constable to be the senior policing adviser to the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) within the Iraqi Ministry of Interior (MOI), on 6 June 2003 ACPO issued a notice advertising a secondment opportunity for a senior UK police officer.[86] media interest grew.[88] Until that point, the Government had been "reluctant" to discuss openly how post-conflict Iraq would be managed, but this was to be given greater prominence as military action began.

118. The script was also circulated to all Embassies, High Commissions and Consulates to aid the briefing of "key contacts".[89]

119. Neither document made any reference to SSR.

120. Lt Gen Reith updated the Chiefs of Staff on Phase IV planning on 21 March.[90] He warned that Phase IV delivery remained subject to "uncertain US dynamics at the pol/mil [politico-military] level" and identified a number of key issues that still required resolution (see Section 6.5), including how to approach SSR.

121. Mr Bowen circulated a draft paper to senior officials in the FCO, MOD and DFID on 25 March that set out "British Post-Conflict Objectives" (see Section 9.1).[91] On SSR, the draft stated that the UK would, with others, assist reform in Iraq by:

- supporting the observance of human rights, and legal and judicial reform; and
- helping Iraq generate reformed and accountable security forces acting in accordance with human rights standards.

122. Mr Bowen suggested that officials should show the draft paper to their Ministers, if they had not already done so: "We will then see the outcome of the Prime Ministerial visit to Camp David and consider formal submission early next week."

123. The AHMGIR met on 10 April.[92] Ministers agreed that the UK should participate in work being done by the Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Affairs (ORHA), headed by retired US Lieutenant General Jay Garner. The UK should lead a group on security sector management and planning for SSR.

The Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq Rehabilitation

The Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq Rehabilitation (AHMGIR) was a sub-committee of Cabinet with a particular focus on the reconstruction of Iraq. It was chaired by the Foreign Secretary and was attended by the Chancellor, Defence Secretary, Development Secretary and Trade and Industry Secretary. The AHMGIR is described in detail in Section 2.

124. On 14 April, Mr Blair told the House of Commons that:

> "… around 2,000 police officers have reported for work, there are some joint patrols in being and the head of the civil police department, not to be confused with the special security forces, has ordered police to return to work."[93]

125. In a conversation with President Bush on 14 April, Mr Blair stated that the Iraqi police clearly needed to be re-organised and deployed.[94] There could be a role for foreign police contingents.

126. General Tommy Franks, Commander in Chief US Central Command (CENTCOM), issued his 'Freedom Message to the Iraqi People' on 16 April 2003.[95] It instructed the Iraqi armed forces and security organisations to:

> "… lay down their arms … and … obey the orders of the nearest Coalition military commander. All other Iraqis should continue their normal daily activities; officials should report to their places of work until told otherwise."

127. On 21 April, OHRA entered Iraq.[96]

128. In late April, the UK AO was declared "permissive", first by UK forces on 22 April[97] and a few days later by the UN Security Co-ordinator.[98] The Coalition defined "permissive" environments as ones to which humanitarian assistance organisations could have access, although they should use all precautionary measures and notify the Coalition Forces.[99]

129. Section 8 describes the evolution of the boundaries of the UK AO. On 24 April, Ministers agreed that "the size of the UK military sector will depend on the permissiveness of the environment and the extent of other nations' contributions, but the current assumption was that it would comprise four, or possibly five provinces in the South".[100]

130. As Occupying Power in those provinces, the UK had responsibility for the provision of public order and safety under international law and resolution 1483 (2003), as set out in Section 9.1.

Resolution 1483

Resolution 1483 was adopted on 22 May 2003.[101] In relation to security and SSR, the Security Council called upon the Coalition to:

> "… promote the welfare of the Iraqi people through the effective administration of the territory, including in particular working towards the restoration of conditions of security and stability and the creation of conditions in which the Iraqi people can freely determine their own political future."

Resolution 1483 also provided for a UN Special Representative who would, in co-ordination with the Coalition, encourage "international efforts to rebuild the capacity of the Iraqi civilian police force" and "promote legal and judicial reforms".

131. The report of a visit to Iraq by DFID officials described how the "justice and security teams" within ORHA had:

> "… drawn up extensive plans covering law and order, transitional justice, longer term institutional reform in the justice sector and limited DDR. Justice sector plans have been developed over two years, are well thought through and, with the requisite UN authority, would provide an excellent basis for future work. The likely breakdown in public administration and the implications for law and order were identified before the Iraq conflict began. Unfortunately, this advice was disregarded by the US Administration and the Coalition military."[102]

132. The AHMGIR met on 24 April.[103] In discussion, it was stated that the UK had "plenty of good expertise on Security Sector Reform and should play a prominent role". Ministers agreed that the UK should lobby the US to create a "comprehensive strategy" and to involve UK personnel in ORHA scoping studies. There was no attendee from the Home Office.

133. Ministers also agreed that UK forces should continue to exercise a policing function while attempting to revive the local police forces and courts.

134. On 2 May, ORHA issued a call to all Baghdad employees of the MOI, the IPS, Civil Defence Force, Vital Institutions Protection Force and traffic police, summoning them back to work for 4 May.[104] Similar calls were also issued by individual Coalition Force Commanders "as their areas were secured".

135. On 6 May, President Bush announced the appointment of Ambassador Paul Bremer as the Presidential Envoy to Iraq and head of the CPA (see Section 9.1).[105] The CPA quickly subsumed ORHA, retaining many of its staff.[106]

136. Within the CPA, Ambassador Bremer's Senior Adviser for National Security and Defense was Mr Walt Slocombe.[107] A former New York City Police Commissioner, Mr Bernard Kerik, became the CPA's senior adviser to the MOI.

137. On 6 May, Mr Straw announced to Parliament that Mr John Sawers had been appointed as the Prime Minister's Special Representative on Iraq:

> "Mr Sawers will work alongside Chris Segar, head of the newly opened British office in Baghdad, particularly in relation to the political process and our work in the Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance."[108]

138. On 8 May the AHMGIR discussed a paper on SSR produced by the IPU.[109] The paper stated:

> "Reform across the full range of security activities (armed forces, intelligence agencies, justice and law enforcement institutions) is an essential element of the overall Coalition strategy to establish a united and representative Iraqi Government and to create the conditions under which the Coalition can eventually disengage.
> "The objective must be the transformation of Iraq's security institutions so that they play an effective, legitimate and democratically accountable role in providing external and internal security for Iraq's citizens … UK experience suggests that a coherent strategy will need effective burden sharing and … the extended involvement of NGOs and other SSR actors. Immediate decisions and urgent action is needed to deal with the potential problems of unemployed and disaffected military and security service personnel."

139. The paper described the US approach as "embryonic" and assessed that it "tends to approach elements of the security sector separately". It also stated that "we must recognise that influencing US views may prove difficult, and will undoubtedly require considerable and sustained effort".

140. The paper reported that Mr Slocombe was assembling a team to deploy to Iraq later that month to establish the "Office of the Senior Advisor for the Ministry of Defence Iraq and the Iraqi National Defence Force". He was reported to be "actively seeking Coalition partners to join his team and a number of key posts … have been identified for possible UK secondees".

141. The paper concluded that "the UK will neither be required nor able to develop an independent policy on SSR in Iraq".[110] The immediate UK priorities were therefore aimed at seeking to influence the development of US policy. Although the paper recommended that the UK should "contribute personnel and expertise", there was no mention of where those resources would come from or what particular role they might be expected to play.

142. In discussion, the point was made that in Afghanistan, UK influence over the approach of the US to SSR had been limited.[111]

143. Ministers agreed that:

- The UK should continue to encourage the US to adopt a broad concept of SSR, and "to address the employment of Iraqi defence and security personnel urgently through DDR processes".
- UK personnel should be deployed, including the creation of an SSR secretariat within ORHA, to advise on cross-cutting SSR issues.
- The UK should facilitate UN, international financial institutions and other donor engagement in SSR.

De-Ba'athification

144. On 16 May, Ambassador Bremer issued CPA Order No.1 which eliminated all Ba'ath Party structures and banned "Senior Party Members" (the top four ranks of the Party) from serving in Iraq's public sector.[112] It also placed individuals in senior management roles (the top three levels of management) under investigation. The impact of the de-Ba'athification process is described in more detail in Section 11.1.

145. Order No.1 had an immediate impact on the senior management of the security structures in Iraq, although Mr Slocombe observed in an interview in 2004 that: "Out of a Ba'ath Party membership of well over a million, maybe more, only about 40,000 people were in this category … only about 10 percent of the brigadier generals were in these top four ranks."[113]

146. The CPA's records indicate that, of the 860 judges and prosecutors in post at the time of CPA Order No.1, 656 were reviewed under the de-Ba'athification scheme.[114] As a result 176 were removed from their positions, with 185 new judges and prosecutors being appointed to take their place.

147. In a meeting with Ambassador Bremer and Mr Sawers on 16 May, some of the Iraqi leaders present argued that the scope of the recently announced de-Ba'athification policy should be "broadened to include the security services and army, private companies set up under Saddam, and the media".[115] Bremer promised that there would be a further proclamation on the security services and army in the days ahead.

148. On 23 May, CPA Order No.2 – "Dissolution of Entities" – "dissolved" (or disbanded) a number of military and other security entities that had operated as part of Saddam Hussein's regime.[116] The dissolved entities included:

- the government ministries responsible for Defence, Information and Military Affairs;
- the intelligence agencies;
- the armed forces; and
- the paramilitary forces which were closely associated with Saddam Hussein.

149. CPA Order No.2 also stated that:

- military ranks were cancelled;
- conscripts were released;
- a termination payment would be paid to those dismissed, except to senior party members; and
- pensions would continue to be paid, except to senior party members.

150. Neither the IPS nor the MOI were dissolved. Reflecting on the Order several years later, Ambassador Bremer wrote in the New York Times that the "police force, which we did recall to duty, has proven unreliable and is mistrusted by the very Iraqi people it is supposed to protect".[117]

151. In his book State of Denial, Mr Bob Woodward suggested that an early draft of the Order had proposed disbanding the MOI.[118] At Lt Gen Garner's suggestion, that had not been implemented, in order to preserve the IPS who were employed by the MOI.

152. Existing members of the organisations listed above were dismissed from their former employment, with effect from 16 April (the date of Gen Franks' declaration).[119]

153. Order No.2 also announced:

> "The CPA plans to create in the near future a New Iraqi Corps,[120] as the first step in forming a national self-defense capability for a free Iraq. Under civilian control, > that Corps will be professional, non-political, militarily effective, and representative of all Iraqis. The CPA will promulgate procedures for participation in the New Iraqi Corps."[121]

154. There was nothing in CPA Order No.2 that prevented former employees of the dissolved entities – including the military – from applying to join the New Iraqi Army (NIA), although the provisions of Order No.1 would apply.

155. Hard Lessons, the account of US involvement in Iraq by the US Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, records that Order No.2 was drafted by Mr Slocombe.[122]

156. In a 2004 interview, Mr Slocombe observed that the reasons for disbanding the Iraqi Army were both political and practical:

- The Army had effectively disappeared after the invasion and its barracks had been heavily looted: "We didn't disband the army. The army disbanded itself … Furthermore, even if they had come back … all the facilities were trashed."
- The structure of the former Iraqi Army was such that it would have required substantial reform to be a suitable modern army: "… it was a conscript army with overwhelmingly Shia conscripts and overwhelmingly Sunni officers … The Iraqi Army had 11,000 general officers. The American Army … has 300 general officers."[123]

157. Lieutenant General Jonathon Riley, who served in Baghdad in 2003 as Deputy Head of the Coalition Military Assistance Training Team (CMATT), told the Inquiry that the CPA was left with no choice but to disband the army:

> "He [Ambassador Bremer] is criticised for doing it, but I believe that by the time he made that decree, the army had disbanded itself and what was left of its infrastructure had been largely torn apart by the population, which had lost all respect for its own army. A very bad situation to be in."[124]

158. According to the RAND Report, After Saddam: Pre-war Planning and the Occupation of Iraq:

> "… the decision to disband the Iraqi armed forces was … made in Washington … in early May 2003, before the deployment of Ambassador L Paul Bremer to Baghdad."[125]

159. Mr Douglas Feith, the former US Under Secretary for Defense and Policy, recorded in his memoir that he had been briefed by Ambassador Bremer and Mr Slocombe on 9 May 2003 about "their plan to dissolve the Iraqi Army".[126]

160. According to Hard Lessons, the US Department of Defense (DoD) had not discussed the Order with senior officials from other US agencies before approving it.[127] Secretary Powell recalled that "There was no meeting on it; there was no, 'Gee, is this a good idea?' You couldn't even tell who had decided it."

161. Major General Tim Cross, a senior secondee to ORHA, told the Inquiry that the decision to demobilise the army had been made "against all advice from Garner and myself".[128]

162. Sir Kevin Tebbit, MOD Permanent Under Secretary between 2001 and 2005, told the Inquiry:

> "I was not aware of any discussion with us, with the UK, before those judgements were taken. After they were taken, the Americans said to us … that it had to happen anyway, because the army had disappeared. Well, true, but not the 10,000 officers. So I didn't quite buy that."[129]

163. Ambassador Bremer had specifically raised the issue of "dissolving the MOD and the security and intelligence organisations" and "establish[ing] a new national army" in his first meeting with Mr Sawers on 12 May.[130] Mr Sawers had not expressed any concerns and commented that Ambassador Bremer had made a "good dynamic start".

164. Mr Slocombe met Mr Hoon in London on 13 May.[131] Mr Slocombe produced a record of this meeting for Ambassador Bremer (a leaked copy of which has appeared on the internet), which stated:

> "If some UK officers or officials think we should try to rebuild and reassemble the old RA [regular army] they did not give any hint of it …"

165. The MOD record of Mr Hoon's meeting with Mr Slocombe on 13 May stated that Mr Slocombe had:

> "… outlined … the plans for … the new Iraqi Armed Force. He emphasised that this would be a new Army, rather than a reconstituted version of the old."[132]

166. There is nothing in the record to suggest that Mr Hoon or those accompanying him raised any concerns.

167. Mr Hoon offered UK support with the training of the NIA and stated that it was important that police reform took place in the context of a wider SSR process, "including lawyers, judges, prison officers".

168. The Inquiry asked Mr Simon Webb, MOD Policy Director, about the meeting.[133] Mr Webb said that he had expected the Iraqi Army to be retained and reformed but observed:

> "Of course, life then became particularly complicated when the army disappeared, because of course Saddam [Hussein] had himself … dispersed the army so that it couldn't become a political threat to him. Under this … strange command structure he had introduced in 2002, the army just … gave up and went away. So when Walt Slocombe showed up … it seemed a bit odd to … summon the army back in again when you knew that actually you really wanted a rather different army from a democratisation point of view."

169. Mr Ian Lee, MOD Director General Operational Policy, told the Inquiry that although he had met Mr Slocombe when the latter visited London in May 2003, he did not recall a discussion on the disbandment of the Iraqi military.[134]

170. The Chiefs of Staff met on 14 May.[135] Minutes of the meeting recorded that "the de-Ba'athification process was anticipated to render all those officials senior to the rank of Lieutenant Colonel as 'out of play'". No concerns about that were recorded, nor do the minutes contain any mention of concern about Mr Slocombe's plan to rebuild the Iraqi Army from scratch.

171. Adm Boyce told the Inquiry that he had "laid down … that we should not … go through de-Ba'athification or indeed disband the Iraqi Army. I saw that as being absolutely essential for the future."[136]

172. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry about the impact of dissolving Iraqi military and security entities:

> "… these were policies that added to the difficulties, because we might have addressed the security vacuum by trying to encourage Iraqi police, Iraqi military, to co-operate with us, instead of which, they are disbanded and then become natural dissidents and potential insurgents."[137]

173. That view was shared by Mr Hoon, who told the Inquiry that:

> "… some of the security difficulties, particularly in and around Baghdad were the result of disaffected people, no longer receiving their salary, joining the insurgency and, indeed, putting their expertise to use in the sense that there was a clear suggestion to me that some of the attacks became more sophisticated as some [former] military people became involved …
> "… I think that it would have been better to have that stability in that immediate aftermath and I think that, to some extent, disbanding the army fuelled the insurgency in a way that made it much harder to contain."[138]

174. Sir John Sawers told the Inquiry:

> "I don't think it is credible to lay the insurgency, the roots of the insurgency, in the decision to disband the army … The decision to formally disband the army was not something that inspired or triggered the insurgency. It may, in some areas, have compounded it, but it wasn't the fundamental reason behind it."[139]

175. The Order to disband the army also reduced the rate at which the security forces were later re-established. General Sir John Reith told the Inquiry that if the army had not been disbanded "there was still some structure there we could have built on, whereas, as it was, we really had to start from scratch".[140]

176. Lieutenant General Sir John Kiszely, who became Senior British Military Representative – Iraq (SBMR-I) in October 2004, described the impact on army capability:

> "The Iraqi Army, of course, as a result of the Coalition Provisional Authority's decision to disband the army, had been starting from scratch in many areas. So the competence of commanders was in many cases way below that which you would expect of their rank."[141]

177. Lieutenant General Sir Robert Fry, Deputy Chief of Joint Operations from May 2003 to July 2003, told the Inquiry that:

> "… one advantage that the Iraqi Army has had subsequently over the Iraqi police force is that it was created ab initio and thus did not contain some of the flaws that manifested themselves in the Iraqi police force in subsequent years."[142]

178. Mr Sawers had reported to the FCO in London on 20 May that the question of "what to do about military pay and pensions" was one of the "problems in the pipeline".[143] No further details were provided.

179. Maj Gen Cross prepared a note for Mr Blair on 22 May setting out some points to make in a forthcoming discussion with President Bush.[144] Those included a reference to the recent de-Ba'athification announcement having "created some inevitable difficulties".

180. Maj Gen Cross also raised a concern about what he understood to be the emerging policy decision not to pay pensions to former military personnel. He commented that "there are dangers in excluding such a large and possibly well armed group" from arrangements that were to apply to other members of the public sector.

181. Although no details of the amount of that payment and the arrangements for receiving it were given in the Order itself, those dismissed by CPA Order No.2 were entitled to a termination payment (unless they were a "Senior Party Member" within the terms of the de-Ba'athification Order).[145] Those who had previously been receiving a pension from one of the dissolved organisations would continue to receive that pension (again, unless they were a "Senior Party Member").

182. A telegram from FCO London to Washington, dated 30 May, identified the problem of large numbers of people (and in particular those with military training) out of work and without prospect of further employment.[146] The FCO commented:

> "… the Coalition needs a policy to reduce the perverse incentives for … [that group] to drift towards the hard core actively opposing the Coalition … one solution might be to create a workfare scheme – a pool of labour drawn specifically from those left unemployed by the disbandment of the security apparatus, to meet urgent short term requirements …
> "In the medium term, Security Sector Reform (SSR) will make a significant contribution to resolving this issue."

183. An alternative proposal for re-employing former army personnel was put forward by the Cabinet Office in the Annotated Agenda for the AHMGIR on 12 June.[147] Officials suggested "pioneering the re-employment of former Iraqi service personnel as static guards in the UK-led military sectors".

184. The minutes of the meeting do not record a discussion of the proposal.[148]

185. Mr Sawers reported on 20 June that plans were in train to pay more generous severance payments and a monthly stipend for those with at least 15 years' service who were not senior Ba'athists.[149] Mr Sawers' own view was that the sums being proposed "may not be enough to solve the problem", adding:

> "Bremer has an open mind on this, though does not want to burden a future Iraqi Government more than necessary, nor be more generous to ex-soldiers than to civilians … At a meeting with leading Iraqis today Bremer sought views on how to deal with the ex-military. The great majority of those present – including Shia Islamists – argued that regular payments should be made to ease the security threat that the ex-military would pose if they were marginalised."

186. Payments for ex-servicemen were announced on 23 June.[150]

187. Ms Ann Clwyd, the Prime Minister's Special Envoy to Iraq on Human Rights from 2003 to 2009, told the Inquiry that "many people slipped through the net … senior people, who could have been used in those early stages to help the Coalition".[151] She recounted a meeting with a senior army officer who had queued for his stipend for two weeks without reaching the front of the queue. He had told her: "if they want to humiliate us, this is the way of doing it".

188. Major General Freddie Viggers, who arrived in Baghdad in May 2003 as SBMR-I, described similar scenes:

> "I can remember going with Walt Slocombe in to see Paul Bremer and saying 'this has got to stop. The numbers at the gate now are over 1,000, 2,000, 3,000, and we have to start giving these people a little bit of respect and the means to live on'."[152]

Views on SSR: May 2003

189. Sir David Manning visited Baghdad and Basra in May. A substantial part of his report to Mr Blair (described in Section 9.2) dealt with policing and security, and the way in which the UK could contribute to restoring order in the Iraqi capital. He reported to Mr Blair that: "Baghdad remains key; and the key to Baghdad is security."[153] Sir David's view was that:

> "Police training could have a disproportionate impact. (Police are conspicuous by their absence). A quick win would be moving 16 Air Assault Brigade to Baghdad with the task of providing police training for six weeks."

190. The proposal to deploy 16 Air Assault Brigade was supported by Major General David Richards, the Assistant Chief of the General Staff, who had been sent to Iraq by Mr Hoon and General Sir Michael Walker, CDS, to scope the potential for a UK role in improving SSR.[154]

191. The deployment was also encouraged by Mr Sawers, who emphasised the strategic importance of taking action in the immediate future to avoid further deterioration in security.[155]

192. On 23 May, Mr Peter Watkins, Mr Hoon's Private Secretary, wrote to Sir David Manning to explain that the MOD advised against the deployment to Baghdad, on the basis that it was "likely to have only a marginal effect" and might divert effort away from the South of Iraq, where the UK was seeking to implement an "exemplary approach".[156]

193. The Chiefs of Staff discussed SSR on 29 May, when they considered a paper prepared by the SPG.[157] The paper had been circulated to the FCO and the Cabinet Office, though not to DFID, the Home Office or other departments with responsibility for wider security or justice issues.[158]

194. The SPG defined SSR as addressing "all aspects of the security sector (police, judiciary, penal service, border security, intelligence services and armed forces) as part of a long term holistic programme of change". Although SSR was normally led by DFID, with the MOD, the FCO and the Home Office as stakeholders, for Iraq the IPU had been given the lead "for the development of UK strategy through the Cabinet Office".

195. The SPG recognised that SSR in Iraq was part of both the security and reconstruction efforts, and defined the SSR goal for Phase IV as:

> "To establish as soon as possible the core elements of a legitimate, accountable, sustainable Security Sector – which safeguards the Rights of Citizens and provides adequate Defence of future Iraqi Sovereignty."

196. The paper concluded with an assessment of the level of UK military resource that should be devoted to that task, commenting that "we may face a requirement to provide additional resources" and that there was "a choice about the degree of military involvement" which would "have implications for both the level [sic] resources and the length of time we are likely to be engaged".

197. In the area of Iraq under UK control, UK forces were "likely to be faced with a variety of low level military activities required of Coalition Forces by the US to enable SSR implementation (e.g. oversight of recruiting procedures, provision of training advice and resources)".

198. The SPG's recommendations included:

- "We should proceed on the basis of minimal engagement in SSR in Iraq coherent with current Ministerial intent."
- "We should seek clarification of where the funding for engagement in SSR will be forthcoming."
- That the UK should seek clarification from the US on "who will decide size and shape of internal security forces".

199. The minutes of the Chiefs of Staff meeting recorded that the MOD "should remain flexible on the degree to which the UK should be militarily involved, but be forward leaning in those areas where valuable assistance could be offered."[159]

The police structure in the UK

In his statement to the Inquiry, Chief Constable Paul Kernaghan described the police structure in the UK during the Iraq conflict.[160] There were 52 territorial forces: the Home Office was responsible for the 43 forces that cover England and Wales, the Scottish Executive for the eight forces in Scotland and the Northern Ireland Office for the Police Service in Northern Ireland (PSNI). Each force was headed by a Chief Constable (or Commissioner), who were members of the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO).[161] Within ACPO, discrete "business areas" were led by individual Chief Constables "in addition to other duties".

From 2000 to 2008, CC Kernaghan was the lead on international affairs for ACPO in addition to his role as Chief Constable of Hampshire Constabulary.

200. CC Kernaghan had first been informed of a potential requirement to deploy police officers to Iraq in an email from a junior Home Office official on 14 April.[162] That exchange is also referred to earlier in this Section. The junior official explained:

> "As you know, we would expect the FCO, who lead on the UK contribution to the policing element of international peacekeeping/crisis management operations, to initiate any request for policing assistance in Iraq. No formal approach has yet been made. But in view of the Home Secretary's keen interest, I spoke to Stephen Pattison, Head of the UN Department at the FCO, to find out what their thinking was.

He considers that an initial, fairly small, deployment of armed police officers to Basra would be useful in the first instance. The idea being that they would seek out credible elements of the local police force and encourage them (e.g. to act against looters etc).

"To meet this requirement, the International Policing Unit was looking to recruit about 20 Ministry of Defence Police officers, after the MDP [Ministry of Defence Police] had made a short reconnaissance visit … Stephen Pattison said that he would like to see how this initiative worked out, before deciding whether to ask the HO [Home Office] for any assistance from other (i.e. ACPO) forces."

201. In his response CC Kernaghan asked a number of questions about how the UK government envisaged any civilian policing assistance fitting in with the current military role and volunteered to visit Iraq "to consult with appropriate Coalition commanders/ administrators and assess the input the UK could make".[163]

202. CC Kernaghan told the Inquiry that he was "quite clear" that he could not offer valid professional advice unless he had "first hand exposure to the realities of contemporary Iraq".[164]

203. On 23 May, CC Kernaghan reported to Mr Blunkett and Mr Straw on his visit to Iraq the previous week, undertaken to assess the possibilities for a UK police contribution to the Coalition effort and the scale of the task involved.[165] CC Kernaghan identified a number of challenges that he judged the Coalition powers would need to overcome in order to deliver effective law and order within Iraq:

- The absence of strategic direction or professionally informed planning. As well as the disorganisation he encountered in ORHA (which he attributed in part to the transition to the CPA), CC Kernaghan highlighted the absence of a clear plan from either of the two Occupying Powers for maintaining law and order or operating an effective criminal justice system. He observed that, in the course of his visit, it had become apparent that the UK had been preparing for the potential Occupation for some time and stated that it was a matter of "regret" that professional police advice from the UK had not been sought until April 2003.
- Criminal justice infrastructure was "totally degraded with police stations, courthouses and prisons having been looted by the local population and in some cases their own staff". CC Kernaghan commented that: "Looting does not do justice to the level of destruction inflicted and I can best liken the outcome to the progress of locusts across a field of corn." He suggested that a prison facility "meeting minimum international standards was also a high priority" and that the old Iraqi prison facilities that had been discovered indicated that "humane treatment of prisoners was an unknown concept." Prisoners were, at the time, being held in the theatre internment facility designed for prisoners of war.

- The difference between the social norms and attitudes of the Occupying Powers and the local people and their neighbours in the wider region. That divergence was going to be a significant issue: "If the [Coalition Powers] are going to ensure that their values and concept of human rights are respected in Iraq, excellent. Equally, if they feel that legally they cannot change Iraqi society on those lines, it would be helpful for that reality to be spelt out. This is particularly relevant to policing, as any international officer serving in Iraq could not be associated with operational policing which did not reflect the human rights position of their parent country. Ambiguity and obfuscation would not survive long in the glare of media and domestic political scrutiny."

204. After returning to the UK from a visit to Iraq, Mr Blair sent a personal note to President Bush.[166] Sir David Manning provided copies to Mr Straw, Mr Hoon, Mr Watkins and Mr Powell, but instructed "It must not go wider".

205. Mr Blair wrote that:

> "… the task is absolutely awesome and I'm not at all sure we're geared for it. This is worse than re-building a country from scratch."

206. He went on to explain that security in Baghdad had to be dealt with at once; police training was vital and urgent.

207. During May, the CPA Interior Ministry's International Police Assistance Team (IPAT) – comprising 15 policing experts from the UK, US, Canada and Denmark – carried out an assessment of the Iraqi police, to inform the CPA's plans for reconstituting and developing policing in Iraq.[167] The Coalition had originally intended to conduct the policing assessment as part of a wider justice sector assessment; however, because "the law and order situation was in a critical state of disarray … the … priority was defined as establishing the police forces" and the work on policing was taken forward in advance of wider work on the justice sector. The team produced a 56-page assessment of the state and future of policing in Iraq on 30 May.

208. The IPAT assessed that the law and order situation varied across Iraq. It explained that the arrangements for recalling and reinstating the Iraqi police had varied geographically and that individual Coalition commanders had taken different approaches to the training and re-use of existing police:

> "This effectively began the creation of four potentially different police forces in Iraq: North, Central, South Central and South."

[167] Report CPA Interior Ministry, 30 May 2003, 'Iraq Police: An Assessment of the Present and Recommendations for the Future'.

209. The IPAT commented:

> "Encouragingly, the Iraqi police are co-operating and demonstrating a willingness to work alongside the Coalition Forces in order to address the law and order situation."

210. The IPAT explained that ORHA had:

- issued guidelines "to ensure that a standardised approach is utilised while re-organising the police within each military area of responsibility";
- established "criteria for vetting existing and screening newly recruited personnel";
- stated that programmes of instruction to re-train all existing personnel and new recruits would be complete by mid-June;
- increased salary levels; and
- begun vetting of senior police officers in response to the de-Ba'athification Order.

211. The IPAT assessment concluded:

> "The Iraqi Police, as currently constituted and trained, are unable to independently maintain law and order and need the assistance and guidance of Coalition Force assets (or some similar follow on force) to accomplish this task."

212. The Iraqi police would need to be "redesigned and redeveloped" if they were to become capable of engendering public trust and confidence and being able to recover from the "years of neglect" and the "repressive command structure" that prohibited training, proactivity and initiative.

213. The IPAT recommended demilitarising the structure and ethos of the police and, while it recommended that the new police force should be recruited primarily from those who served in the previous Iraqi police, there should be tight vetting arrangements, retraining and "the establishment of an aggressive Office of Professional Standards … that ferrets out corruption while immediately addressing unprofessional, unethical or criminal behaviour within the Service".

214. The IPAT set out a summary of the principles to be applied to vetting. It explained that the purpose was both "to remove unacceptable personnel from the existing … service" and to prevent unsuitable individuals joining the reconstituted police service. In addition to physical fitness and basic Arabic literacy, the criteria included:

- No affiliation with the Ba'ath Party in accordance with … CPA Order No.1;
- No reported history of human rights violations or history of mistreatment or abuse of other persons;
- No criminal history involving violence, theft or violating the public trust;
- No reported history of a propensity to engage in violence or criminal acts;
- No reported history of immoral or unethical activity."

215. The IPAT explained that once applicants had met those minimum requirements, they would be investigated in line with the de-Ba'athification Order to check that they were not disqualified from employment. Absolute disqualifications would include:

- Former regime security organisation affiliation (RG [Republican Guard] or worse);
- Senior Ba'ath Party membership;
- Terrorist organisation affiliation; or
- Human rights violations and crimes against humanity."

216. The IPAT did not provide any details of how the information on which to make judgements about individual cases was to be obtained and evaluated. Nor was there any information about who would make the judgements.

217. Training programmes for existing police officers were to comprise an initial three-week transitional training programme followed by a longer-term capacity-building programme, to include monitoring and mentoring, "until an effective, locally acceptable police force is established that incorporates principles of community policing and full respect for the human rights of individuals".

218. The IPAT assessed that that could not be achieved "without significant international assistance" and estimated that "a requisite force" would comprise 6,633[168] international police advisers, an unspecified number of whom would have executive powers. Training sites should be opened in Baghdad, Basra, al-Anbar and Northern Iraq. Those whom the IPAT had spoken to as part of its research had "expressed a wish for US and UK police as trainers and supervisors", though the IPAT was of the opinion that "consideration should obviously be given to a wider pool than this and should also include consideration of other Arab police forces". There was no detail about how those advisers would be sourced.

219. The IPAT stated:

> "… a policy decision is needed as to the end state of the police … so that there is an overarching vision and focus … Two models are available. One is the classic single national police force with specialised units at the centre and decentralised administration. The second is a police force which reflects a federal government structure."

220. Former Deputy Chief Constable (DCC) Douglas Brand, who served as the UK's senior policing representative in Baghdad from July 2003, told the Inquiry that he recalled seeing the IPAT assessment prior to his deployment and thought that it was "high on aspiration but very low on actual, practical capability … not least, there wasn't a great deal of understanding of the local culture and context".[169]

[168] The report quotes two figures; 6,663 and 6,633. The Inquiry believes the latter is the correct figure.

SSR roles and responsibilities in Iraq

221. On 3 June, a conference was held in Washington chaired by Mr Slocombe.[170] It was attended by personnel from the MOD, the FCO, the IPU and DFID, led by Brigadier John Rose, the Chief of Defence Staff's Liaison Officer. At the conference, Mr Slocombe proposed a new structure for the CPA's Office of the Director of Security Affairs.

222. The "most significant" change to previous plans was the addition of the post of Deputy Director for SSR, which Mr Slocombe said would take on "the co-ordination role".[171] The British Embassy Washington commented that "this reflected a general willingness, by Slocombe at least, to view the management of the sector in the round". The UK delegation told Mr Slocombe that the UK "would be keen to provide someone" for the SSR role.

223. The UK also undertook to provide a Chief Constable to advise on police support, a one or two-star civilian deputy director to work on reform of the Iraqi MOD (IMOD[172]), a deputy director for intelligence conversion and a one-star deputy commander of the Coalition Military Assistance[173] and Training Team (CMATT).[174] The UK also offered assistance with navy and air force reform.

224. US Major General Paul Eaton arrived in Iraq on 13 June to take control of the CPA's CMATT, which was to be responsible for developing and training the NIA.[175]

225. CMATT reported to Mr Slocombe's deputy, Lieutenant General Luis Feliu of the Spanish Army.[176] Maj Gen Eaton's Deputy Commander was from the UK – Brigadier Jonathon Riley. There were a further eight UK officers seconded to CMATT.[177]

226. CMATT was initially given a budget of US$173m and directed to train three divisions of light or motorised infantry by September 2006.[178] It was also directed to form a small aviation element and a coastal defence force.

227. In early July, responsibilities for SSR in the CPA were divided. Mr Kerik took on responsibility for the MOI including policing, fire, customs, border control, immigration, passports, citizenship and disaster relief and Mr Slocombe focused on the development of the Iraqi Armed Forces.[179] Mr Kerik's team at this stage comprised 12 people with an additional five consultants on short-term assignments.

228. A record of the IPU's SSR team's visit to Iraq at the start of July stated:

> "Although Kerik has a clear vision on his aspirations for a police force there currently appears to be a lack of strategic direction for the whole of Iraq with his focus firmly on Baghdad. That said it is understood that guidance has been given to the regions but they have largely been left to fend for themselves. It is expected that this will change as the international policing effort is established. Kerik offered much praise for the efforts and progress made in the Basra area by UK forces."[180]

UK policing strategy: summer 2003

229. On 5 June, Mr Straw sent a number of papers to Mr Blair including a three-page policing strategy produced by the UND.[181] It referenced the CPA's assessment of 30 May and commented that, in the FCO's view, the immediate objective was "to stabilise the security situation by creating an effective interim police force with international civilian police working alongside Iraqi police and Coalition military forces".

230. The strategy stated that the longer-term objective was "to establish an effective, viable and sustainable police force within a fully functioning security sector". The initial response would be deployment of "an armed International Police Monitoring Force … to Baghdad and Basra, to conduct joint patrols with the current Iraqi police force and Coalition military" requiring 3,000 armed police officers. Once the Iraqi police were considered to have received sufficient initial training, the international presence would have a longer-term training focus, eventually taking on a mentoring role.

231. The UND paper suggested the following timetable:

- By 14 June: CPA/Coalition agree strategy for reforming Iraq Police Force [to include a decision on the model of police force required];
- By 21 June: Appointment of Police Commissioner to implement strategy;
- By 30 June: Police Contributors conference;
- By 14 August: Infrastructure in place for international police monitoring/ mentoring force (IPMF);
- By 31 August: Arrival of international police force (IPMF) personnel."

232. An FCO update to the MOD's Iraq Secretariat stated that the strategy was "broadly endorsed by the Prime Minister".[182]

233. On 6 June, the UND contacted the US State Department to share its draft policing strategy.[183]

234. Sir Kevin Tebbit and Gen Walker visited Baghdad and Basra in early June.[184] Sir Kevin reported that Ambassador Bremer had expressed a desire to draw on UK expertise from Northern Ireland and they had explored how the UK might offer assistance. Sir Kevin also recorded that Gen Walker thought that the MOD Operational Training and Advisory Group (OPTAG) should advise on the creation of a "Police and Security Sector Reform Assistance" team.

235. The UND responded with a formal minute defending the UK's draft strategy. The minute stated:

> "Since 1997 there has been a Whitehall system in place for the deployment of UK civilian police … The International Policing Unit in UND, FCO is in the lead … They … have a large amount of experience and expertise to draw on. I do not see the need to ask OPTAG to advise on setting up a new team … nor indeed do I see the need for a new team to be set up at all."[185]

236. The MOD's Iraq Secretariat had also been in touch with Mr Kerik in Baghdad.[186] As a result, they considered that the FCO's policing strategy was "about three weeks behind the curve" as Mr Kerik "doesn't want an international force, he wants trainers (about 7,000 of them)."

237. The UND commented:

> "Until we see a policing strategy from the Americans … I suggest we continue to sell our proposal."

238. At the AHMGIR held on 12 June, the FCO's policing strategy was not discussed.[187] Instead discussion on SSR focused on the deployment of UK personnel.

239. The minutes also recorded:

> "The US had asked for our advice on how to win hearts and minds and establish security based on our Northern Ireland experience. The MOD would send a team."

240. The MOD deployed OPTAG to train US military trainers and "pass on UK expertise in peace support operations" in June.[188]

241. Mr Andy Bearpark became the CPA Director of Operations and Director of Operations and Infrastructure in June 2003. He told the Inquiry:

> "The training of the new Iraqi police force was perceived of as an entirely civilian lead, even though military resources might be required."[189]

242. Mr Straw met Ambassador Bremer in Iraq on 2 July.[190] The record of the meeting stated that Mr Kerik had made a request for "experienced police officers to help with training and mentoring".

243. The nature of this request was clarified in the record of the IPU's visit to Iraq in early July, which stated:

> "… a specific request for 100 UK Police Officers in a mentoring/tutoring role for the next 18 months operating in Iraq was raised by Kerik."[191]

244. Police secondees were expected to contribute in a range of areas including training and mentoring, with some officers being expected to "have executive powers" (that is, to be operational police officers).

245. Acting DCC Brand deployed to Iraq on 4 July.[192]

246. Before his deployment, the evidence seen by the Inquiry indicates that there was no clear understanding of what his role would be. There had "been a hint that the role will be to head up the international policing effort", but it was decided that he should accompany the FCO's SSR team on a visit to Baghdad and that "if there is a substantial role for him it is intended that he will stay on".[193]

247. Former DCC Brand told the Inquiry that he had been "told that I should seek to negotiate my way in with Bernard Kerik, but if that failed to return to the UK".[194]

248. Once DCC Brand was in Iraq, agreement was reached that he would serve as Mr Kerik's chief adviser on policing.[195] Shortly after arriving in Baghdad, DCC Brand requested "immediate augmentation of three staff" to support his work in Baghdad and drafted himself some more detailed Terms of Reference. Those included responsibility for:

- policing Baghdad (under Mr Kerik's policy direction) – an operational function;
- developing an implementation strategy for policing in Baghdad, aimed at achieving transition from military primacy to civil police primacy;
- mentoring, coaching and training the Iraqi Chief of Police for Baghdad (once appointed) to a level that would allow the CPA to hand over authority and operational responsibility;
- advising the CPA on international support for policing in Iraq; and
- advising the CPA on the implementation of a strategy for policing in Iraq.

249. Former DCC Brand told the Inquiry that the purpose of the last two objectives was to remind Mr Kerik of his "broader responsibility for the rest of Iraq".[196]

250. Former DCC Brand later added that, "with the establishing of the second chief officer to go down there [Basra], I made an early decision, rightly or wrongly, that I wasn't going to trespass in his [Mr Kerik's] area, apart from the fact that I had enough to get on with in Baghdad and the rest of Iraq, but also there was a slightly different set-up".[197]

251. After Mr Kerik's tenure in Iraq ended in early September 2003,[198] DCC Brand effectively acted as senior adviser to the MOI "for a couple of months"[199] until late October when a US replacement, Mr Steve Casteel, was brought in.[200]

252. Former DCC Brand told the Inquiry that, during that period:

> "… it was a busy time and, of course, what got neglected was the police part."[201]

The UK approach to judicial reform

By the end of June 2003, the CPA had completed a review of the Iraqi justice sector.[202]

DFID officials summarised the conclusions and recommendations of the report as follows:

- A holistic upgrade of legal competence was required. To practise under the current system, lawyers needed only to register and attend a one-hour interview.
- The roles of key actors in the court system needed clarification and re-definition: specifically, prosecutors and defence lawyers should be more active and judges should perform a less prosecutorial function.
- Steps needed to be taken to reduce the endemic corruption in the legal system.

- The legal code should be clarified; choices needed to be made about which statutes were valid and which were not.
- Judges should be screened for Ba'ath Party status.
- Legal associations needed to be strengthened to raise standards of professionalism and self-regulation.
- Discrimination against women in the legal system was overwhelming. They were not allowed to attend the judicial training course that was the basis for selection as judges and prosecutors.[203]

The AHMGIR was briefed that some of the recommendations were already being put into effect.[204] On 17 June, Ambassador Bremer had announced the opening of a new Iraqi Judicial College, the creation of a Judicial Review Committee (responsible for de-Ba'athification of the judiciary) and the establishment of a Central Criminal Court. The CPA also proposed to establish an Office of Human Rights and Transitional Justice, which would operate alongside the Ministry of Justice.

Cabinet Office officials briefed members of the AHMGIR that: "We are generally content with the direction of CPA policy, but believe that the UN and NGOs should be more involved in the next stages."

Ministers discussed the Judicial Review Team's report at the AHMGIR on 26 June and agreed that "subject to closer scrutiny" they should support the report's recommendations "including by providing specialist advice".[205]

A DFID-sponsored mission by the International Legal Assistance Consortium (ILAC) visited Iraq from 13 to 30 August to scope projects for the reconstruction of the judicial system.[206] Four of the projects recommended by the mission formed the basis of the £2.2m DFID-funded ILAC Justice Support Programme (see Box, 'International Legal Assistance Consortium').

On 10 July, the AHMGIR considered a paper on judicial reform.[207]

Lord Goldsmith said that corruption and intimidation had left the Iraqi judicial system in a "worse state than expected" and that it would take a "long term commitment from the international community and particularly the Arab world to rebuild". He highlighted that Iraqi people wanted a system that would deal with current crimes as well as legacy crimes.

Ministers agreed that the UK should:

- encourage qualified and vetted Iraqi legal experts to assist reconstruction of the judicial sector;
- encourage participation of the UN, Arab and international experts;
- second suitable UK personnel where possible; and
- consider holding a conference on judicial issues in Iraq.

253. The AHMGIR next discussed SSR on 17 July for which the IPU – which had been renamed the 'Iraq Policy Unit' – provided an update paper.[208] The paper stated that there had been considerable progress in various SSR areas but that there was still no cohesive strategy. That lack of strategy was described as "not necessarily … a cause for current alarm" as it was a reflection of the rapidly moving situation in Iraq.

254. The paper described the splitting of SSR responsibilities as a "set back" and informed Ministers that there were now four senior UK personnel in Baghdad working in each of the main SSR areas (policing, intelligence, army and the MOD). Agreement that DCC Brand would serve as Mr Kerik's chief adviser was "an important gain".

255. The paper mentioned the requirement for approximately 7,000 international police officers. The US intended to provide 700 and the UK 100.

256. At the meeting of the AHMGIR, the IPU described the 7,000 target as "ambitious" although they considered that the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) might provide support.[209] By that stage, a police donors' conference should have been held and international contributions established according to the original FCO timeline produced on 3 June. The fact that timelines were slipping was not mentioned at the meeting or in the update paper.

257. On 1 August, the UND wrote to DCC Brand asking him to push for a policing strategy and stating:

> "The UK and other states will be reluctant to engage in the reform of the Iraqi police service unless we are shown that there is a clear strategy … If the CPA Interior Ministry is genuinely considering the deployment of a significant mentoring mission, it will urgently need to address these issues and make its case to a wider audience. We fully appreciate the constraints of the operating environment, but we are keen to keep up momentum and build on progress made."[210]

Training of the Iraqi Police Service begins

258. Formal police training began in late June.[211] On 16 July, the first 150 students graduated from the Transition Integration Programme – a three-week course designed for existing police officers and run by the US Military Police in Baghdad.[212]

259. The same month, Ambassador Bremer recommended that the training of police be accelerated and that additional international police be deployed to protect critical infrastructure.[213]

[213] Email Rumsfeld to Feith, 8 July 2003, 'Police in Iraq'.

260. On 8 July, Secretary Rumsfeld issued instructions to work up a plan and develop a list of requirements. He stated: "Prime Minister Blair said he agreed and would get some help."

261. That may be a reference to a video conference held on 3 July in which both Secretary Rumsfeld and Mr Blair participated. Mr Blair was reported to have asked Ambassador Bremer and Mr Sawers to draw up a list of their requirements, and said that the UK would "do our level best to meet any demand for additional resources".[214] That discussion is described in more detail in Section 9.2.

262. In early August, Mr Kerik briefed Ambassador Bremer on the requirement for police in Iraq.[215] He estimated that Iraq needed 65,000-75,000 police officers and said that it would take approximately six years to develop that size of force. Ambassador Bremer responded that it needed to be done in two years and allocated a US$120m budget from Iraqi Government funds.

263. On 10 August, DCC Brand reported that the CPA leadership had acknowledged that it would not be possible to attract the 6,600-strong International Police Training Force originally envisaged in the CPA's May assessment and that the aspiration was now "1,500 to 2,000".[216]

264. Hard Lessons stated that the US NSC rejected the original recommendation for 6,000 international police officers:

> "… viewing them as too ambitious and too expensive. Ultimately, Ambassador Bremer requested IRRF 2 [Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund] funding for 1,500 police advisors – of whom 1,000 would be American."[217]

Police training academies

One of the practical challenges facing those delivering the police training was where it should be carried out. Concerns about security within Iraq had led the CPA to consider the possibility of conducting the majority of the training in Hungary, though this plan failed to materialise.[218]

The next proposal, in September, was for a training college in Jordan which the CPA considered could be made ready by November 2003.[219] That facility would provide training for 35,000 Iraqi police recruits in a series of eight-week training courses, each taking 1,500 students.

Training of new recruits began in Jordan on 29 November with 36 UK police officers (a third of the training staff).[220] A further 40 UK officers were "on standby to join the … project as it expands". It was highlighted that: "Construction is behind schedule and conditions poor."

The first recruits to pass through the Jordan facility were existing recruits who had been going through police training at the point of the invasion.[221] Former DCC Brand described the course as "very, very basic".

Plans also progressed for police training inside Iraq. As mentioned in the CPA's May assessment of policing in Iraq, there were plans to open academies in Basra, Baghdad and the North of the country.

Plans for an academy near Basra were initiated by the military and then taken on by DCC Stephen White, Senior Police Adviser and Director of Law and Order for CPA(South). The academy was to be known as the Regional Police Training Academy (RPTA) and located at az-Zubayr, near Basra.

The Baghdad facility was run by a UK Chief Inspector and staffed by US military police.[222]

New Iraqi security structures

265. On 23 June, Mr Slocombe announced the formation of the New Iraqi Army (NIA).[223] The plans for the NIA included:

- To have a full division equivalent of 12,000 soldiers, who would be trained and operational in one year. By two years to have three divisions of 40,000 soldiers.
- To deploy battalions as they are trained, under the command of Iraqi officers.
- The military missions of the units will include protecting the nation's borders, provide military level security for certain routes and installations, help clear mines and UXO [unexploded ordnance]."

266. On 18 August, Ambassador Bremer signed CPA Order No.22, which set out the mission and role of the NIA.[224] It was to be responsible for:

> "… the military defense of the nation, including defense of the national territory and the military protection of the security of critical installations, facilities, infrastructure, lines of communication and supply, and population."

267. Although the NIA would have a role in internal disaster relief operations, the Order was explicit that:

> "The New Iraqi Army shall not have or exercise, domestic law enforcement functions, nor intervene in the domestic political affairs of the nation."

268. Ambassador Bremer was established as Commander in Chief, pending transfer of the role to an "internationally recognised, representative government, established by the people of Iraq".

269. Suitability for employment in the NIA would be judged on a number of criteria, including:

- "the absence of evidence of human rights violations or war crimes";
- "the absence of affiliation with the security and political control organs of the former regime"; and
- "the absence of association with Extremist Organisations or other groups that use or advocate the use of violence for political purposes whether internal or international".

270. In early August, the first 1,000 Iraqi Army recruits were sent by the CPA for basic training in Kirkush (north east of Baghdad) by CMATT.[225]

271. On 5 September, Secretary Rumsfeld ordered an acceleration of the programme to train the Iraqi Army, stating that the three planned Divisions must be ready by September 2004.[226] The budget to achieve this was increased from US$173m to US$2.2bn.

272. Hard Lessons records that Secretary Rumsfeld made the decision to halve training time to one year during a visit to Iraq in August 2003, as security was worsening.[227]

The Governing Council

The Governing Council (GC) was an Iraqi group with powers set out in Authorities of the Governing Council, agreed between international forces and members of the GC. It met for the first time on 13 July 2003 and is explained in more detail in Section 9.2.[228]

The agreement enabled the GC to make policy in all areas, including "the rebuilding and/or reform of Iraq's armed forces, police and justice sector … [and] ensuring that Iraq's police and military are depoliticised".[229]

The GC is sometimes referred to as the Iraq Governing Council (IGC). The two titles refer to the same body. The Inquiry has chosen to refer to the GC, for consistency, except where quoting others who have used IGC.

273. In July 2003, a new temporary Iraqi security force was established by US military commanders in order to help fight the growing insurgency – the Iraqi Civil Defence Corps (ICDC).[230] The concept was to:

- give Coalition operations an Iraqi face;
- keep unemployed young men out of the insurgency; and
- increase the number of security forces available.[231]

274. ICDC personnel were locally recruited and expected to live at home.

275. By August 2003, there were 23,000 ICDC personnel serving as linguists, security personnel, drivers and humanitarian relief providers. They also participated in patrols, convoys, cordons and checkpoints.[232]

276. The ICDC was formally established by CPA Order No.28, signed by Ambassador Bremer on 3 September 2003.[233] The Order explained that the ICDC was intended to be:

> "… a security and emergency service agency for Iraq … composed of Iraqis who will complement operations conducted by Coalition military forces in Iraq to counter organized groups and individuals employing violence against the people of Iraq and their national infrastructure."

277. The Order authorised the ICDC to perform "constabulary duties" including:

- patrolling urban and rural areas;
- conducting operations to search for and seize illegal weapons and other contraband;
- providing fixed site, check point, area, route and convoy security;
- providing crowd and riot control;
- disaster response services;
- search and rescue services;
- providing support to humanitarian missions and disaster recovery operations including transportation services;

- conducting joint patrols with Coalition Forces; and
- participating in other activities designed to build positive relationships between the Iraqi people and Coalition authorities including serving as community liaisons."

278. The ICDC operated under the authority of the Administrator of the CPA but was subject to the supervision of Coalition Forces. Hard Lessons stated:

> "… Because the ICDC was not part of the original CPA security sector plan, it posed significant co-ordination problems from its inception …There was little coordination with the Iraqi police or army and no accountability to any Iraqi ministry or the CPA.
> "Some in CMATT feared the ICDC could become a parallel security structure, competing with the police in local affairs and diluting the Iraqi Army's authority at the national level. But Coalition commanders valued the ICDC as a way to enable Iraqis to provide security for their own country, while supplementing CJTF-7's [Combined Joint Task Force 7] overstretched forces."[234]

279. However, Major General Andrew Stewart, General Officer Commanding (GOC) Multi-National Division South-East (MND(SE))[235] from December 2003 to July 2004, told the Inquiry that he believed the ICDC "was a success".[236] He described a visit by Lieutenant General David Petraeus, Commanding General, Office of Security Co-operation (the creation of the OSC is described later in this Section):

> "He [Gen Petraeus] was responsible for the security sector, came down, saw the ICDC in Basra in particular and went away pretty impressed about it, and said 'I haven't seen anything approaching this'."

An Iraqi intelligence service

In September 2003, Mr David Richmond, the Prime Minister's Special Representative on Iraq,[237] reported that the US was preparing to set up an internal Iraqi intelligence service linked to the police and the MOI. The interim Minister of the Interior told Mr Richmond that he was keen to have UK advice on setting up an investigative branch and a counter-terrorism branch.[238]

DCC Brand told the Inquiry:

> "… an opportunity arose for us to influence the direction in which the development of the Iraqi Intelligence Service … was going to go … I argued over a series of meetings … that, if we had a sort of special branch system … where the intelligence > service does the intelligence work and the arresting and locking-up is done by a police agency, that gives a useful balance, allows people to actually focus on their main area of expertise and doesn't cause the problems of the intelligence people having the power to arrest and detain and do whatever else they need to do to get information. Eventually … Ambassador Bremer was persuaded … and made that as a decision. I could not get a special branch manager or somebody retired who had that skill of being able to take the concept into reality, and so we lost the opportunity and that disappeared."[239]

In April 2004, the Iraqi National Intelligence Service (INIS) was established. Its operational officers and support staff had been trained and vetted and were based in Baghdad, with a planned outstation in Basra.[240] It included some former intelligence officers.

INIS was initially headed by former Major General Mohammed al-Shehwani, who had been forced into exile by Saddam Hussein in 1984.[241]

In a paper by the MOD dated 6 June 2006, intelligence was one of the areas described as "immature", having been "placed deliberately at the back of the force generation process".[242]

Later, in spring 2008, a new intelligence structure was developed in Basra.[243] Lieutenent General Barney White-Spunner, GOC MND(SE) from February to August 2008, described that structure to the Inquiry:

> "… at the end of the Charge of the Knights, General Mohammed and I put together, I hope, quite a sophisticated counter-terrorist structure in Basra with a co-ordination committee which brought all the Iraqi Security Forces together. We fused them into various intelligence agencies … We were able to combine police and army posts across the city."

280. Two other security forces were created under the jurisdiction of the MOI in autumn 2003:

- CPA Order No.26, signed on 24 August 2003, created the Department of Border Enforcement (DBE).[244] Previous immigration officials were prevented from employment because of their connection to Saddam Hussein's secret police.[245]
- CPA Order No.27, signed on 4 September 2003, created the Facilities Protection Service (FPS).[246] The FPS was designed to provide site security for ministry

Global Conflict Prevention Pool Strategy

281. On 1 August, Ministers from the FCO, DFID and the MOD were asked to agree a joint FCO/DFID/MOD Iraq Strategy for the Global Conflict Prevention Pool (GCPP).[247] The Strategy aimed to provide a coherent framework for UK activities aimed at preventing conflict in Iraq. It defined its "initial focus of activity" as SSR. Work on that element of the Strategy was the most well developed, and Ministers were invited to agree that expenditure on SSR activities could start immediately while work continued to define the other elements of the Strategy.

Global Conflict Prevention Pool

The Global Conflict Prevention Pool (GCPP) was a UK Government fund bringing together the work of the FCO, the MOD and DFID in conflict prevention.[248] The aim was a more strategic and cost-effective approach to conflict prevention and reduction. Activities included conflict assessments, supporting peace initiatives and DDR programmes.

282. The "second element" of the Strategy was assistance to "Iraqi governorates and local administrations within the British AO as they develop to ensure that policy decisions are made strategically and with an understanding of conflict prevention issues."[249] That included assistance to improve access to justice, encourage the involvement of women in local administrations, and develop a fair and equitable prison service. The third element was further studies and analyses to assist in the development of UK conflict prevention strategies. The geographical spread of the programmes had not yet been determined, although there were "good arguments" in favour of focusing in the South to deliver an "exemplar southern model".

283. The estimated cost of the Strategy was £7.5m per year for the UK financial years 2003/04 and 2004/05. Of the £15m total, £9.5m was allocated for SSR, £4m for local governance and £1.5m for further studies and analyses. The implementation plan for the Strategy listed a number of SSR activities, including:

- support for the police;
- support for customs reform including the deployment of nine HM Customs and Excise personnel starting on 18 August;

- support to develop a comprehensive Borders, Customs and Immigration Policy by 2005, and for the deployment of a senior immigration representative on 18 August;
- support to develop the Iraqi armed forces, to be defined by 6 August; and
- support for intelligence reform and development, to be defined by 15 August.

284. In the last week of September, an official from UND estimated that UK spend to date on policing Iraq was almost £127,000.[250] Of that amount, around £25,000 had been spent on pre-deployment training; approximately £44,000 on equipment, travel and subsistence; around £43,000 on travel and difficult post allowances; and around £15,000 on officers' salaries.

285. An annex to the UND paper described the cost of deploying an officer to Iraq, by rank, as:

- Constable: £68,670;
- Sergeant: £71,670;
- Inspector: £79,670;
- Chief Inspector: £81,670;
- Superintendent: £86,670; and
- Chief Constable: £141,670.[251]

The departure of the UN

On 19 August 2003, a bomb exploded outside the UN headquarters at the Canal Hotel, Baghdad. It killed 22 UN staff and visitors, including Mr Sérgio Vieira de Mello, the UN Special Representative in Iraq.[252] A second bomb attack on the UN followed on 22 September. Sir John Sawers told the Inquiry that the attacks were subsequently attributed to Al Qaida (AQ).[253]

Tension in central Iraq increased after the UN bombing.[254] By 29 August, the World Bank and International Monetary Fund (IMF) missions had been withdrawn, a number of NGOs were withdrawing their international staff, and the UN had withdrawn some staff temporarily while reviewing its options.[255]

Sir David Richmond told the Inquiry:

> "… the decision by the UN to withdraw from Iraq which they took around about the middle of September after a security review, I think … was regrettable, and it meant for several months they were not really playing any sort of role in Iraq. It also meant when Lakhdar Brahimi [the UN's Special Envoy to Iraq] arrived, initially in the end of January 2004 and then again in April 2004, he was really working on his own."[256]

Policing strategy: Iraqiisation

286. By early September 2003, the concept of "Iraqiisation" had started being used in Whitehall (see Section 9.2). The term "Iraqiisation" did not have a common or precise definition, but was generally used to mean the ability of the ISF to maintain security independently, rather than under the leadership of the international forces.

287. On 2 September, Mr Blair held a meeting of Ministers and senior personnel.[257] They included Mr Straw, Mr Hoon, Mr Hilary Benn (the International Development Secretary), Gen Walker, Sir Richard Dearlove (Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service), Mr John Scarlett (Chairman, Joint Intelligence Committee), Sir Jeremy Greenstock (the Prime Minister's Special Representative on Iraq from September), Mr Sawers (from August the FCO Director General for Political Affairs) and No.10 officials.

288. The account of the meeting stated that "the Prime Minister wanted action on Iraq taken forward with a heightened sense of urgency" ahead of a planned telephone conversation with President Bush to review progress. In relation to internal security, the record stated:

> "The Prime Minister believes that the key to the security situation in Iraq is the rapid mobilisation of an effective Iraqi police force. This should include:
> - Police manpower up to 70,000 within three months, as a stage towards a full force;
> - Adequate trainers and secure training facilities;
> - Flexible handling of de-Ba'athification in order not to exclude recruits unnecessarily;
> - Establishment of an internal intelligence service;
> - Mobilisation of the Protection Force and Civil Defence Force to protect key installations."

289. The IPU was asked to provide a paper setting out further advice after consulting DFID, the MOD, the FCO and the Home Office, which it did on 3 September.[258]

[257] Letter Cannon to Adams, 2 September 2003, 'Iraq: Briefing for the Prime Minister'.
[258] Paper IPU, 3 September 2003, 'Iraq Security Plan'.

290. The paper reiterated that the existing strategy was to have 70,000 Iraqi police in place by mid-2004 and a 40,000-strong Iraqi Army in place within a year. It stated that the UK's target was to have deployed 100 police trainers by the end of 2003, out of a planned CPA total of 600.

291. The paper reiterated that the "training of the police should be accelerated and given a proper strategy (without which potential international contributors will not come forward)" but did not give details of how this might happen. The IPU considered that the key principles for what could be achieved were:

- The Coalition should work through existing local leadership and customs and Iraqis must take increasing security responsibility.
- Intelligence on the threats should be improved.
- De-Ba'athification principles should be applied flexibly.
- Key programmes should be accelerated and made more effective, including by bringing police and army reform under a single head and providing more resources.
- Coalition Forces should be released for counter-terrorism tasks by giving basic security tasks to Iraqi forces.

292. In conclusion, the paper stated:

> "While we develop Iraqi capability and broaden the international security presence, we must keep threats under control. This means more Coalition Forces are needed in the short term …"

293. There was no proposal for where this resource should come from, nor was there an assessment of whether it was realistic to train 70,000 police officers within a three-month period as suggested by Mr Blair.

294. Another briefing paper, produced by Mr David Richmond,[259] stated that although Ambassador Bremer agreed with the importance of accelerating recruitment he did not:

> "… think that a target of 70,000 within the next three months is achievable. The cost would be huge and, however successful we were in speeding up training, the overwhelming majority of new recruits would end up with no training at all. This would be counter-productive."[260]

[260] Telegram 150 IraqRep to FCO London, 4 September 2003, 'Iraq: Briefing for Prime Minister'.

295. The IPU paper was considered by the AHMGIR on 4 September.[261] The minutes recorded that the IPU stated:

> "The US had elaborate plans for Security Sector Reform, but faster action was needed. We should give priority to the rapid expansion of the Civil Defence Corps and the Facilities Protection Service … We should consider encouraging neighbourhood security schemes and working with tribal leaders in rural areas."

296. Sir Jeremy Greenstock was recorded as warning that the proposals "were not enough to bring the impact required in the short term".

297. Ministers agreed that ideas in the paper were "useful but required further work which should be taken forward urgently".

298. Ahead of a video conference with President Bush on 5 September (see Section 6.2), Mr Blair sent the President a Note which stated:

> "Iraq has 37,000 police. We need to double that. Given the number of trainers and their facilities, that will take a year. We cannot wait that long. So: if we need to treble or quadruple the trainers and expand the numbers of Iraqi police even beyond that contemplated, we should do it. Some of the Governing Council believe that in certain areas, they should decide how far to take de-Ba'athification in order to speed up the process. There may be good constraints/reasons why these things should not happen or take time, but we have to be very clear that the priority is to get movement fast. There must also be a top quality intelligence capability given to the Iraqis to act on the threat. This is essential."[262]

299. The record of the video conference between Mr Blair and President Bush stated that Mr Blair said a "big push" was required in boosting numbers and speeding up training of Iraqi Security Forces.[263]

300. The IPU provided a more detailed paper entitled 'Security Action Plan' for the inaugural meeting of the Iraq Senior Officials Group on 9 September (the creation of which is addressed in Section 9.2).[264] The IPU maintained that the focus should be on the ICDC and the police "as the most likely to produce quick results, while continuing to support the longer-term development of the New Iraqi Army". It did not address Mr Blair's concept of trebling the trainers available or expanding Iraqi police numbers.

301. For ICDC development, the IPU said that more UK Short Term Training Teams were required and that national funding should be used to avoid "procedural delays".

The MOD was also pursuing deployment of 12 non-commissioned officers to assist with training of the Iraqi Army.

302. The IPU assessed that "the main problem in developing the Iraqi Police is the slowness with which CPA is developing its strategy, concept and timelines for reform" and that "in the absence of a central strategy, we are pursuing regional options".

303. In the meeting, most of the actions in the paper were agreed although the minutes make no mention of the use of national resources to progress SSR.[265] It was also suggested that DCC Brand could potentially produce a policing strategy and that Sir Jeremy Greenstock should lobby Ambassador Bremer on the "necessity of having a strategy".

304. On 14 September, Sir Jeremy Greenstock sent a teleletter to Sir Nigel Sheinwald (Prime Minister's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of OD Sec), Mr Sawers, Mr Geoffrey Adams (Mr Straw's Principal Private Secretary), Mr John Buck (Mr Straw's Private Secretary) and Sir Hilary Synnott (Head of CPA(South)).[266] It stated:

> "Security will colour everything. The right way forward is Iraqiisation, particularly in the police. Bremer and his advisers are clear on the principle. But there is as yet no central plan for police training, and no CPA focal point for driving it forward. I am going to have to expend ammunition on this soon. Meanwhile London (and Washington) should be maximising the input of resources into the police area, not just training but also the provision of cars, equipment, radios etc. All this should be prepared now, even if Ministers only sign it off when they see the planned requirement set out. It is truly urgent."

305. The Annotated Agenda for the meeting of the AHMGIR on 18 September re-affirmed the requirement for a "coherent overall policing strategy".[267] Cabinet Office officials reported that the UK was lobbying Ambassador Bremer and Washington to expedite creation of a strategy and operational plan, and was offering the services of DCC Brand to write them. The paper did not reflect Mr Blair's desire to treble the number of police trainers.

306. Ministers discussed policing at the AHMGIR on 18 September and "endorsed the plans for police training outlined in the Annotated Agenda and agreed that they should be implemented as swiftly as possible with whatever UK help was necessary".[268]

A co-ordinated UK Government policy on SSR – but no mention of Iraq

In September 2003, a Whitehall policy seminar was held to look at best practice on SSR.[269] To coincide with that, officials within the FCO, the MOD and DFID had planned to publish a report on SSR best practice. The MOD minute to Ministers stated that "SSR is an area that necessitates high levels of co-operation and co-ordination between all three Departments" and that the Departments had, in the Global Conflict Prevention Pool SSR Strategy, a "common objective of helping governments of developing and transitional countries fulfil their legitimate security functions through reforms that will make the delivery of security more democratically accountable, as well as more effective and efficient". However, there was "currently no joint policy brief to guide practitioners" beyond a 1999 DFID statement on the link between poverty and security, which had become out of date.

There was no mention of Iraq in the SSR report or the Ministerial foreword.[270]

307. On 19 September, DCC Brand produced an "Info Memo" for Ambassador Bremer containing a plan for Iraqi police training and development.[271] DCC Brand wrote that the goal was to establish a 65,000-70,000 member Iraqi police force over 18 months to two years with an estimated annual cost of US$970m. That would require 600 international trainers and 1,500 international police advisers and mentors with executive authority.

308. DCC Brand broke the plan down into four strands:

- Police recruitment and selection (US$5m) – to identify and initially screen at least 33,000 qualified candidates with a team of 25 police and 150 MOI staff.
- Police training (US$150m) – to be run in Iraq and Jordan. Existing police officers would receive a three-week Transitional Integration Programme and new recruits would receive an eight-week basic police skills recruit course.
- Police institutional reform and development (US$800m) – to create a "uniformed 1,500 member International Coalition Police Force (ICPF) which will have executive authority and authorised to be armed, and will implement new organisational structures, standard operating procedures, training and equipment guidelines for police throughout Iraq under command of a CPA appointed commissioner".
- Developing police operational capacities (US$20m) – to focus on developing specialised skills to deal with organised kidnapping, extortion and trafficking.

309. The only comment on the plan seen by the Inquiry came from CC Kernaghan who expressed concerns about the ICPF, writing:

> "To avoid problems later on, this concept requires thought and staff work now."[272]

310. The Inquiry has not been able to establish what became of that plan: it has not seen any further reference to it in contemporary papers.

311. At a video conference with President Bush on 13 October, Mr Blair stressed the importance he attached to Iraqiisation of the police and ICDC.[273]

312. By mid-October no agreed CPA policing strategy had been produced. Despite that, on 17 October an update from Mr Straw's office to No.10 stated: "We judge that the Coalition now has a credible and deliverable strategy to train 30,000 Iraqi police over the next year."[274] By that stage around 40,000 police officers were considered to have been trained.

313. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that he considered that judgement to be "reasonable" at the time, but that with hindsight he could see that it was not.[275]

International contribution to police trainers

Following US/CPA/UK discussions in Amman and London on international police trainers, lobbying efforts were agreed and shared with Sir Jeremy Greenstock and DCC Brand on 3 October.[276] The UK was to act as a "clearing house" for offers of assistance from EU Member States plus Australia, Canada, New Zealand and South Africa. The US would be approaching other members of the international community.

The Police Contributors Conference, originally planned for 30 June, was held on 20 October in London and hosted by the FCO.[277] It was attended by representatives from EU Member and Accession States, the European Council, Canada, Australia, Jordan and Singapore. The focus of the event appears to have been to encourage countries to deploy police trainers to staff the training facility in Jordan (see Box, Police training academies'), rather than into Iraq. "Firm" pledges of support in the form of trainers for the Jordan facility were received from Canada (20), Poland (10) and the Czech Republic (10), with other countries reported to be likely to decide on contributions after the Madrid Donors' Conference (later that week).

By 24 November, further pledges of police trainers had been made by Finland (five), Slovenia (five), Austria (four) and Slovakia (two).[278]

By mid-2005, additional training staff were contributed by Jordan (66), Sweden (10), Singapore (six), Hungary (three), Belgium (two), Australia (two) and Estonia (one).[279]

314. On 24 October, Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that General Ricardo Sanchez, Commander of the Coalition's military command – Combined Joint Taskforce 7 (CJTF-7), had ordered a "comprehensive internal review of the security sector".[280] Sir Jeremy reported:

> "The up-to-date military assessment is that operations have now lost momentum … [and that] … despite plans to accelerate the generation of Iraqi Security Forces, progress may still be too slow … The emerging view of the military is that this structure is stovepiped, lacks oversight and results in competing roles and responsibilities within the security sector."

315. Sir Jeremy also highlighted that General John Abizaid, Commander US Central Command (CENTCOM), and Ambassador Bremer would attend discussions in Washington covering SSR later in the week.

316. On 27 October, CJTF-7 issued an Order entitled "Acceleration of the Iraqi Police Services" which envisaged an enhanced support requirement from CJTF-7 for enlarged and accelerated police training programmes.[281]

317. On 6 November, the AHMGIR was briefed that the new approach included:

- accelerating recruitment, training and deployment of Iraqi security forces. The Iraqi Civil Defence Corps is now set to increase to 36 battalions by April 2004. The target for 70,000 police should be reached by August 2004 rather than March 2005. As a result training of the Iraqi Army will be slowed, but the Army will now be allowed to undertake internal as well as external security tasks. Once trained, total Iraqi forces will number 200,000;
- changing tactics to put Iraqi forces in the front-line with Coalition Forces in support; and
- recruiting more expert members of the former regime's security forces."[282]

318. Former DCC Brand told the Inquiry:

> "Trying to persuade my military colleagues at two-star and three-star level that this was a long-term investment of restructuring the police seemed to work against their sort of short-term mission goals, and I very vividly remember the presentation that was done to the Commanding General which was entitled '30,000 in 30 Days' … I had to say 'Okay, in that case then, why don't you give me the military to train? I have read a few war books, I have seen a few war films, it can't be as difficult as that, or is that as ridiculous as what you are suggesting, which is we recruit 30,000 in 30 days, call them police, label them police, give them weapons and say 'You are now in the police' but actually have no capability to do the things that policemen should do at all?"[283]

Concerns about strategy

319. CC Kernaghan visited Iraq for the second time in mid-November 2003.[284] His visit was affected by a "security 'lockdown'" which meant he was unable to travel into Basra and so met Sir Hilary Synnott in Basra Airport.[285]

320. In his report to the Home and Foreign Secretaries, CC Kernaghan commented:

> "… the 'bad luck' factor has kicked in with a vengeance … The security situation is not good and will become worse, but the answer to many aspects of the problem is an effective Iraqi security infrastructure … It is quite clear that the current level of UK police assistance is unsustainable in that it is insufficient to deliver a coherent package of support and I suggest that the UK Government has to decide to either increase our assistance or withdraw our support altogether."[286]

321. CC Kernaghan stated that he "detected the lack of a clear vision" for policing within Iraq and was concerned that a "hybrid US City department/UK police service" was being created. He commented that he was "unclear as to the overall CPA Iraq 'model' and whether or not a single tier national service is being created". CC Kernaghan also reported that senior officials were "reluctant to be definitive as to the CP[A]'s strategic plan" because "meetings in Washington (and London) might well totally change existing plans".

322. A Cabinet Office Ministerial update on 19 November stated:

> "The CPA has no current plans to draw up a formal policing strategy. Their view is that command, control and administrative arrangements for the police will depend heavily on unsettled constitutional issues and thus must await further political progress … Partly in this context, Jim Daniel, a senior ex-HO [Home Office] adviser, sent by us to help generate a policing strategy has decided to resign."[287]

323. The update did not state the UK's view of the CPA position but said:

> "In response, we are following up a new request from DCC Brand … for additional UK officers to support him in implementing the existing training plan."

324. As early as May 2003, Sir David Manning and Ambassador Bremer recognised that:

> "De-Ba'athification and the dissolution of security ministries would create a new reservoir of angry men. So there was a need to step up patrols and tighten up security."[288]

325. At the end of 2003, as security worsened, the debate around the extent to which de-Ba'athification should be applied to the Iraqi Security Forces was ongoing.

326. Between October and December, the issue of re-employing Ba'athist security personnel was mentioned three times in communications between Mr Blair and President Bush.

327. On 7 October, in a video conference with President Bush Mr Blair "urged sensitive handling of demobilised ex-Iraqi Army soldiers".[289]

328. In a video conference on 27 October, Mr Blair highlighted the possibility of re-mobilising "former Ba'athist intelligence officers".[290]

329. Before President Bush's visit to the UK in November 2003, Mr Rycroft gave Mr Blair a copy of a paper entitled 'Iraq: Security', for discussion with President Bush.[291] The document was described as "Jeremy's paper" and the Inquiry assumes that it was written by Sir Jeremy Greenstock. Under the heading "Iraqiisation" it said:

> "Must accept previously Ba'athist elements in the security forces, provided not linked with former repression. Militias … need to be brought in in an inclusive transparent way … plans for this should be drawn up immediately with IGC."

330. Mr Blair gave President Bush a slightly revised version of Sir Jeremy's paper, in which this text had not been altered.[292]

331. Mr Richmond visited Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province, in mid-November.[293] The dominant theme of his discussions was local concerns about unemployment as a result of the dismantling of Iraqi military structures.

332. Mr Richmond reported:

> "Unemployment had forced many to do illegal acts, including attacks on the Coalition. They wanted to help the Coalition and could do much to improve the security situation if they could be given back their jobs; they were also keen to serve their country. They complained about de-Ba'athification which made it impossible for most of them to be employed by the State. The governor said that 50 percent had joined the Ba'ath Party not out of conviction but because it was a condition of employment; 40 percent for material gain; and only some 10 percent because they supported Ba'athist ideology …

> "Jerry Thompson (CPA advisor for security affairs) explained the acceleration of recruitment to the ICDC, police and the New Iraqi Army [NIA], but he pointed out the different nature of the NIA and the fact that it would be much smaller than the old army. Recruiting in Ramadi would start in January. He encouraged them to participate."

333. In a video conference with President Bush on 4 December, Mr Blair was recorded to have underlined the importance of Iraqiisation, including involving the Sunni community and ex-Ba'athists.[294]

334. In mid-November a new political timetable for Iraq was announced, which brought forward the assumption of power by the Iraqi Transitional Government (ITG) to June 2004.[295]

335. Former DCC Brand told the Inquiry that the change of timetable critically changed everyone's outlook: "all the focus was on 'Let's get this over to the Iraqis', and so our longer-term intentions were almost squashed from there on."[296]

336. Also in November, Secretary Rumsfeld ordered Major General Karl Eikenberry, former US Security Co-ordinator and Chief of the Office of Military Co-operation in Afghanistan, to assess what reforms were necessary to produce enough capable Iraqi forces to take over security responsibilities.[297] His report, published in February 2004, is described later in this Section.

337. In December 2003, the CPA produced a plan to achieve the accelerated timetable for transfer of authority by the end of June 2004.[298]

338. The plan included a section on security which stated that to meet the accelerated timeline, the following changes were required:

- an accelerated stand-up of the IMOD and the National Command Authority;
- accelerated development of internal security capabilities in the MOI (Anti-Terrorist Branch, criminal intelligence);
- a focus on anti-corruption capacity-building; and
- accelerated recruitment, training and deployment of Iraqi Security Forces.

339. The plan also described two key security policy decisions that were required, as identified by CPA staff:

> "First, the development of a holistic approach to the Iraqi security sector, including clarification of ICDC missions and interface with other security elements. Second, decisions on the integration of former militias into security forces and on militia demobilization."

340. On 4 December, the CPA Office of Policy Planning and Analysis produced a paper entitled 'Iraq: Integrated Security Sector Development'.[299] It was an assessment of the current situation and plans, the desired position and a consideration of what thinking and action was required by the CPA and CJTF-7 to achieve the desired position.

341. It is the first assessment the Inquiry has seen that attempted to articulate all SSR plans in one paper and consider how they interacted. The executive summary explained that the paper benefited from detailed input by security sector experts in both CPA and CJTF-7.

342. The paper described the CPA-defined end state for security in Iraq as:

"- there is a secure environment for people and property that enables citizens to participate fully in political and economic life;

- the Iraqi Government has the means, including its own defense and police forces, to assume its responsibility for external and internal security, including policing of its borders;
- the roles and accountabilities of organizations providing security are clearly defined within a legal framework which governs, inter alia, the ownership of weapons."

343. The paper stated that CPA and CJTF-7 activity had "often been driven by the short-term requirement to address pressing security needs" and highlighted weaknesses:

- We have not designed our security sector development program based on a thorough conflict assessment;
- There is no overarching security vision for Iraq that joins up short-term current activities with long-term goals;
- We are focusing on building tactical and operational capabilities – the building of Iraqi governance and oversight capacity is proceeding more slowly;
- Local ownership of the Security Sector Reform process and policy is in its infancy;
- We are focusing on 'hard' security force development with limited attention being paid to building 'soft' Iraqi capacity to prevent or manage conflicts."

344. The paper assessed each element of the security sector before discussing its overall governance and accountability. Although the long-term aim for the NIA was a focus on external security, it was likely that it would be employed on internal security and so a legal framework for that was needed. The ICDC would become an army reserve. The paper also mentioned plans to develop an Iraqi Coastal Defence capability and an aviation element for transportation and medical evacuation by autumn 2004. All that would be organised by a Joint Forces Headquarters which would be established by June 2004.

345. The desired end state for the IPS was a "single nation-wide police service that combines centralized standards and policies with local accountability … Its 85,000 officers will be well-trained through a combination of basic mandate training, mentoring, and specialist and leadership training". The paper highlighted that the IPS was being developed whilst it was in the front line fighting the insurgency campaign.

346. Problems with individual ministerial capacity to manage the FPS were also identified.

347. The paper described some activity on intelligence services, including the IPS developing basic criminal intelligence capabilities in Baghdad and MOI plans for a national criminal intelligence unit. There was an absence of a suitable legal framework. The paper stated that oversight mechanisms which balanced effectiveness with accountability were required.

348. On criminal justice, the paper stated that courts were "back up and running nationwide, albeit at below their pre-war capacity" and that prisons were being repaired or reconstructed. There were also fundamental revisions to the penal code and procedures. It described justice and policing systems as mutually reinforcing. It identified a number of issues, including the vulnerability of the judiciary to violence and prison capacity, which it recommended should be addressed.

349. The paper also contained a section on militias, where it assessed that there were over 30 known militias with between 30,000 and 60,000 personnel. It explained that the Coalition's original intent for militia personnel had been DDR. However, that had not happened due to the violence it might provoke, the absence of police to "fill the vacuums" and the complexity of the task. The paper stated:

> "Since the November 15 Agreement, there has been a tendency amongst the political parties to hold on to their militias to protect their interests … The creation of an ICDC 'special battalion' and CT [counter-terrorism] company from G-5 militias is a departure from the CPA policy of seeking to disband militias but may provide an alternative means of integrating the party militias."

350. The paper recommended that policy on militias should be clarified.

351. The governance and accountability section of the paper emphasised the importance of civilian control, noting that the "institutionalisation of CPA/Iraqi civil governance mechanisms is falling behind the development of fielded forces". On police accountability the paper stated:

> "The outstanding issue is the question of the structure of the national police service and the relationships of local police services with Governors and Provincial Councils. The model currently being proposed involves a higher degree of central control than initially envisaged; this has been deemed necessary in the emergency period."

352. The paper described a series of high-level actions required to develop governance further including building oversight mechanisms into the Fundamental Law[300] and creating security architecture to run a counter-insurgency campaign.

[300] The 'Fundamental Law' is the law that determines the constitution of government.

353. In summary, the paper stated that the CPA "still lacks an organisational mechanism for delivering joined-up policy direction on the security sector". It recommended that detailed planning was required to transfer security to Iraqi control.

354. It is unclear what became of the paper – there is no mention of it in contemporary papers that the Inquiry has seen.

355. Towards the end of 2003, there was awareness in the UK system that assessments given by US commanders were "exaggerated" and there were doubts about Iraqi capacity.[301]

356. By the middle of December, the FCO assessed that there were around 45,000 operational police throughout Iraq, all requiring some level of re-training.[302] The US assessment was that there were 63,000 operational police.

357. The Annotated Agenda for the 18 December meeting of the AHMGIR stated:

> "US military plans for Iraqiisation of security remain highly ambitious. [General] Abizaid foresees Coalition military withdrawal from cities and Iraqi police able to combat terrorists by April 2004. But this handover can only take place if targets for expanding Iraqi units are met."[303]

358. The minutes of the meeting recorded that Ministers "noted the security situation and that Iraqi security capacity was not being built up at a sufficient rate and quality to meet CPA aspirations" and "agreed that they and officials should lobby their US counterparts to improve training of Iraqi Security Forces, particularly the police".[304]

International Legal Assistance Consortium

In January 2004, DFID approved £2m (later increased to £2.2m) for the International Legal Assistance Consortium (ILAC) justice support programme,[305] to provide training in international human rights law to Iraqi judges, lawyers and prosecutors.[306] The programme was expected to cover a two-year period.[307]

By February 2005, DFID's justice support programme had trained 218 Iraqi judges, lawyers and prosecutors in human rights, international humanitarian law and independence of the judiciary.[308]

An internal DFID review of the project in June 2006 concluded that although the training (held in Dubai for security reasons) was generally of a high quality and cost-effective, the project was unlikely to lead to sustainable improvements in professional practice in the absence of any continuing in-country support for the trainees or any links to broader institutional reform processes.[309] An in-country justice adviser had been recruited to mitigate these weaknesses, but she had been withdrawn from Iraq after 10 days for security reasons. The review commented:

> "… the project should have been used as an entry point for DFID's work in this sector, been more flexible in the range of activities it could support, and been more closely linked to efforts at donor co-ordination … The [review] team acknowledges that the project was put together under pressure rapidly to get programme activities started with some quick-win activities … The pressure to move fast, however, may well have sown the seeds for the eventual, limited impact."

359. In late January 2004, Acting DCC Brand reported that it had been agreed at a meeting between the CPA and the US NSC to reduce the planned "Civpol police adviser pool" – those officers who would undertake monitoring/mentoring duties – from 1,500 to 500 and to use the savings to finance specialist facilities and trainers.[310] DCC Brand was unable to attend; it is unclear whether there was any other UK representation at the meeting. The advisers were to be provided by Dyncorps,[311] with 50 being earmarked for the South.[312]

360. Although training at the Jordan training facility was under way, an FCO update to No.10 on 18 February detailed "infrastructure and contract" problems.[313]

361. The response from No.10 stated:

> "The Prime Minister was disappointed to read of continuing problems with the police training in Jordan. It is not good enough that the training school is running at only half its capacity and that at the current rate the police training programme will need to extend at least to the end of the year."[314]

362. Mr Blair requested a further update detailing the steps to be taken to "get this vital training programme back on track".

363. Mr Blair raised his concerns over delays in funding the police training camp in Jordan in a video conference with President Bush on 24 February, in which Vice President Cheney and Dr Rice also participated.[315] The White House team told Mr Blair that funding was not an issue and that problems with equipment had been overcome. Dr Rice described police training as a "too many cooks" situation that would be improved by the new centralised military command.

364. In January 2004, the MOD deployed a Defence Advisory Team (DAT) to scope the requirements for the new Iraqi Ministry of Defence (IMOD).[316] UK military trainers were also working on the creation of the Iraqi Joint Forces HQ, to provide command and control of the Iraqi Armed Forces.

365. The DAT reported its findings to Mr Webb on 30 January.[317] It assessed that:

> "Sufficient detailed progress has been made towards the achievement of an IMOD with an initial operating capacity available from 1 May 04. Additional UK staffing assistance is warranted in the context of both immediate needs and future mentoring and implementation requirements … We find that a UK lead for an empowered mentoring implementation project, to deliver the institutional development of a fully functional MOD, would be appropriate."

366. The DAT recommended that the UK provide immediate assistance in the areas of vetting and public affairs, and consider a longer-term role mentoring key positions within the IMOD. The total mentoring requirement was expected to be around 17 staff, of whom five should be MOD UK-based civilians. The project was forecast to last two years at a cost of £1.9m, rising to £3.65m if suitable mentors could not be found from the public service.

The military take control of police reform

367. In February 2004, Maj Gen Eikenberry produced an assessment of what reforms were necessary to deliver enough capable Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) to take over security responsibilities.[318]

368. The review team, which travelled to Iraq in January 2004, consisted of 22 members primarily from the US authorities and included a UK colonel.[319]

369. The key findings of the review team were:

- the need for unity of command across the security sector (the military were to assume overall command);
- the need to develop the capacity and capability of ISF (military and police) rapidly;

- the need for sustained monitoring and mentoring of the ISF beyond 1 July 2004; and
- the endorsement of the CENTCOM Strategic Concept to transfer security responsibilities to Iraqi forces that would permit a reduction in the numbers of Coalition Forces needed to perform internal security tasks. The timelines envisaged were:
  - local transfer by 1 July 2004;
  - regional transfer by 1 September 2004; and
  - national transfer by September 2006.

370. The report recommended that:

- The training and equipping programmes for the IPS should be accelerated significantly, the numbers of police increased and the Coalition military given the task of training, equipping, mentoring and certifying them.
- The ICDC should be renamed the Iraqi Civil Guard, be recognised as an enduring organisation (possibly a gendarmerie-type force) under the control of the IMOD, have its strength increased from 36 to 43 battalions and be given professional development.
- The Iraqi Army's focus should remain on external threats but its training rate could be reduced (to allow more rapid development of other security forces).[320]

371. The summary of the report produced for the Chiefs of Staff stated:

> "… the UK, through MND(SE), is regarded as the leader in 'best practice'; in particular the objective monitoring, mentoring and certification of Iraqi security forces. As such we will be asked to assist in developing this programme throughout Iraq."[321]

372. The Eikenberry Review was discussed by the Iraq Senior Officials Group on 3 February.[322] The minutes described Maj Gen Eikenberry's recommendations for security structures as "acceptable" but said that proposals that IMOD and SSR structures should sit under the new Multi National Force (MNF) command were "less to our liking".

373. Sir Nigel Sheinwald chaired a meeting of the Iraq Strategy Group on 13 February.[323] A record of the meeting by Mr Tom Dodd, OD Sec, stated that "Baghdad and Washington were still divided over the future of the ICDC": General Abizaid and Ambassador Bremer "preferred it becoming an army reserve" as opposed to Maj Gen Eikenberry's proposed gendarmerie.

374. According to the RAND assessment of the Occupation of Iraq, Ambassador Bremer welcomed the proposal to put training of the Iraqi military under Coalition military control.[324] However, he was resistant to the proposal that police training should transfer to military responsibility, arguing strongly that policing was a civilian, not a military, profession.

375. The briefing for the AHMGIR on 1 March stated that the Eikenberry Review had identified "significant shortcomings, particularly with the police".[325] Delays with deploying mentors ("1,500 international civilian police mentors have not deployed as planned") and problems with the Jordan training school (which was running at half capacity) were assessed to be due to US funding issues. The UK contribution was described as "disproportionate" and the brief recorded that:

> "MND(SE)'s approach to SSR is considered a model. The British Army is active in training ICDC battalions and the New Iraqi Army. We provide the largest contingent of police trainers in Jordan (72); the UK-run az-Zubayr police academy is now training 300 police every three weeks; and a group of PSNI [Police Service of Northern Ireland] superintendents are about to deploy to the South to mentor provincial police chiefs. We are also considering contracting around 40 police advisers as monitors, expanding the training programme at az-Zubayr, and offering police leadership training in the UK. The UK will also play a leading role in the formation of the new Iraqi MOD."

376. At the meeting Ministers "noted the Coalition's work in standing up Iraqi security forces and the UK's disproportionate contribution to it".[326]

377. Secretary Rumsfeld accepted Maj Gen Eikenberry's recommendation that the US military should manage the training of Iraq's army and police.[327]

378. On 8 March, DCC Brand's weekly report described the creation of a new "umbrella structure", the Office of Security Co-operation (OSC), commanded by Major General Paul Eaton, the former commander of CMATT.[328] CMATT and the newly named policing equivalent – the Coalition Police Assistance Training Team (CPATT) – would report to the OSC. A diagram of "Command and Control Relationships" showed the OSC reporting to CJTF-7.

379. The creation of OSC resulted in a complex structure for police reform: CPATT became responsible for recruiting, training, equipping and mentoring the police but the CPA/MOI retained the operational and institution-building element of police reform.

380. CMATT and CPATT were both led by UK officers: Brigadier Nigel Aylwin-Foster and Brigadier Andrew MacKay respectively.[329]

381. Former DCC Brand told the Inquiry that the creation of OSC was:

> "… quite a shock to both myself and the American director [Mr Casteel] because, overnight, the Secretary of Defense in the United States had basically taken away all responsibility for policing, including the training, equipping and recruiting, and given it to the military, and that included a budget that was US$950m. We had had no indication of this and neither he nor I actually knew where it left us. So we went to see Ambassador Bremer to say, 'Can you give us some direction as to what our responsibilities will be?' and I don't think he was too clear either on what the impact of this was. The military were very clear that it was just theirs and this would tidy things up … it was rather draconian in terms of its mood, and the consequences … one was that, whilst they could do the volume stuff, they still didn't have the skill sets for basic training, and then the one thing they didn't have, which was just so essential, and which the military training side had, is that policy advice back in Washington on policing. They had none. So they were making it up, in that sense, from theatre, rather than back at the policy headquarters."[330]

382. On 2 April, the Cabinet Office sent an update for Ministers, in between two meetings of the AHMGIR, stating that police training was to be accelerated under the new structures with a target of completing in-service training of 43,000 officers by January 2005.[331] There were plans to expand the capacity of the Baghdad and Mosul training academies. The update also highlighted a "critical shortfall" in equipment for the police, the border police and the army. That was put down to issues with US contracting and funding.

Security worsens and Iraqi Security Force weaknesses are exposed

383. On 25 March, the FCO's Weekly Update on Iraq for No.10 stated that a CENTCOM review had concluded that transition to local control across Iraq was "likely to be delayed by up to eight months from their original over optimistic target of May 2004".[332] That was due to delays in MOI programmes. The paper stated that that was "not a surprise":

> "The Iraqi Security Forces do not just have to be hired; they must be vetted, trained, equipped, mentored and certified ie capability, not numbers, is the key … Bremer has been pushing for quality for months, without the support in Washington, where the emphasis has been on numbers. On the positive side, a lesson has now been learned."

384. In March, Lt Gen Sanchez announced that once the ISF proved capable and credible enough to maintain local security, Coalition Forces would redeploy to bases outside major cities.[333] From there they would co-ordinate with the Iraqis and provide Quick Reaction Forces, but the ISF would have daily policing and patrolling duties.

385. Maj Gen Stewart in his evidence to the Inquiry reflected on the growing violence by February/March.[334] He said:

> "… because we had made Security Sector Reform our main effort … because it is our ticket out of there eventually – we have seen a fight against what we are starting to achieve in terms of Security Sector Reform.
> "So there are people who are clearly unhappy at the police becoming even relatively effective, because they never became anything close to being effective."

386. In April, the security situation declined dramatically, with uprisings in Fallujah and Najaf, described in Section 9.2. Maj Gen Stewart told the Inquiry how "it was like a switch had been flicked" on 6 April, when there were "35 shooting incidents and attacks in Basra before 7.30 in the morning".[335]

387. Maj Gen Stewart described another incident on 21 April in which five simultaneous car bombs were detonated in Basra and az-Zubayr, killing around 70 people and injuring around 250. He said this was "all aimed at the Iraqi police because our SSR was working".

[335] Public hearing, 9 December 2009, pages 67-68.

388. Maj Gen Stewart explained that 50 percent of his force was assisting with SSR during that time. He said that SSR continued in April (although it reduced to 25 percent of his force's time) but that "one or two of the major incidents we had was people … actually moving from location to location to try and help the SSR".

389. Hard Lessons summarised ISF performance during the violence of April 2004:

> "Many elements of the newly deployed Iraqi Security Forces proved unwilling or unable to fight. Some abandoned their posts and aided the insurgency. Others mutinied when they came under fire. Iraqi police units collapsed in Fallujah, Najaf, Karbala, and Kut, and the number of Iraqi police dropped by nearly 3,000 in one week in April 2004. The Iraq Civil Defense Corps fared worst of all. From April 2 to April 16, up to 12,000 ICDC members deserted; the rates reached up to 30 percent in northeastern Iraq, 49 percent in Baghdad, 30 percent in the South-Central region, and 82 percent in Western Iraq."[336]

390. A summary produced for No.10 by the Cabinet Office in late April stated that the Iraqi police were fully recruited against a target of 75,000 but that ICDC numbers, having risen to 35,000 in early April, had subsequently fallen to 25,000.[337]

391. On 13 April, Mr Richmond reported that:

> "The weaknesses in the new Iraqi Security Forces have been exposed by the events of the last week. Bremer and Sanchez are keen on the [Iraqi] Defence Minister's idea of establishing a 10,000 man task force which would draw on some of the 'non-tainted' elements of the former regime's special forces, the newly trained counter terrorism company and Iraqi Army and ICDC battalions. They also want to bring former military officers back into the security structures to create an Iraqi chain of command."[338]

392. Mr Blair met President Bush on 16 April.[339] At the meeting Mr Blair stated that he was concerned by progress on recruiting, equipping and training the ICDC and the police.

393. In April 2004, Dominic Asquith, FCO Director Iraq, reported that consideration was being given to re-engaging dismissed military officers.[340]

394. On 23 April, Ambassador Bremer made a speech in Baghdad addressed to the Iraqi people.[341] He said:

> "… many Iraqis have complained to me that de-Ba'athification policy has been applied unevenly and unjustly. I have looked into these complaints and they are legitimate. The de-Ba'athification policy was and is sound. It does not need to be changed. It is the right policy for Iraq. But it has been poorly implemented."

395. On 26 April, Mr Blair sent a Note to President Bush.[342] In it he suggested a number of ways of improving the situation in Iraq. The first suggestion was:

> "Do whatever it takes to get the Civil Defence and police in shape. The Coalition should hire who we need; pay what it takes; create an officer class that can lead and knows that it has a huge vested interest in success. Bremer's speech on de-Ba'athification etc was well received. But I'm not sure we really have our entire system focused on this; and it needs to be …"

396. Mr Blair also suggested a focus on courts. He wrote:

> "… very few cases can be tried at present; judges are subject to real intimidation. We need to ensure that trials of criminals and sentencing begins again. An independent judiciary will be a big step forward."

397. Those points were reiterated in a video conference on 27 April.[343]

398. In early May, following a request from Mr Blair to "look again at progress with Iraqiisation, particularly training and equipment, and how it might be accelerated", the Cabinet Office produced a paper entitled 'Enhancing Iraqi Security Forces'.[344] The Cabinet Office gave a detailed assessment of the current situation and highlighted the following elements as the main points:

- There were benefits in taking risks in handing over local control to Iraqi citizens.
- More ex-Ba'athist army officers might be required (beyond the 4,000-5,000 there were already plans to recruit).
- The Iraqi police were fully recruited, the focus now needed to shift to specialist and leadership training.
- "10,000 Iraqi police" were "duds" and needed to be pensioned out of the service.
- More police mentors were required; "we could consider lobbying internationally for more".

- The disbursement of new equipment should be accelerated.
- There was a need to "get a wholesale grip of prisons policy and prisons management".

399. The paper also stated that in the lead-up to the transfer of sovereignty, Coalition control over the shape and form of the ISF would reduce. On incorporating militias, the paper said: "This process needs to be taken forward carefully and systematically with a view to the long-term cohesiveness of Iraq's security forces rather than on an ad hoc basis."

400. Mr Blair raised Iraqiisation again in a video conference with President Bush on 11 May.[345] He questioned the current capability of the ISF, and concluded that a rolling programme for Iraqiisation concentrating not just on numbers but on how to train, equip and command the Iraqi police and ICDC, with the Iraqi Army behind them, was required.

401. In a Note to President Bush on 18 May, Mr Blair described work on developing the ISF as "urgent" and said that nothing should stand in its way.[346] He provided a paper from the MOD and highlighted the need:

- for more international police advisers, stating that the current number was only 50 percent of that required;
- for rapid recruitment of more army battalions;
- to "fix pay, equipment and IT problems of the police and civil defence"; and
- to bring in "proper officers" even if they had a Ba'athist connection.

402. From 20 to 23 May, a team led by Major General Nicholas Houghton, Assistant Chief of Defence Staff (Operations), and accompanied by CC Kernaghan, visited Iraq.[347] The visit followed a request from Mr Blair for a UK team to visit Iraq and provide a report on what further action was required to accelerate Iraqiisation.[348]

403. Maj Gen Houghton's subsequent report noted the lack of strategy, "bureaucratic complexity" hindering access to funds and resources, "initiative overload" and a short-term focus.[349] However, he assessed that those mistakes were known in Iraq and action had been taken to address them. He further stated:

> "The last thing the theatre needs at the moment is novel thinking imposed from outside. The concept of 'acceleration' is misplaced. 'Sustained Effort', with some change in emphasis, will produce the desired capability."

[349] Minute ACDS(Ops) to Rycroft, 25 May 2004, 'How Best to Progress the Iraqiisation of the Security Sector'.

404. Maj Gen Houghton also highlighted the need for "honest acceptance" of the likely timescales, stating:

> "The Iraqiisation of the Security Sector is not a deliverable on 01 July. It is a possibility that a largely Iraqiised Security Sector could deliver security for elections in Jan 05."

405. Maj Gen Houghton assessed:

> "The biggest single thing that will move the creation of capability forward is the increased use of military and police assets in mentoring roles. This should involve, for example, widening the concept of embedding troops within Iraqi Civil Defence Corps (ICDC) Units. Given available assets this will mean taking risk on maintaining security."

406. On developing a strategy, Maj Gen Houghton stated that it must be "authored, owned and executed" in Iraq, not in London. It should also deal with policy on militias and define an end-state as there was no agreement on the constitutional, legal and judicial framework within which the security sector should operate. He also highlighted the difficulties that the transfer of sovereignty and the associated drawdown of the CPA would have in terms of loss of control and discontinuity of personnel.

407. In a "follow-up piece" to the paper, Maj Gen Houghton provided more detail on how a strategy should be developed.[350] The strategy should include a "vision", such as: "A secure and stable Iraq maintained by credible, self-confident and capable security structures under Iraqi governance".

408. Derived from that vision should be an outline of the security sector architecture. Maj Gen Houghton highlighted some "key policy decisions" that would need to be made in each area:

> "(1) Iraqi Police Service (IPS). There needs to be agreement on the principle of Police Primacy (or not) in International Security (IS) issues. Will the Police Service be controlled nationally or regionally? … Will it have a special weapons and tactics capability; if so how much and under whose control? …
> "(2) Iraqi Civil Defence Corps (ICDC). Is the ICDC a temporary or a permanent creation? …
> "(3) Iraqi Army. What is the role of the Iraqi Army in IS? …"

---

[350] Minute ACDS(Ops) to Rycroft, June 2004, 'How Best to Progress the Iraqiisation of the Security Sector'.

409. A series of "transition plans" would be required "to get us from where we are now to where we want to be". Those would include:

> "(1) Capacity-building. Capacity-building plans for the elements of the Security Sector are well advanced but they need greater refinement to reflect the need for capability rather than just quantity …
> "(3) Militias. There are assessed to be 52 militias ranging in size from 12 to 31,000. They have represented useful short-term expedients, and some may need to feature as part of the longer term accepted Security Architecture. A policy for militias is starting to emerge.
> "(6) Information Operations/Strategic Communications … extant plans have: focused too much on 30 Jun as a watershed; … have dealt too much in promises and have not focused enough on achievements and tangible successes."

410. Maj Gen Houghton judged that: "The time has already passed when a strategy could have been imposed on the Iraqis and there is a danger that we may now be trying to develop one too late."

411. On the most effective method of training, Maj Gen Houghton advised that:

> "Evidence from within theatre indicates that the best way to grow genuine capability within the ISF is to embed coalition troops and International Police Advisors (IPA) inside Iraqi units."

412. Maj Gen Houghton provided some suggested points to stress in public statements, including:

> "(1) Significant progress already made in capability/capacity-building within ISF.
> "(2) ISF already achieving local control in some areas …
> "(3) Need to maintain a sensible balance of risk in progressing Iraqiisation with the operation realities of the security situation. The relevant timescale is spring 06 for us to assume strategic stand-off."

413. In an annex, Maj Gen Houghton described the status of SSR in Iraq as of 25 May:

- Over 80,000 police officers were operational with approximately 20,000 having received training. An accelerated training programme was now being put in place by CPATT.
- The DBE had been "successfully … reconstituted" (see Box, 'The Iraqi border police', later in this Section).

- On the FPS, the "manpower ceiling" of 73,992 had been achieved.
- The Ministry of Justice had come under full Iraqi control on 30 May. The Higher Judicial Council had been established in Baghdad and was processing up to 3,000 cases a week. The courts were functioning "reasonably well".
- The Iraqi Correctional Service employed 3,269 officers and was operating 18 prison facilities, with a capacity of 5,500.
- The ICDC had 32,484 personnel, against a target of 40,680. Specialist training had been hampered by a lack of equipment, such as communications equipment.
- The Iraqi Armed Forces had originally been established for external security only. Four battalions had been trained for the Army, with additional personnel in the Air Force and Coastal Defence Force.

414. On resourcing, Maj Gen Houghton commented:

> "The SSR process to date has been stifled by bureaucratic rules of the release of funds. If we are to be serious about sustaining the process of Iraqiisation of the Security Sector we need to take a pragmatic and flexible approach to the allocation of a combined UK source of some £37 million."

415. Mr Blair held a meeting on 3 June at which a paper from the MOD was discussed.[351] It is not clear from the record which MOD paper was considered. Mr Blair agreed that a UK team should deploy to Iraq to act "in effect as the embryonic secretariat of the MCNS [Ministerial Committee for National Security, described later in this Section] and draft the equivalent of a white paper[352] on defence and security".

416. Mr Blair asked to be informed of "any obstacles or log jams" which he might need to raise with President Bush and commissioned a round-up on Iraqiisation every two weeks. Increased mentoring was not mentioned in the record of the discussion.

417. Mr Blair also commissioned an update "illustrating what is actually happening in MND(SE) in terms of handing over responsibility for security to the Iraqis". The response from the MOD is discussed later in this Section.

418. Two weeks later Mr Blair again discussed Iraqiisation and again requested to be informed of any issues automatically rather than having to ask.[353]

[353] Letter Rycroft to Baker, 15 June 2004, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's meeting, 15 June'.

419. In five meetings and conversations with President Bush in May and June, Mr Blair raised Iraqiisation; emphasising the importance he attached to the approach and his hope that Lt Gen Petraeus, now Commanding General, Multi-National Force – Iraq (MNF-I subsumed OSC in June 2004), and Prime Minister Designate Ayad Allawi could agree a joint plan for publication.[354]

420. On 16 June, Sir Nigel Sheinwald sent Dr Rice a Note written by Mr Blair for President Bush.[355] Mr Blair envisaged that the timetable and strategy in relation to Iraq would include the Iraqi Interim Government publishing an "action plan on Iraqiisation of Iraq's security" in the week before handover and an international conference in early September. Mr Blair wrote that the problem on Iraqiisation was "obvious":

> "The numbers in the police are there. But not the quality or equipment, e.g. only 7,000 of the 80,000 police are Academy trained: 62,000 have no training; only nine percent have proper body armour; only 30 percent of the required vehicles are in place. Apparently the logjam on resources and equipment is now broken. But it will take time. And the Iraqi Army isn't really started yet.
> "All of this is now urgent."

421. According to Hard Lessons, at the end of June 2004 only half of Iraq's army and two-thirds of its police forces had received any training at all, and the quality of that training "varied wildly".[356]

Reintegrating militias

In May 2004, Mr Richmond reported that the CPA had begun to implement a "pragmatic" strategy to reintegrate the militias into Iraqi society.[357] The plan was to recruit militia personnel into the ISF, to retire them with a pension or to reintegrate them through a training and job placement scheme.

The largest militia groups were the two Kurdish Peshmerga (the Kurdistan Democratic Party had an estimated strength of 41,000 and the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan 31,000) and the Badr Corps (16,000). Other smaller militia, such as the Dawa, the Iraqi National Accord and the Iraqi National Congress, tended to consist largely of security personnel protecting their respective political leaders.

There were also "unofficial" militias which were meant to be dismantled. Jaysh al-Mahdi (JAM) was judged to be "the most dangerous" of those. Mr Richmond commented that dismantling militias was "Not an easy task as we have discovered". He concluded his report to London:

> "It is easy to be sceptical about how quickly and effectively the militias will be dismantled. There is an element of re-badging in the agreed approach but it is probably the only realistic way forward. A system which brings militia members within the ambit of the state, if only nominally, is better than leaving the problem unresolved. It is also an important confidence building measure. Ultimately, militias will only disappear when the economy is strong enough to offer people higher paid jobs elsewhere and the political system is sufficiently stable to remove their raison d'etre."

On 7 June, Ambassador Bremer signed CPA Order No.91, entitled "Regulation of Armed Forces and Militias within Iraq".[358] It prohibited the existence of armed forces and militias other than those created by the CPA. Existing militia could remain only if they had a "Transition and Reintegration" plan which included timescales for their disbandment and a full list of members. Article 27 of the Transitional Administrative Law (TAL) and subsequently Article 9 of the Iraqi Constitution prohibited armed forces or militias that were not part of the Iraqi Armed Forces.[359]

An update to No.10 from the MOD in August 2004 stated: "The success of this initiative will not only help generate stability in Iraq, but may serve as an example of de-militarisation in future conflicts."[360]

Restructuring in advance of transfer of sovereignty

422. CPA Order No.68, in early April 2004, established the Ministerial Committee for National Security (MCNS) and the position of National Security Adviser.[361]

423. The role of the MCNS was to facilitate and co-ordinate national security policy among the ministries and agencies of the Iraqi Government tasked with national security decisions. It was to be the primary forum for ministerial-level decision-making on national security issues and would comprise:

- Ambassador Bremer (Chair) until transfer of sovereignty, after which the Chair would be the Prime Minister;
- Minister of Defence;
- Minister of the Interior;
- Minister for Foreign Affairs;
- Minister of Justice;

- National Security Adviser (in an advisory capacity);
- Director of the Iraqi National Intelligence Service (in an advisory capacity);
- Senior Military Adviser (in an advisory capacity);
- MNF Commander or his representative (by invitation); and
- other appropriate individuals (by invitation).

424. The first meeting of the MCNS took place on 21 March under the chairmanship of Ambassador Bremer.[362] He later described the committee as "effectively an Iraqi version of our [the US] National Security Council".[363]

425. The MCNS met regularly from this point onwards and its meetings were often attended by the British Ambassador and the Senior British Military Representative in Iraq.

426. The role of National Security Adviser was to act as the primary adviser on national security matters and to manage the National Security Advisory Staff. Dr Mowaffak al-Rubaie was appointed to that role in April 2004 and served until April 2009.

427. A briefing from the MOD for No.10 in May described the following structures beneath the MCNS:

- A Commander's Council and a Contact Group.
- Provincial and local structures, such as provincial security committees to discuss "security issues in the broadest sense" (these became known as Provincial Joint Co-ordination Centres – PJCCs) and local co-ordination structures known as Joint Operating Centres.
- The Iraqi Army and the ICDC would be under the command and control of the IMOD through the Joint Headquarters. However, in the short term they would need to be under the operational command and control of the MNF.
- There was uncertainty around police command and control but it was thought that they would report through local police chiefs to the MOI. Ideally the police force should be the lead for all internal security but this might not be possible straight away.
- That transition to local control would occur at different speeds in different areas. The CJTF-7 target for local control across Iraq had slipped from June to December – "a target which not only will be met but which will be bettered by the four provinces of MND(SE)".[364]

428. On 22 April, CPA Order No.73 put the ICDC under the control of the IMOD.[365] The ICDC was renamed the Iraqi National Guard (ING) on 20 June 2004.

429. In response to the violence in Fallujah, Najaf and other locations in April, a number of different "elite" forces were created in an attempt to raise the capability of some of the ISF above that of the insurgents. Table 2 provides a summary of those.[366]

Table 2: Iraqi Security Institutions

Name	Department	Date created	Detail
Emergency Response Units	MOI	CPA era	A small, elite, national unit trained for high-risk search, arrest, hostage rescue, crisis response, and explosive ordnance disposal (EOD) missions.[367] By July 2004 only 40 officers were operational; the target was 750 officers by November 2005.
Iraqi Intervention Force	IMOD	June 2004	6,000 strong, announced by Prime Minister Allawi before he took office.[368]
Iraqi Special Operations Force: – Commando Battalion – Iraqi Counter-Terrorism Force	IMOD	July 2004	An elite force which operated outside the Iraqi Armed Forces chain of command. Trained by US Special Forces.
Civil Intervention Force – Special Police Commandos	MOI (all MOI forces here were collectively known as Special Police Forces)	September 2004	An elite paramilitary force for counter-insurgency support created by Mr Bayan Jabr, Minister of the Interior. The Commandos received no traditional police training.[369]
Civil Intervention Force – Mechanised Police	MOI	November 2004	Conducted vehicle-mounted operations to secure high-value routes, such as Route Irish (the route from the airport to the Green Zone in Baghdad).

Public Order Battalions	MOI	September 2004	A lighter force which conducted counter-insurgency operations but primarily performed a traditional police function in very hostile environments. The Public Order Battalions were recruited almost entirely from Shia neighbourhoods around Baghdad and locations in southern Iraq and were not under Multi-National Security Transition Command – Iraq (MNSTC-I) supervision. They were later regarded by Sunnis as evidence of Shia abuse of their power as head of the MOI.[370]

430. The creation of "elite" forces within the MOI led to two types of police – national (although not formally badged as the "National Police" until April 2006; see Box, 'The National Police', later in this Section) and local. The national-type police forces (elite forces) reported directly to the Minister of Interior, while the local forces reported through a Provincial Director of Police to a Deputy Minister in the MOI responsible for policing.

431. Coalition military structures were also re-organised in preparation for the transfer of sovereignty. Part of that re-organisation subsumed the Office of Security Co-operation (OSC) into the Multi-National Security Transition Command – Iraq (MNSTC-I).[371]

Multi-National Security Transition Command – Iraq

The Multi-National Security Transition Command – Iraq (MNSTC-I) came into existence on 6 June 2004 and was led by Lt Gen Petraeus.[372]

MNSTC-I was organised into three training teams:

- the Coalition Military Assistance Training Team (CMATT) – to organise, train and equip the Iraqi Army;
- the Joint Headquarters Advisory Support Team (JHQ-ST) – to assist the Iraqi Army command and control system; and
- the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team (CPATT) – to organise, train and equip the Iraqi Police.

The UK also provided a training team of approximately 10 personnel to MNSTC-I to carry out Basic Officer Training.[373] The UK training team became part of the NATO mission in 2005.

SSR in the South: after the invasion

Multi-National Division (South-East)

Multi-National Division (South-East) (MND(SE)) was established on 12 July.[374] That formalised the UK's responsibility for maintaining security in the provinces of Basra, Muthanna, Dhi Qar and Maysan, initially as an Occupying Power and, from June 2004, in support of the Iraqi Government. That area of Iraq is often referred to as 'the South'.

432. On 14 April, Mr Blair told the House of Commons that the South of Iraq was "largely under British control".[375] In Basra:

> "About 200 policemen have reported for work. Joint patrols started on 13 April. In surrounding towns, looting has either ceased or is declining, local patrols are being re-established and co-operation with city councils is going well."

433. In response to a question from Mr Iain Duncan Smith, the Leader of the Opposition, Mr Blair told Members of Parliament (MPs):

> "Of course the British forces will stay until there is proper security in the country, although obviously we hope to ensure that some of the policing is done by local people as soon as possible. That is why it is encouraging that joint patrols are already taking place. Although people may find this strange, much of the problem for Iraqi citizens came from the special security forces, not the ordinary civil police, if I may put it like that. Many of those people could perform an adequate and good task for the future of Iraq. Other countries are already offering help in relation to policing and security."[376]

434. Responding to a proposal by Mr Jeffrey M Donaldson that the UK should draw on the experience of retired Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC) officers to police Iraq, Mr Blair said:

> "We should look at using retired RUC officers. Indeed, the Defence Secretary tells me that representatives of our UK police have gone out to Iraq to see what assistance we can give."[377]

435. Pressed by Mr Nicholas Soames to "take seriously" Mr Donaldson's point, Mr Blair added that deploying former officers was "a priority for us, because the better we can maintain order, the better it is for the people of Iraq and the less is the pressure on our soldiers".[378]

436. From early April, policing functions in MND(SE) were undertaken by the military, under a Royal Military Police (RMP) lead.[379] Following his visit to Iraq in May, CC Kernaghan observed that "local volunteers had been recruited as auxiliaries and that they, together with elements of the Saddam Hussein era police, were being trained by the RMP in the basics of police work". Plans were in place to refurbish police stations, courts and prisons; to provide basic training to officers who had reported back or had been recruited since the invasion; to select and issue new uniforms; and to re-establish a viable local criminal justice system.

437. CC Kernaghan judged that "the British effort was focused on providing a visible police presence on the streets to reassure the wider population".

438. By early July, the military had appointed a Chief of Police and outlined plans to develop a training academy in az-Zubayr, near Basra.[380]

439. The Dutch Marechaussee (Royal Military Constabulary) and Italian Carabinieri (National Military Police) were also deployed in Muthanna and Dhi Qar provinces respectively. They undertook basic training and mentoring of Iraqi police in their areas. Maj Gen Stewart told the Inquiry that the Carabinieri were "just the right sort of troops to help train [the Iraqis]".[381]

440. A record of a meeting on 25 June between the FCO, ACPO and the Home Office stated:

> "The Prime Minister was authoritatively quoted as wishing to see the southern AO … develop as an exemplar for the whole of Iraq. The Iraq Policy Unit (IPU) made it clear that HMG [Her Majesty's Government] recognised the need to make progress in advance of any agreed CPA strategy [on SSR]. Specifically, in respect of the Iraqi Armed Forces and the police."[382]

The Basra River Service

By June, British commanders had instigated the creation of the "Basra River Service" to employ ex-naval personnel. Major General Adrian Bradshaw, Commander 7 Armoured Brigade in 2003, told the Inquiry:

> "In the weeks after our arrival, we became very aware that the ex-naval and military personnel in the province, of whom there were 10,000 or 12,000, had also not been paid for several months and were facing a desperate situation and … they came to us asking for us to do something about their people …

> "It was clear to me that what was at that stage developing into quite a sort of robust peaceful protest had the potential to go a lot further … So I proposed … that we should effectively demobilise these people with a demobilisation payment and then take them on … as 10,000 more on the 180,000 civil sector workers with a marker against their name to be part of the future security structure and almost immediately then we started employing them in a force that we created called the Basra River Service which was designed to promote security on the waterway, along which a vast amount of looted copper and brass ingots were being spirited away into a sort of open black market in the Gulf and tons of steel from cables and all manner of material."[383]

441. July saw a substantial reduction of military personnel within South-East Iraq, including a reduction in RMP platoons from eight to two (approximately 800 to 200 personnel).[384]

Problems deploying police officers

442. Following the agreement for the UK to provide a Chief Constable to be the senior policing adviser to the CPA within the MOI, officials in the FCO continued to recommend the deployment of around 20 MOD police officers.[385]

443. It appears that that deployment was first mentioned to CPA(South) on 7 June when an email was sent from the UND to a junior official who was seconded to CPA(South).[386] The official's response was that it would not be feasible for the MOD police officers to come under CPA(South) as they had no authority to manage the responsibility, and no ability to provide security.

444. The IPU was concerned that that might prove a stumbling block: they were keen to ensure that the MOD police officers had some responsibility to the CPA's policing team in Baghdad.[387]

445. As a result, they began to consider providing CPA(South) with "a secondee with specific responsibility for policing/SSR".[388] That idea was strongly welcomed by CPA(South).

446. In June, the FCO agreed to appoint ACC Douglas Brand from the South Yorkshire Constabulary to the post of Senior Police Adviser to the CPA in Baghdad (as described earlier in this Section), and ACC Stephen White from the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) to what became the post of Senior Police Adviser and Director of Law and Order for CPA(South).[389] Both individuals deployed as Acting Deputy Chief Constables.[390]

447. The Annotated Agenda for the AHMGIR stated that the UK was "pursuing plans to send MOD Police to begin basic training for police in Basra", adding "this … will subsequently be subsumed into an international policing team working in accordance with an agreed coalition policing strategy". It highlighted that the UK had offered two Assistant Chief Constables to help develop the policing strategy, one in Baghdad, the other in Basra.[391]

448. The AHMGIR met on 12 June and Ministers agreed that the MOD police contingent should deploy to Basra as soon as practicable.[392]

449. The UND asked the MOD's Iraq Secretariat to action this, stating that it would be for the RMP's Provost Marshal[393] to judge the capacity of the military to accommodate that contingent of police officers, who would be "reliant on military support for board, accommodation, transport and security".[394]

450. The FCO convened a meeting to discuss arrangements on 25 June. The only record of the meeting identified by the Government was taken by CC Kernaghan.[395] In the meeting it was agreed that, instead of deploying the full contingent of 21 MOD officers, DCC White would deploy with three or four MOD police/PSNI officers and conduct a training needs analysis.

451. CC Kernaghan stated that the only request for UK civilian police secondees that had been relayed to ACPO at that time was for the two ACCs (ACC White and ACC Brand). He highlighted the pressures on the domestic police service and the limitations on its ability to provide large numbers of armed officers, noting that "any request would require clear political approval and endorsement" before ACPO could consider it, but added that ACPO "would seek to respond positively to UK Government requests and had specialist capabilities, which might play a constructive role in police reform generally".

452. On 8 July, officials in the FCO advised Mr Straw that he should write to Mr Blunkett to seek nominations of up to 200 police officers for firearms training with a view to drawing on this pool for future deployments to Iraq when conditions were judged by DCCs White and Brand to be right.[396]

453. On 18 July, Mr Straw wrote to Mr Blunkett requesting the nomination of a pool of officers for firearms training in Iraq to meet the request from the CPA.[397] The letter made clear that a further assessment would be needed, prior to deployment, of the security situation in Iraq and the appropriateness of deploying UK police officers.

454. The original minute to the Foreign Secretary did not propose that he should write to Ministers in the Scottish Government or to the Northern Ireland Secretary, responsible respectively for police forces in Scotland and Northern Ireland.[398] ACPO Scotland was instead approached at official level.[399]

455. ACPO issued a letter to police forces in England and Wales on 31 July informing them of a trawl notice to be issued by the FCO seeking volunteers to form a pool of officers for potential deployment to Iraq.[400]

456. By September 2003, 260 police officers had applied to the pool.[401]

457. On 10 August, DCC Brand asked for the deployment of four police officers – ideally with a background in intelligence and operational planning – to staff a Joint Command Centre (JCC) in Baghdad designed to prevent friendly fire incidents.[402]

458. Former DCC Brand told the Inquiry how his request for support staff had eventually been met:

> "[Lt] General Viggers [the Senior British Military Representative – Iraq] … loaned me a captain … so that I had somebody who could answer my phone and make appointments whilst I was in other meetings. It wasn't until the end of September that I had an administrative assistant, and then, sometime in October, when the Ministry of Defence police contingent came out and I was able to take somebody as a sort of … staff officer.
> "It was … quite challenging to … operate at a two-star level, engage at the highest level diplomatically and militarily – when one is answering one's own phone and trying to do all of the administration that supports that type of activity."[403]

459. An IPU update for Mr Blair on 3 September stated:

> "In addition to the senior UK police officers already in Iraq, 15 UK trainers can be deployed within two weeks and another 60 by the end of October. Our target is 100 UK trainers deployed by end 2003 (of a planned CPA total of 600)."[404]

460. CC Kernaghan stated in an email to the Home Office that neither ACPO nor the Chief Constable of the MOD police had been approached to deploy the 15 "trainers" mentioned.[405] He also stated that the FCO had not – at that point – conducted the risk assessment it had promised nor agreed with ACPO that conditions were right to permit UK police officers to be deployed in Iraq.

461. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lieutenant General Sir Graeme Lamb, GOC MND(SE) from July 2003 to December 2003, described needing "about 90 policemen" in July, but six months later he had only two.[406] He stated that "… people talked a lot, they promised a great deal … in fact delivery was always the problem".

462. Lt Gen Lamb said that his "sense was there was no shortage of individuals who were prepared to volunteer" but Chief Constables were "reluctant" and "did not allow them to come forward" because they felt it would be a breach of their duty of care given the difficult security situation.

463. Sir Hilary Synnott agreed that he perceived a "tremendous reluctance" from ACPO to supply police officers.[407]

464. In late September 2003, both DCC Brand and DCC White expressed their frustration about the lack of additional UK police officers in Iraq.[408] On 21 September, in response to being informed that the FCO was considering asking the PSNI to provide the four staff he requested in August, DCC Brand wrote:

> "… I don't mind where they come from as long as they get here ASAP. The JCC [Joint Command Centre] is now being seen by the military as the only current solution to the problem of soldiers shooting Iraqi police officers because of a lack of awareness of deployments … They [the military] have everything in place … I made my original request … 6 weeks ago … If we are only just thinking about approaching PSNI it may be weeks or months before the officers are able to travel and we would lose all credibility with the American military … To remind you, this was our idea … I urge you to act swiftly and not delay any longer."[409]

465. The following day, DCC White wrote to a junior official in the FCO's Iraq Security Sector Unit, to summarise his understanding of the position in MND(SE) ahead of a briefing with Sir Jeremy Greenstock and Sir Hilary Synnott:

> "… I would like to be able to tell them that I have been updated by FCO in relation to: my resource bids other than training staff (I am assuming they are not being addressed); MDP [MOD police] deployments to Basra (I am assuming they are not being deployed); training staff requests for mid October (I am certain they are not being met); and training staff requests for Nov/Dec (it appears they are not likely to be met)."[410]

466. He summed up by saying:

> "Those of us on the ground are finding it difficult to fully understand what the main issues of the debate are regarding the deployment or otherwise of UK civpol."

467. Upon receiving those emails, CC Kernaghan wrote to the Home Office to clarify the ACPO position.[411] He made clear that there were "no outstanding requests with ACPO, nor have any been refused to date". He stated that current delays were due to a lack of firearms training and that deployment without such training would require a "clear statement from the Home Office that such a move was seen as desirable". He also said that he had "no doubt" that the FCO's International Policing Unit could expedite selection and training if directed. He concluded by saying:

> "In essence, the FCO, with the support of allied departments and agencies, needs to provide quicker and more authoritative feedback to DB & SW [DCCs Brand and White]."

468. On 4 October, Ms Clwyd asked Mr Straw in a House of Commons debate when he intended to "strengthen the number of British advisers and support staff". Mr Straw responded, saying that he intended to investigate the matter and that it was his understanding that "from this week, DCC White will be supported in his role by six Ministry of Defence police officers".[412]

469. Six MOD police officers were deployed to Baghdad in October.[413]

470. The potential availability of PSNI officers for deployment was discussed in a meeting between DCC White and Mr Bill Rammell, FCO Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, based upon informal discussions between DCC White and Mr Hugh Orde, Chief Constable of the PSNI.[414] The Iraq Security Sector Unit (ISSU) note stated that their decision not to approach the Northern Ireland Office had been based on a letter from 2002. The letter said that for domestic reasons the PSNI would no longer be in a position to contribute to overseas police missions.

471. On 6 November, Ms Jane Kennedy, Minister of State for Northern Ireland, wrote to Mr Straw stating that Mr Orde had agreed to identify at least six and up to 10 "PSNI officers of Inspector to Superintendent ranks with operational experience in working with the military willing to undertake a secondment to Basra".[415] Ms Kennedy stated that Mr Orde had also indicated that he would consider further deployments under the "auspices of ACPO".

472. In a visit report dated 18 November (described earlier in this Section), CC Kernaghan recommended an increase in UK police officers deployed to both Baghdad and Basra.[416] He highlighted that only 27 of the 43 police forces in England and Wales – and six of the eight in Scotland – had nominated officers to serve in Iraq. He welcomed the willingness of the Northern Ireland Office/PSNI to deploy police officers to Iraq but cautioned that the PSNI should not be seen as a separate entity. In particular he was concerned that they should not be expected to take greater risks than other UK police officers.

473. The development of police training across Iraq is discussed in Box, 'Police training academies', earlier in this Section.

474. Plans for the Jordan academy were discussed at the Iraq Senior Officials Group on 9 September.[417] The IPU briefing for the meeting stated that the 21 UK officers could be deployed by the end of December and that other troop-contributing nations should be encouraged to send trainers.[418]

475. The minutes of the meeting stated:

> "The Home Secretary and ACPO were content in principle with the deployment of UK police trainers … This could happen … before the end of October. However … [they] would need to see a plan for the school including a security assessment, and a more defined strategy for policing than existed at present."[419]

476. At that stage, deployment of UK police officers for the facility was being delayed by lack of firearms training or adequate security provisions for them to deploy without such training.[420]

477. The Iraq Senior Officials Group met on 23 September and stated that the FCO was sifting applications and hoped to supply 80 trainers for the Jordan school and 20 for training in az-Zubayr; no timelines for deployment were provided.[421]

478. At an Iraq Policing Meeting on 24 October, it was agreed that FCO officials should advise Mr Straw to ask Mr Blunkett to authorise the deployment of police to Iraq.[422]

479. By 18 November, CC Kernaghan noted that the deployment to Basra had still "not yet been formally requested" and was "subject to an appropriate security assessment".[423]

480. Mr Straw visited Iraq in late November and met DCC White. In his statement to the Inquiry, Former ACC White said:

> "I was shocked when he [Mr Straw] told me that he was being told that; there were no delays in getting police out to Basra (in fact none had arrived since my advance party came to the place in July, despite requests and reports); that there was no sleeping accommodation for UK police in CPA South (as there were many Portakabins available such as the one I lived in); and that the police academy was not ready (as it had been open and functioning since mid October and all I needed were some more police to help us open and use the many other empty classrooms). This final point was frustrating to hear, because to my memory only one person (a military officer attached to an FCO Iraq unit) had visited it and, in what was a classic 'Catch 22' situation, it appeared that (in UK) some were saying it was not open to justify not deploying trainers – yet the reason why it was not open was because no trainers were deployed to it."[424]

481. Following his visit, Mr Straw wrote to Mr John Sawers, Political Director in the FCO, the next day saying:

> "I would be grateful if you would personally grip this issue and ensure that the key action points arising from CC Kernaghan's report of his Iraq trip are dealt with as soon as possible. A combination of the Byzantine bureaucracy of ACPO and a lack of understanding in the FCO about police issues and practice … threaten further delays and a sub-optimal delivery in an area where the UK has a serious contribution to make."[425]

482. On the same day, Mr Straw told the AHMGIR that the "UK contribution to policing was inadequate" and that he would be writing to Mr Blunkett to encourage more police forces to release personnel.[426]

483. On 28 November, more than two months after applications were sifted, Mr Straw wrote to Mr Blunkett formally requesting the deployment of 24 officers to work at the az-Zubayr training academy, noting that ACPO was content with the risk assessment.[427]

484. Mr Blunkett agreed to that request on 3 December.[428]

485. In a letter to No.10 in mid-December, Mr Straw's Private Secretary reported that the 24 additional British officers would arrive at az-Zubayr that week.[429] He also reported that 36 officers had deployed to Jordan and a further 40 were on standby to join once capacity had been increased. In addition:

> "The UK's senior input to Iraq policing remains strong. DCC Douglas Brand, senior police adviser in the CPA is responsible for overall policing strategy and implementation, and will be in place for a further 6 months. In the South, ACC Stephen White will be replaced from end January. Both officers' teams are currently being strengthened."

486. The UK police trainers arrived and training began on 27 December.[430] The military also supplied two lieutenant colonels as members of the project team and 20 trainers (10 Royal Military Police (RMP) and 10 Carabinieri). Following discussions with the military and the senior adviser to MOI, Mr Casteel, it was agreed that the military and UK police officers would share responsibility for training at the az-Zubayr facility.

487. By March 2004 there were over 100 UK police officers working on SSR:

- two senior police advisers (DCC Brand in Baghdad and Acting ACC Philip Read in Basra);
- their support staff of 11, including staff manning the Baghdad joint civil-military co-ordination cell;
- 73 officers in Jordan (eight of whom were retired officers);
- 24 officers at the az-Zubayr facility;
- the commander of the Baghdad police academy; and
- five PSNI officers in the South.[431]

488. Acting Commander Kevin Hurley took over from Acting ACC Read in June 2004 as senior police adviser in Basra and served a seven-month tour.[432] He described the UK police contingent as "tiny" – about 20 constables and sergeants "conducting very rudimentary recruit training … in a derelict old barracks near az-Zubayr" and, based at Basra Palace, six officers (at Inspector to Chief Superintendent rank) whose role it was to mentor the police commanders in Maysan province, Nasiriyah and Basra. There were further police officers in Baghdad working on future planning for the police service in Iraq but "they had been all but marginalised by our US allies and were effectively ignored". He likened the arrangements for SSR in Iraq to "being in a rowing boat being towed behind a massive troop ship going somewhere, the trouble was we had most of the charts and plans in the police rowing boat".

THE DEPLOYMENT OF DCC WHITE

489. DCC White had deployed to Basra on 14 July 2003. He described the security situation upon arrival as:

> "… bad and … getting worse. There had been tragedies … there was no accurate data of how many people were being killed, but there were many people being killed. Old scores were being settled. Bodies were being found in the Shatt-Al-Arab River and in the parks and so on. So within the community, there was a lot of violence. In terms of the threat against the Coalition Forces, it was also rising … but, having come from working in Northern Ireland for 30 years, it was not, in my opinion, any worse."[433]

490. DCC White was accompanied by two MOD Police officers who would be his only UK police resources for most of the next five months.[434] He also worked with Danish police officers, initially a contingent of three which grew to a maximum of 15 by the end of 2003.[435] He told the Inquiry that:

> "… you had the ridiculous situation where, as a very senior chief police officer, I was flying on my own to the scene of murders … If you have only got one British police officer and two Ministry of Defence police officers, for five months, what does that say about the priority being given to the situation? Despite the fact – the rhetoric was: the South must not fail, the South must be a success."[436]

491. DCC White's lines of reporting were multiple – to Mr Kerik in Baghdad, to Sir Hilary Synnott in Basra and to a junior official in the FCO's UND.

492. Despite DCC White initially being offered an operational role, he was subsequently briefed in London that his role was to be "primarily as policing adviser" but eventually he might become police commander before handing over to the Iraqi police.[437] His first task was to conduct a training needs analysis for MND(SE).

493. DCC White's role changed again on arrival in Basra where he found himself expected to assume the role of CPA Director of Security (Law and Order), encompassing not just security and policing but all other aspects of criminal justice. That was a much broader role than anticipated. He had one lawyer to support the work on judicial reform.[438]

494. Describing how he was briefed by the military on their future plans, Former ACC White told the Inquiry:

> "[I] was impressed with the comprehensiveness of the plan but somewhat surprised that [I] had not been told of it back in the UK."[439]

495. Former ACC White told the Inquiry that he was viewed by the military in MND(SE) as "their relief – from all law and order reform duties – not just police reform. This expectation was … the cause of much tension throughout my tour of duty".

496. Former ACC White explained: "The army were trying to move away from policing duties. They wanted us [police secondees] to move in and we weren't there."[440]

497. Former ACC White described a confused strategic picture:

> "I was being told that a strategy was still being written and therefore not promulgated. However, I was also told there were advanced plans – e.g. for training in Hungary with agreed curricula. Later in Baghdad I saw a Bosnia police training curricula with the word Bosnia struck out and Iraq written on it. I was being told at one time the IPTF [International Police Training Force] for which I had been recruited as commander would be unlikely, yet the man in charge of MOI and policing in Iraq was telling me directly I would have 1,500 officers, with executive authority, to command in the South."[441]

498. In August, DCC White produced a 'Strategic Report on the Police Reform Programme in Southern Iraq' in which he assessed that 91 international police officers would be required to support the policing mission within MND(SE), of whom 70 would work with the Iraqi police and 21 would operate within the training school.[442] In addition to those, following the UK military decision to withdraw the four RMP personnel who had been working as part of DCC White's team and providing force protection for the UK police, he estimated that a team of 48 would be required to provide force protection.

499. Former ACC White told the Inquiry that that report and request caused some controversy when they were briefed to CPA and IPU staff in Baghdad, as they were considered to be inconsistent with the new 'MOI 60/90 day Strategic Plan' of which DCC White had had no sight.[443] The request for 91 police officers was subsequently withdrawn pending further direction from CPA Baghdad.

500. On 4 September, DCC White submitted a reduced bid for 43 UK police officers to support his work in MND(SE).

501. The Iraq Security Action Plan, produced by the IPU for the Iraq Senior Officials Group in September 2003, recorded that "in the absence of a central [policing] strategy, we are pursuing regional options".[444]

502. DCC White had submitted a proposal to re-establish the Regional Police Training Academy (RPTA) at az-Zubayr to the south of Basra, to be staffed by 21 international staff (see Box, 'Police training academies', earlier in this Section). Plans to train Iraqi officers in Hungary had fallen through, but three potential training sites had been identified in Jordan, with facilities for up to 3,000 recruits.

503. The IPU recommended that DCC Brand should clear the UK's concept for the RPTA with the CPA and MOI; that it should be funded; and that its timetable should be accelerated. Twenty-one UK officers were expected to be deployed to the Academy by the end of December. The IPU was confident that it could offer 100 officers to work in a training facility in a third country by the end of October, but needed to lobby the Jordanians for access to such facilities.

504. Ministers discussed policing at the AHMGIR on 18 September.[445] The Annotated Agenda for the meeting described plans to develop the RPTA, stating that "a separate deployment of 20 UK police trainers, who will require firearms training, will be required". That deployment would require the formal approval of ACPO and the Home Office.[446]

505. Ministers "endorsed the plans for police training outlined in the Annotated Agenda and agreed that they should be implemented as swiftly as possible with whatever UK help was necessary".[447]

506. In September, a cross-Whitehall project team was created to oversee the development of the Basra and Jordan training academies.[448] The Iraq Police Training Project Team was based in the FCO and was led by Mr Neil Crompton, Head of the IPU.

The team, which included seconded police officers as well as officials from the Home Office and MOD, was set up to co-ordinate the work of a virtual team of advisers from ACPO, the Home Office, the MOD police and Bramshill College of Policing. It reported to the Iraq Senior Officials Group.

507. A briefing by the Iraq Police Training Project Team on 18 September stated that the first course at az-Zubayr was due to begin on 15 October, with specialised training courses being carried out by Danish police officers.[449] At the same time, the facility was being expanded so that it could accommodate larger courses and begin three-week 'Transition Integration Programme' training. The expansion was due to be completed in December.

Training the ICDC in MND(SE)

In July 2003, military commanders from each of the areas in Iraq were instructed to stand up ICDC battalions. In response to that, in early September an MOD force level review concluded that a further two UK battalions should be sent to Iraq, one of which would begin training of the ICDC in MND(SE) alongside force protection and intelligence-gathering/surveillance duties.[450] The review did not make clear what proportion of the battalion (around 600 strong in total) would be involved in training the ICDC.

The UK ICDC training team arrived in theatre in late September with the aim of training 1,200 troops by mid-October, and 5,000 in total, for deployment in MND(SE).[451]

In the Security Action Plan written in September 2003, the IPU recorded that UK forces were training 160 members of the ICDC, and that would increase to 1,700 by early November.[452] ICDC battalions would be "fully operational" by the end of the year in all four provinces of MND(SE), carrying out basic guarding and infantry tasks.

The IPU identified four actions required:

- provision of additional UK Short Term Training Teams;
- allocation of a delegated budget to MND(SE) to support the training;
- provision of CJTF and CPA central support; and
- agreement that ICDC development costs should be underwritten nationally in order to avoid "procedural delays in CPA".

508. In October, Sir Hilary Synnott reported that CJTF-7 had issued an unexpected instruction entitled 'Acceleration of the Iraqi Police Services' which gave the military a greater role in accelerated police training programmes. That is described earlier in this Section.[453]

509. Sir Hilary wrote:

> "In the South, this has considerable implications for military resources to be devoted to police training; for our current plans, including the recently inaugurated Basra Regional Police Academy; and for the significant Danish effort at present and in future. We had no warning of this from CPA Baghdad (beyond a slight reference to such a possibility), no subsequent information from them and no consultation."

510. Sir Hilary explained that he had come up with an action plan to adapt the approach being taken in the South in such a way as to be consistent with the instruction, cautioning:

> "It will require an acceleration of the current building programme for the Police Academy and enhanced and extended engagement by the RMP. It will not negate the need for UK civil police involvement and, to enhance the civil nature of policing, it would be desirable to extend this further as soon as practicable. But the nature of the training programmes envisaged for the Academy will have to be adapted."

SSR progress by October 2003

511. At the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 1 October, Lt Gen Reith was asked to provide an out-of-committee brief on SSR, which he did the same day.[454]

512. Lt Gen Reith described the purpose of his paper as "to summarise SSR progress to date, against CPA/CJTF-7 targets for MND(SE), and estimate the potential development in ISF over time".[455] He informed readers that:

> "The CPA and CJTF-7 tightly control SSR policy, although currently medium to long term plans lack definition, an overarching SSR strategy, resources and funding."

513. Lt Gen Reith described eight separate Iraqi security organisations, including the NIA and the IPS. He summarised the situation in MND(SE) as:

- 8,367 police officers had been recruited, out of a total of 11,800 planned by December 2005.
- 400 members of the NIA had been recruited, out of a total of 7,855 planned by the end of 2005.
- 840 members of the ICDC had been recruited, out of a total of 6,720 planned by April 2004.
- 2,500 FPS (for critical infrastructure) had been recruited, out of a planned total of 4,200 by February 2004.
- All 4,000 planned members of local militia, to perform a "Neighbourhood Watch" role, had been recruited.

[455] Minute Reith, 1 October 2003, 'Iraqi Security Sector Reform – MND(SE)'.

- 282 Border Police and Customs officials had been recruited, out of a total of 1,500 planned by February 2004.
- 180 members of the Iraqi Riverine Patrol Service (IRPS), out of the 380 planned by February 2004, had been recruited.
- Recruitment for the 392-strong Iraqi Coastal Defence Force, which would be responsible for security in Iraqi territorial waters and anti-smuggling activity, would begin in two weeks.

514. Lt Gen Reith wrote that over the following 12 months only four elements of the ISF would relieve Coalition Forces of tasks: the IPS, ICDC, IRPS and FPS. It was "too early to judge the effectiveness or quality of these units, but the 'Iraqiisation factor' alone is expected to gain popular support". Although other elements of the ISF would help to improve the security situation, Lt Gen Reith felt there was "little likelihood that their partial or full operational capability will permit any meaningful reduction in troop numbers".

515. On 14 October, a documentary entitled 'Basra Beat' which followed DCC White's deployment in Iraq was broadcast by BBC Northern Ireland's Spotlight programme.[456] The programme exposed DCC White's concerns about the SSR programme in Iraq, and the UK's resourcing of it.

516. In his statement to the Inquiry, Former ACC White explained that, in particular, a remark he made about his frustration with the delays in deploying officers caused controversy back in the UK.[457] He told the Inquiry that as a result many "negative opinions were offered" about him and that he was left "feeling unsupported and isolated" but for the support of Sir Hilary Synnott and Ms Kennedy.

517. An update from Mr Straw's Private Secretary to Sir Nigel Sheinwald on 17 October did not refer to the issues raised by DCC White's documentary.[458] The Private Secretary reported that "good progress" was being made in developing the Iraqi police and that there was a "credible and deliverable strategy to train 30,000 Iraqi police over the next year".

518. Mr Straw's Private Secretary reported that efforts in Basra were focused on developing the Regional Police Training Academy (RPTA) and that an "initial retraining programme for serving Iraqi police officers began on 12 October under UK management". He reported that 24 UK police officers were about to start pre-deployment training and would deploy as soon as the RPTA facilities were ready to receive them. That would bring the total deployment of UK officers in Basra and Jordan to 100.

519. DCC White met Mr Rammell, Mr Adam Ingram, Minister for the Armed Forces, and Ms Kennedy on 3 November.[459] In the meeting, DCC White stated that his alleged criticisms of government strategy were taken out of context but he expressed concerns about lack of progress, the lack of UK police officers on the ground (due in part he felt to Chief Constables blocking deployment for security reasons), differences between the UK and the US approach and the absence of a delegated budget. Mr Rammell stated:

> "My view, having listened to him, is that he raises serious concerns which are at odds with our statements as to how the situation is improving."

520. The Home Office record of the Iraq Senior Officials Group of 4 November recorded that Mr Straw's initial reaction to DCC White's documentary was to call a "special meeting of Ministers to discuss what more could be done" but FCO officials had advised that that was not necessary.[460]

521. An update produced for Mr Straw by the Iraq Security Sector Unit (ISSU) on 5 November acknowledged that "there had been delays in late summer" but said that these had now been resolved.[461] On the specific issues about which DCC White had expressed concerned, the ISSU observed:

- risk assessments – "ACPO require very strict assurances";
- budget – that was "a matter for CPA South and Baghdad"; and
- the new accelerated programme for training – "this is far from ideal … the risks that flow from putting large numbers of insufficiently trained police on the streets are clear".

Security incidents involving UK SSR staff

UK personnel involved in SSR were the subject of a number of security incidents between May 2003 and June 2004:

- On 24 June 2003, six members of the RMP[462] who had been engaged in the training of local Iraqi police forces were killed at Majarr al Kabir, near Basra (see Sections 9.2 and 16.3).[463] An MOD Board of Inquiry later concluded that that had been "a surprise attack, which could not reasonably have been predicted".[464]

- On 23 August, three members of the RMP were killed[465] and another seriously injured in an attack in central Basra (see Section 9.2).[466] Up to five Iraqis were also understood to have been killed or seriously injured.
- On 19 November, DCC White's convoy was subject to an Improvised Explosive Device (IED) attack outside the Basra courthouse.[467] One of his protection officers was seriously injured.
- On 22 April 2004, the police training academy at az-Zubayr was attacked by suicide bombers.[468] Although no UK police were injured in the attack, it led to a review of security at the facility. A subsequent Cabinet Office paper described the site as "isolated and exposed" but said that a more permanent and secure site would take time to construct, and would cost between £5m and £10m, for which there was no provision.[469]

The facility at az-Zubayr remained and in June 2004 Mr Hoon stated:

> "The attack on the facility in April had strengthened the determination of the Iraqi recruits (and their instructors) to deliver an effective police force. An impressive set up."[470]

Prison reform

522. The FCO identified the development of the Iraqi prison service as a "Priority One" area for UK support to ORHA in April 2003.[471]

523. Mr Martin Narey, the Home Office Commissioner for Correctional Services, wrote to Sir Michael Jay, the Permanent Under Secretary to the FCO, on 24 April advising that he was seeking potential secondees from the Prison Service to support the UK effort.[472]

524. Prison reform was also included in the Annotated Agenda for the AHMGIR on 17 July.[473] The Agenda described the Government's "continued support to the Iraq prison reform programme" and stated that the IPU considered it "likely … that UK support [would] be requested specifically in training and general prison management".

525. The minutes of the Security Sector Reform Meeting[474] of 4 December recorded that "not much work had been done in this area" and that "there still did not appear to be a definitive US policy position".[475]

526. On 25 February 2004, minutes of the Security Sector Reform Meeting recorded that Mr Gareth Davies, Senior Prisons Adviser to CPA(South), was arranging training for Iraqi Correctional Service officers.[476] Canada had also "hinted" that it might support training. Two prisons in MND(SE) were being "refurbished/rebuilt".

527. Canada's offer to deliver training was confirmed at the Security Sector Reform Meeting on 5 April.[477]

528. For the same meeting, Mr Davies had prepared a paper (dated 29 March) on the progress of the Prisons Project in CPA(South). He noted that:

- The "clear separation of function" between the police, courts and prisons had been "more difficult practically than envisaged" but was now "largely complete".
- Of the five facilities within the UK's AOR, one was functioning (al-Maqil) and the other four (al-Minah, Basra Central, al-Amarah and Nasiriyah) were under development or construction.
- The recruitment and training of managers and staff for the increase in establishments should not be difficult, but funding "Pay Running Costs" remained a problem.
- On safeguards for the treatment of prisoners there was "little or no National Correctional Policy emanating from Baghdad", resulting in "serious" policy gaps, such as disciplinary codes for both prisoners and staff.

529. Mr Davies described al-Maqil as being "in a very poor state of repair" and "close to collapse". Problems with sewage had been exacerbated by severe overcrowding: in January the prison's population reached 478 against a capacity of 230. Part of the reason for that rise had been a "weakness in the due process" where prisoners were kept on remand without judicial review. A system of referral to judges had helped alleviate the problem.

530. Mr Davies submitted a report in April 2004 with recommendations for staffing levels after 30 June.[478] A joint bid from the FCO and DFID to the Global Conflict Prevention Pool (GCPP) fund for nine prison officers to be both monitors and advisers was planned. The Government has been unable to supply a copy of Mr Davies' report.

[474] The Security Sector Reform Meeting was a regular meeting of policy officers that discussed a range of SSR matters, including police training, military reform, prisons and the judiciary. It was chaired by the FCO and attended by the MOD, DFID, the Home Office and (occasionally) HM Customs and Excise.

[478] Minutes, 22 April 2004, Security Sector Reform meeting.

531. A funding bid for £5.53m for a project to support the prison service in Southern Iraq from summer 2004 onwards stated that prisons strategy in MND(SE) was overseen by the Director of Law and Order, who had been seconded from the UK Prison Service.[479] He was supported by a Senior Prisons Adviser and an administrator. Prison monitoring was undertaken by three members of the Military Prison Service plus two members of the Territorial Army who were UK prison officers in their civilian careers. The bid sought to increase staffing numbers to 15. All other staff working in the Correctional Service were Iraqi locals.

532. The bid stated that there were approximately 800 prisoners in MND(SE). Three new prisons were in development, with a total capacity of 1,650 places. All prisons within the CPA(South) boundary run by the Iraqi Prison Service were overseen and maintained by the UK.

533. A letter dated 2 July confirmed that £1.7m had been agreed for that project by the Iraqi GCPP Strategy Committee.[480]

The position in the South leading up to the transfer of sovereignty

534. A record of the Iraq Senior Officials Group on 12 December 2003 stated that the MOD intended to deploy an additional infantry battalion to assist ICDC training and more RMP to assist police training and mentoring.[481] The record stated: "The importance of close co-ordination between departments on police initiatives was stressed".

535. On 19 December, Mr Lee wrote to Mr Bowen, stating there had been "some surprise" expressed at the forthcoming deployment of additional RMP to MND(SE) and "concern about MOD's alleged lack of consultation over this deployment".[482]

536. Mr Lee wrote:

> "For months now the MOD has been assured by the FCO, and MND(SE) has been assured by the CPA, that civil police were in the pipeline to provide training and mentoring … All accepted the crucial importance of standing up the IPS as rapidly as possible and thus the importance of providing proper civil police trainers to train civil police. HMG [Her Majesty's Government] and the CPA have not … delivered … we have repeatedly stressed that we see police training as important and that it is best delivered by civil police."

[482] Letter Lee to Bowen, 19 December 2003, 'Iraq: Police Support for MND(SE)'.

537. In his response, Mr Bowen welcomed the deployment but said:

> "… I find it odd that when we have discussed police training and the like at meetings of officials and had been reassured that all is on track, this has not been challenged at the time. It is not just the MOD who see the importance of police training, so do we all. We must ensure that the information flow between departments is such that messages we need to send to Washington or the CPA (or each other) are registered before we reach crisis point … there is a clear role for senior officials to intervene if programmes are going off the rails."[483]

538. A further MOD force level review at the end of January 2004 considered SSR to be "on track in MND(SE)", although it did register problems with resourcing police training and mentoring.[484] It concluded that "given the right conditions" there would be no need to replace the SSR battalion who were conducting ICDC training in July 2004 and added that "assuming the security situation continues to stabilise" further reductions in force levels might be possible by November 2004. Those recommendations were based on assumptions that "consent of the population" would be "maintained" and that SSR would continue "to deliver evermore capable and credible ISF".

539. In early 2004, the focus in policing shifted from training to providing officers to act as monitors/mentors, terms that appear to have been used interchangeably at the time. Given the deteriorating security situation and the need for mentors to be out on the ground, deploying police officers was problematic.[485] As a consequence, that role had been undertaken by the RMP.

540. Following a request from PJHQ to relieve the RMP, the FCO began considering contracting around 40 UK retired officers.[486] At the same time the US was developing plans to recruit around 500 police advisers from Dyncorps to act as monitors/mentors, with 50 being earmarked for the South. The UK's seemingly unilateral approach was met with some consternation by Mr Casteel, who reportedly said: "This isn't two countries, you know."

541. Sir Nigel Sheinwald chaired a meeting of the Iraq Strategy Group on 13 February.[487] Mr Dodd's record of the meeting stated that the recent attacks in Erbil showed that "terrorists felt threatened" by SSR. The US was focused on building the ISF's capacity, "with [General] Abizaid stressing quality over quantity". While the US planned to hand over security responsibility to Iraqi forces at a local level in July, US Commanders "were not entirely confident they would have sufficient Iraqi forces … but five months remained" to meet that deadline.

542. On 8 March, Mr Straw gave permission for ISSU to proceed with contracting 40 police monitors/mentors.[488] Those officers would work directly to Coalition Forces but would co-ordinate closely with CPA(South).[489] It was estimated that the cost for six months would be around £3-4m. In a minute from ISSU to Mr Straw, the reason given for the unilateral approach was that the numbers of international police advisers had been "slow to build". There was no mention of the US Dyncorps contract.

543. DCC Brand had recommended that some of those officers should be offered to the CPA as part of a Coalition-wide effort. However, the assessment from ISSU was that, in the present security environment, it would be too great a risk to deploy FCO-contracted British personnel to police station monitoring outside the UK AOR.

544. The minutes of the working level 'Security Sector Reform Group' of 22 April mentioned US plans to deploy Dyncorps contractors to MND(SE) but stated that "it is still unclear as to the exact deployment dates and numbers".[490] They also referred to finalising the role for the UK contractors and efforts to ensure they "complement, not compete" with the Dyncorps contractors.

545. ACC Read told the Inquiry that "it was made quite clear" that the Dyncorps contractors would not answer to him and that "co-ordinating these resources and agreeing a common approach to police reform including the style of policing we wanted to introduce was going to be an issue".[491]

546. The separate UK contract for 40 police monitors/mentors was let to ArmorGroup[492] for £5m for six months, with the intention of deploying them in early June.[493] However, in light of a further decline in security and the assessment that the type of monitoring they would do would be "of little value until the Iraqi police [in MND(SE)] have undergone more specialist skills training", the deployment was put on hold by the FCO until September 2004.

547. On 26 April, Mr Rycroft wrote to Mr Straw's Private Secretary, copying his letter to DFID, the MOD, the Cabinet Office and UK officials in Iraq and the US (see Section 6.2).[494] He reported that Mr Blair thought improvements to existing activities must be made, including on:

> "(a) Iraqiisation. We must do whatever it takes to get the ICDC and Iraqi police in shape …"

548. On 30 April, the Cabinet Office assessed that in MND(SE) most ICDC battalions and the police should be able to operate without a full-time MNF presence by 30 June, although it conceded that the ISF in MND(SE) had not faced the level of challenge that many others faced in the April violence.[495]

549. Similarly, the MOD assessed that following the transfer, "by 1 July, the ISF will have the lead for security and the MNF will be operating in support of them".[496] The MOD assessed the position in Muthanna, Dhi Qar and Basra provinces positively: in some areas the ISF would "operate without any assistance at all except a standby Quick Reaction Force". The MOD plan was to minimise its "overt presence" by, for example, relocating from Basra Palace (inside the city) to Basra Airport (outside the city). In Maysan province, the security situation was considered to be more challenging (as described later in this Section).

SSR across Iraq: summer 2004 to summer 2006

550. On 28 June 2004, the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) formally handed over to a sovereign Iraqi Government, the Iraqi Interim Government (IIG), and Dr Allawi became the Iraqi Prime Minister. The process of establishing the IIG is described in Section 9.2.

551. On 20 June, Prime Minister Designate Allawi set out his military capacity-building strategy in a televised press statement.[497]

552. Dr Allawi's strategy included a 6,000-strong intervention force with both police and army components, the creation of a Special Forces Organisation and continued ING and army training.[498]

553. Mr Falah Haasan al-Naqib was appointed as the Minister of Interior and Mr Hazem Shalan al-Khuzaei was appointed as the Minister for Defence.[499] Dr Rubaie continued to serve as the National Security Adviser. Mr Barham Saleh became Deputy Prime Minister for National Security.

554. During the CPA era, the metric used to measure progress with the ISF was the number of personnel on duty.[500] Immediately after the transition, that metric was replaced by "trained and equipped" personnel. The net result was a 75 percent drop in recorded MOI force totals, from 181,297 "on duty" personnel on 15 June 2004, to 47,255 "trained and equipped" personnel on 25 August 2004.

555. When the IIG was constituted, the UK and the US ceased to be Occupying Powers and instead were operating under resolution 1546 (2004) and the annexed letters from Dr Allawi and Mr Powell (see Section 9.2).[501] The points of relevance for SSR were that the Security Council:

- welcomed ongoing efforts by the incoming IIG to develop the ISF, operating under the authority of the IIG and its successors, "which will progressively play a greater role and ultimately assume full responsibility for the maintenance of security and stability in Iraq";
- recognised that the MNF would assist in building the capability of the ISF, through a programme of recruitment, training, equipping, mentoring and monitoring;
- emphasised the importance of developing effective Iraqi police and border enforcement, under the control of the MOI, and the FPS, under the MOI and other ministries, for the maintenance of law, order and security; it requested Member States and international organisations to assist the IIG in building the capability of those institutions;
- attributed a number of roles to the Special Representative to the Secretary General and the UN Assistance Mission for Iraq including promoting the protection of human rights, reconciliation and judicial and legal reform;
- welcomed the fact that arrangements were being put in place to establish a security partnership between the IIG and MNF;
- noted that appropriate Iraqi Ministers were responsible for the ISF, that the IIG had authority to commit the ISF to the MNF to engage in operations, and that the security structures planned would serve as fora for the IIG and the MNF to reach agreement on security and policy issues, and ensure full partnership between Iraqi security forces and the MNF, through close co-ordination and consultation; and
- called on Member States and international organisations to respond to Iraqi requests to assist Iraqi efforts to integrate Iraqi veterans and former militia members into Iraqi society.

556. Dr Allawi's letter annexed to the resolution asked for the support of the Security Council and the international community in providing security and stability until Iraq was able to provide security for itself.

557. Resolution 1546 (2004) expired in November 2005. It was replaced by resolution 1637 (2005),[502] and subsequently resolutions 1723 (2006)[503] and 1790 (2007).[504] Those resolutions extended the authorisation for the MNF in Iraq until the end of 2008.

UK, US and Iraqi plans for SSR

558. On 15 July 2004, the Defence and Overseas Policy Committee (DOP) considered a paper by Mr Straw entitled 'Iraq: the Next Six Months'.[505] The paper outlined the desired position for Iraq by January 2005. For the ISF, the objective was:

> "Significantly increased Iraqi security capacity and capability with Iraqi forces in local control around much of the country and a reduced reliance on MNF-I, paving the way for foreign troop reductions in 2005."

559. The priority was identified as continued support to Iraqiisation through training, equipping and mentoring of ISF, with a focus on command and civilian oversight (particularly of the army and the Iraqi National Intelligence Service).

560. The priorities identified in Mr Straw's paper were agreed by DOP.[506]

561. On 21 July, the Annotated Agenda for the AHMGIR reported that recruitment to the ISF was "buoyant" and equipment was being delivered.[507] The ISF were:

> "… increasingly taking the lead in patrolling and on specific operations. Their credibility with the Iraqi people seems to be increasing … and local control has been achieved in some areas, particularly MND(SE)."

562. The Annotated Agenda noted that "despite the growth of capacity, significant capability gaps remain" and both the Joint Headquarters and proposed National Joint Operations Centre would "require further advice, supervision and equipment before Iraqi command is satisfactory". ISF units would "require careful command and control training and mentoring once formed".

563. An annex to the Annotated Agenda stated that overall numbers were already close to target (a total of 233,000 ISF personnel against a planned total of "around 260,000" by January 2005). It stated that the IPS had "already hit its full manning levels", would "be 100 percent equipped by end 04", and with the completion of current training programmes be "fully operational" by June 2005.

564. The IPS was also focused on the need "to slim" the police force "by up to 30,000 men". The annex stated that "just fewer than 3,000" Iraqi Army personnel had been trained and the rate of recruitment and training was "set to go up to end 2004".

565. Lt Gen Petraeus carried out a "Troops To Task" assessment in July and August 2004 with General George Casey, who replaced Lt Gen Sanchez as Commander of the Coalition's military command in June 2004.[508] That was to identify what the size and shape of Iraq's security forces should be. They concluded that Iraqi forces were "not prepared" to combat the violent insurgency and that more forces, both police and military, were urgently required. Their recommendations for increases in the number of police, border patrol officers and Iraqi National Guard (ING) (shown below) brought the proposed total number of ISF to around 271,000, all of whom would receive counter-insurgency training. It would later become known as the "Petraeus Plan".

566. Mr Mike Naworynsky, Mr Hoon's Private Secretary, summarised the plan produced by Lt Gen Petraeus in a minute to Mr Antony Phillipson, Private Secretary to Mr Blair, on 20 August.[510] Mr Naworynsky reported that it would take until mid-2006 to achieve the proposed staffing levels for the ISF and that further (financial) resources would be needed. The development of the Iraqi police was identified as the "main effort".

567. Mr Naworynsky wrote:

> "The report shows that US thinking in this area remains very similar to our own with the key theme of Iraqiisation running through the brief. Timelines given within the briefing are broadly as we would expect across Iraq, and should be bettered in the MND(SE) area."

568. Mr Edward Chaplin, British Ambassador to Iraq from July 2004 to June 2005, reported that a draft National Security Strategy for Iraq was discussed on 24 July by deputies to members of MCNS.[511] The Strategy was described as "a wide-ranging document, which aims to underpin for the next one to five years the development of Iraq's security structures and policy, diplomatic and international relations, economic policy and investments in infrastructure". It had been drafted by an Iraqi and MNF working group that included UK advisers. Section 9.3 details the political elements of the Strategy.

569. The Strategy was approved with minor amendments. It was agreed that it should proceed to a Ministerial discussion on 29 July and to Prime Minister Allawi on 5 August. The intention was that "the Strategy should be published shortly afterwards" but the timetable might slip given Dr Allawi's overseas commitments.

570. Mr Chaplin wrote that "detailed work" on the chapter regarding national security institutions was ongoing and, in particular, a "troops to task study" led by MNF had "concluded that a significant increase in the planned number of conventional police, Border Police and National Guard is required". He confirmed that Prime Minister Allawi, Defence Minister Hazem Shalan al-Khuzaei and Interior Minister Falah Haasan al-Naqib had been told about that but he did not know their reaction. Mr Chaplin understood that the revised ISF structure, including the additional numbers of troops and police recommended, would create a US$2.8bn shortfall and that Lt Gen Petraeus had approached Ambassador John Negroponte (who had replaced Ambassador Bremer as US Ambassador to Iraq) on 25 July to ask that these funds were found.

US and Iraqi SSR funding

The US funded SSR tasks through two funding streams:

- The Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund (IRRF) was the largest source of US reconstruction funding, comprising US$20.86bn made available through two appropriations, IRRF1 and IRRF2.[512] US$4.94bn of IRRF2 funds were allocated to security and law enforcement. In addition to that, US$2.31 billion was allocated to "justice, public safety infrastructure, and civil society".
- The Iraq Security Forces Fund (ISFF) was created in May 2005 and ran until June 2009.[513] It made available US$18.04bn to "train, equip, and maintain all elements of the Iraqi Security Forces, including the Iraqi Army, Navy, Air Force, Special Operations Forces; Iraqi police forces; special task forces; the Iraqi Intelligence Agency; and border security forces." That fund was administered by the DoD through MNSTC-I.[514] ISFF funding is shown in Table 4.[515]

The Iraqi Government funded SSR predominantly through budgetary allocations to the Ministries of Defence and Interior.[516] The annual allocations and spends between 2005 and 2009 are shown in Table 5.

In addition, the Iraqi Government between 2006 and 2009 set aside US$5.5bn to purchase equipment, training and services through the US' Foreign Military Sales[517] programme.

[516] Report to Congress US Government Accountability Office, September 2010, 'Iraqi-US Cost-Sharing'.
[517] The US Foreign Military Sales programme involved the Iraqi Government identifying what needed to be procured, and transferring appropriate funds to the Federal Reserve Bank. The US would then oversee the spending.

571. On 29 July, Mr Chaplin wrote to the FCO in London advising that the UK should resist making substantive changes to the draft Strategy which risked delaying publication and "unravelling what we have achieved so far".[518] He explained that the Strategy had been through "a laborious drafting process" for the past seven weeks and the "latest version represents a fine balance between the IIG and US/UK representatives".

572. Mr Chaplin explained that some "confusion has crept into the Whitehall debate about different elements of the overall strategy required to deal with the insurgency". Seeking to clarify matters, he wrote that the Strategy was "a conceptual document describing the Government's overall approach". The operational work "falling out" of it included:

- the MNF-I strategic campaign plan to develop a self-reliant ISF by January 2006;
- an operational plan to man, train, equip and assist the ISF, currently being "masterminded by Gen Petraeus";
- a baseline "troops to task" reassessment; and
- work on the new intelligence architecture.

573. By early August, Mr Blair was concerned that neither an Iraqi security strategy nor an MNF internal review of Iraqiisation had yet appeared.[519] The security strategy was particularly important for demonstrating publicly that the IIG had a plan to deal with the security situation. The FCO was instructed to press Prime Minister Allawi on the importance of issuing a public statement soon.

574. Mr Dominic Asquith, a Deputy Commissioner in the CPA, reported on 9 August that Dr Allawi understood the need to explain the IIG strategy on security, "but does not think the National Security Strategy document fits the bill".[520] Dr Allawi had, however, agreed the need to sort out the details quickly with the MNF.

575. On 14 August, Mr Asquith reported that the launch of the National Security Strategy had been the subject of a "confused discussion" at the MCNS on 12 August.[521] Dr Allawi had said that the Strategy would need to be revised but it was unclear how that would be done.

576. By the time Mr Blair visited Iraq and met Dr Allawi in Baghdad on 21 December, a new plan had been drafted.[522] They discussed Iraqiisation. Mr Blair stated that he had seen a draft of Dr Allawi's new security plan which he thought was "along the right lines" and that he had agreed to review the Iraqiisation strategy with President Bush in January.

577. Dr Allawi suggested that the Petraeus Plan could be accelerated by more training for the ISF command structure and more recruitment of untainted figures from the old army.

578. On 23 December, No. 10 reported that Mr Blair was "encouraged that Allawi is now working on a security strategy which he intends to publish".[523]

579. On 3 January 2005, Prime Minister Allawi wrote to Mr Blair, enclosing an updated draft of the security plan.[524] He had also sent the paper to President Bush that day and shared the covering letter with Mr Blair. The letter to President Bush highlighted the mounting security challenges facing Iraq, the lack of resources and the importance of accelerating the recruitment, training and deployment of Iraqi forces.

580. The paper was six pages long and briefly outlined the problems with the ISF and potential solutions. The solutions included: merging the ING with the Iraqi Army to fill gaps caused by current depletions; a rapid extension of forces; additional training; and giving the army responsibility for border security. It stated that a request would be made to the IMF and World Bank to cover a "$1.9bn (or officially $2.25bn)" shortfall in year one.

581. On 6 January, Mr Martin Howard, MOD Director General Operational Policy, sent a draft note about the Strategy to Ms Margaret Aldred, Deputy Head OD Sec, Cabinet Office.[525] Mr Howard wrote that the letter was to go to Mr Nick Beadle, Coalition Senior Adviser to the IMOD, and Mr Charles Heatly, Adviser to Prime Minister Allawi in Baghdad and reflected what he and Ms Aldred had agreed the previous day. The note was broadly supportive of the Strategy but observed that the US could be sensitive to some of the content, including references to the slow pace of army training ("as a criticism of the Petraeus Plan") and to recruiting members of the former Iraqi armed forces.

582. The draft note stated that reference to "coalition embedded troops" should be removed from the Strategy document because it had not yet been endorsed in London and said "it would be better from Allawi's perspective to minimise any impression that the Iraqi security forces will remain over-dependent on the coalition".

583. The National Security Strategy was eventually issued on 15 January 2005.[526] In it, Dr Allawi was reported to have amended the goal of training 100,000 Iraqi soldiers by July to 150,000 "fully qualified" soldiers by the end of the year.

Training the Iraqi Army

Training of individual army recruits followed one of two patterns:

- Recruits with former military experience went into a Direct Recruit Replacement programme. They received three weeks' standardised training delivered by the Major Subordinate Commands at Regional Training Centres.
- Recruits without military experience were sent for training at the Iraqi Training Brigade in Kirkush. All new recruits undertook a five-week programme followed by an additional three to seven weeks of specialist skills training.[527] The five-week programme was increased to 13 weeks in early 2007.[528]

In 2006, a system of six Regional Training Centres was established to develop a non-commissioned officer corps and a year-long Basic Officers Commissioning Course, based on a Sandhurst curriculum, was established at three Military Academies.[529]

By early 2007, a National Defence University had been established and was beginning to run institutions of professional development: Iraqi Staff Colleges, a National Defence College and a Strategic Studies Institute.[530]

In May 2007, the Iraqi Training and Doctrine Command, part of the Joint Headquarters assumed responsibility from MNSTC-I for training and equipping the Iraqi military.[531]

UK assessments of the Iraqi Security Forces in late 2004

584. On 23 September, Lieutenant General John McColl, SBMR-I, sent Lt Gen Fry, Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Commitments) from July 2003 to March 2006, a paper on the UK's options for withdrawing or reducing the number of troops in Iraq "up to and beyond January 2006" (see Section 9.3).[532] He stated that the IPS would have manned, trained and equipped "77 percent" of the target 135,000 officers by the end of July 2005 and the ING numbers were also "on course" to be achieved by that date. Lt Gen McColl wrote that "these encouraging projections have, in part, prompted MNF-I's aspiration to establish Iraqi regional … control across all 18 provinces by 31 July 2005".

585. Lt Gen McColl considered the goal "challenging" because of "significant shortfalls in logistics capability" of the ISF. He highlighted a lack of trained staff, a "serious rift" between the MOI and IMOD and "the need for a proper national security headquarters".

586. On 20 October, Lt Gen McColl sent the Hauldown Report of his tour in Iraq.[533] He wrote:

> "Despite their limited numbers and state of training, ISF are even now capable of strategically significant impact. Their deployment has an effect that coalition troops cannot achieve … They are therefore in great demand and, there is a risk … that their premature committal to operations, which are still beyond their capacity, could irreparably dent their confidence. The risk is exacerbated by the understandable impatience of the IIG, supported to some extent in both Washington and London …
> "The critical path for the IPS will be meeting the sheer scale of the equipping and training requirement, as well as the continued identification of tough committed police chiefs. There are grounds for optimism, but no police force could operate in the current levels of violence without relying on the support of the Army, including the ING, to provide a secure framework and surge capability …
> "The frustration that the UK has felt at the slow and chequered progress of ISF generation has been understandable. Our contribution outside MND(SE) has, however been limited (aside from helpful training team activity) to advice to US colleagues who are themselves frustrated and doing all they can to translate the $5 billion they are investing into security capability, whilst reconciling the somewhat turbulent aspirations of the IIG. Within MND(SE) the flow of equipment to ING and IPS from US suppliers has been painfully slow, a problem compounded by the prioritisation of issue based on the prevailing security situation across the country. There has recently been an initiative, which has yet to deliver effect that would allow UK resources to support the equipping of the ISF within the UK area; this is to be welcomed and is perhaps overdue."

587. On putting the right structures in place, Lt Gen McColl referenced the need to put particular emphasis on developing the MOI "staff planning capability", which remained "the most serious concern".

588. On 27 October, a Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) Assessment reported that the capability of the ISF was "growing" but that their effectiveness remained "patchy".[534] It stated:

> "The more reliable and better trained elements are in short supply and limit the current ability of the IIG to conduct more than one or two concurrent operations. The ISF will improve slowly up to the elections and their capability is planned to build significantly in the early part of 2005. But we judge that they will not be able to handle significant security responsibilities unaided until the middle of 2005 at the earliest. The nascent Iraqi intelligence service (INIS) is also under severe pressure and continues to suffer from assassinations and penetration."

[534] JIC Assessment, 27 October 2004, 'Iraq: A Long-Term Insurgency Problem'.

589. A JIC Assessment on 11 November reported that the ISF had been attacked by insurgent groups "since their creation" and cited "one of the most serious" attacks on 23 October where a convoy of ING forces was ambushed and 49 unarmed recruits were shot.[535] In describing the risk of infiltration, it stated:

> "We judge that all the Iraqi official institutions, including the security forces … employ individuals who give information to the insurgents, whether willingly or under threat. We estimate that nearly a third of current police officers will in time have to be dismissed due to their unsuitability, many of whom are believed to co-operate with insurgents. In Basra the police chief has been sacked … Some attacks, such as the murders of high profile officials, suggest insider knowledge. But insurgents are also able to intimidate or attack the security forces simply because they live in and are known among the local community."

590. On 26 November, MOD officials advised Mr Hoon that the ISF had performed well during operations in Fallujah (see Section 9.3) and that the development of the ISF was "on track".[536] Many ISF elements were "above the predicted capability" for 1 December. Although absenteeism remained a problem, it was being addressed, including through "greater use of posting away from home areas to avoid intimidation". The minute asked Mr Hoon to note that:

> "ISF tasks during [the Fallujah operation] were deliberately selected so as not to be too demanding. That most of Fallujah was virtually deserted made ISF follow up operations easier; and the insurgents made little concerted attempt to disrupt them. It is not surprising therefore that [the Fallujah operation] did not reveal any significant gaps in ISF capability, training or equipment. It was never intended so to do."

FURTHER CONCERNS ABOUT IRAQIISATION

591. On 20 August 2004, Mr Phillipson wrote to Mr George Fergusson, OD Sec, commissioning a paper that set out the full picture in Iraq.[537] It was to cover how Iraq could progress to successful elections in January 2005, the challenges faced and "initial thoughts" on how those challenges could be addressed.

592. The IPU produced the paper, which concluded that the strategy agreed by the DOP in July remained the right one but would need "regular fine tuning".[538] On SSR, the IPU suggested that timescales for Iraqiisation could "be compressed … but only with increased resources and at risk to quality". Equipment supply had started "to flow" but momentum would need to be maintained and in-country distribution improved.

[538] Minute Crompton to Private Secretary [FCO], 27 August 2004, 'Iraq: Next Steps' attaching Paper Iraq Policy Unit, 27 August 2004, 'Iraq: Next Steps: Action Points'.

The paper also highlighted that the Petraeus Plan would strain budgets and require "sustained high level lobbying" of key allies to extend their deployment as many MNF contributors expected deployment to cease in 2005, earlier than required by the Plan.

593. Mr Phillipson, in summarising the paper to Mr Blair, described it as "too vague, and does not tally with loss of control compared to the situation on the ground in early July, not least in Basra".[539] On Iraqiisation, Mr Phillipson suggested:

> "The paper says that Iraqiisation is on track. We should ask for a more explicit assessment. What were the original timelines and benchmarks? What is our performance against them? How and where can they be tightened up and accelerated? There is a tendency to fear that this will increase costs – we should make clear that this should not be a bar to the necessary policy judgements. On timelines we also need to challenge the assertion that MNF forces will now need to be in Iraq at present levels until 2006 – we should be looking to move as quickly as possible to a shift from offensive MNF forces to a smaller training and advisory deployment."

594. On 29 August, Mr Blair produced a minute in response which expressed that although the rationale behind Iraqiisation was "fine", the "urgency of the situation may overwhelm us and make our timescales … naive".[540] Mr Blair stressed the need for immediate action:

> "Allawi has to be given, by hook or by crook, immediate strong, well-armed brigades who can move into any trouble-spot and clean up. This has got to take precedence over the General Petraeus plan. But we cannot have a row over equipment. If he needs the stuff, he has got to have it."

595. On 9 September, Sir Nigel Sheinwald and Mr David Quarrey, a Private Secretary in No.10, sent Mr Blair a minute reporting their recent visit to Iraq, for use in Mr Blair's planned video conference with President Bush.[541] They reported:

> "Iraqiisation is on a trajectory which will take us well into 2005, and maybe into 2006, before they can stand on their own. The police are doing better than the Army. There are real capacity issues in the key ministries, though throwing more advisers at them might not help. We seriously need to make a UK national contribution to speeding up equipment supply."

596. The minute stated that the US NSC and No.10 would need to "be all over" the issue in coming months to ensure further progress and the need to maintain pressure for delivery on Iraqiisation should be one of the key messages for Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush.

597. On 16 September, Mr Blair chaired a meeting of the Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq (AHMGI – see Section 2), called "to ensure the UK Government approach to Iraq was fully co-ordinated in the period up to Iraqi elections in January 2005".[542] He intended that the Group should meet regularly.

598. Given an insurgency that appeared to be increasingly co-ordinated, Mr Blair told the Group that he was "concerned that the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) did not have sufficient capability to take on the insurgents."

599. Gen Walker reported that plans were in place for the ISF to be fully equipped and trained by mid-2005, but that their capabilities would remain limited, especially compared with the MNF. There was little scope for accelerating the plans.

600. The Group agreed that the MOD would "make recommendations on how ISF capacity will develop and what more we can do to accelerate or refine the delivery to allow the ISF to tackle the current insurgency campaign".

601. General Sir Mike Jackson, Chief of the General Staff, visited Iraq from 12 to 15 September.[543] In his report, he observed:

> "… the generation of trained and equipped ISF and IPS is taking considerably more time than expected … Although General Petraeus was buoyant about the progress in ISF and the recent performance of two of their battalions in Najaf, there is an underlying reservation highlighted by many, including Gen Casey, that improvement is slow – the faster release of allocated funds will help."

602. On 19 September, Mr Blair met Prime Minister Allawi and Iraqi Ministers at No.10.[544] In Mr Quarrey's note of the meeting to Mr Straw's Private Secretary, he wrote that Dr Allawi had expressed frustration at the pace of Iraqiisation which had followed "the slow route of General Petraeus" and "had told Bush that he needed security capacity now, not next year".

603. Mr Blair said that it was important that the long-term work continued but that there was also a need rapidly to increase the capacity of Iraqi intelligence and the ISF. Prime Minister Allawi requested a meeting with senior defence and intelligence officials from the US, UK and Iraq "to discuss problems with Iraqiisation". When Iraqi Ministers suggested a halt to de-Ba'athification, Mr Blair and Dr Allawi agreed that the IIG needed "a practical approach".

604. In a private meeting with Mr Blair afterwards, Dr Allawi said security was his personal focus, but was part of wider work on an overall strategy addressing national reconciliation and Sunni outreach, building the economy and building up the institutions of government and the state.[545] Dr Allawi made clear that tackling the security situation was his top priority, but he lacked effective resources to achieve that. He "needed: the two mechanised divisions, a Rapid Deployment Force,[546] an effective anti-terrorist capability in the police, and a more rapid build up of intelligence capability". Mr Blair commissioned advice from Lt Gen McColl on how best to meet that requirement.

605. On 20 September, Mr Naworynsky provided two papers to No.10: "one on the current status of the ISF, including an analysis of the Petraeus Plan and recommendations for further work"; and a speaking note for Mr Blair's next conversation with President Bush.[547]

606. The first paper listed the current capability of the ISF as 91,000 recruited and trained personnel, comprising:

- 34,500 police;
- 34,200 members of the National Guard;
- 14,300 border officers;
- 4,800 regular army;
- 1,900 Army Intervention Force; and
- 600 Special Forces.

607. Those forces were "totally reliant on the Multi-National Force (MNF) for support" and "turning quantity into quality – the key to our withdrawal" would "take time".

608. The Petraeus Plan had forecast that by the end of 2005, total ISF strength would be 234,000 and it would be "able to tackle the majority of threats currently present in Iraq". The paper noted that that was ambitious but would in time deliver security forces to meet Iraq's predicted needs. It could be accelerated to deliver more forces with counter-insurgency capability sooner, but only by taking resources from long-term development, and so ultimately extending the length of the programme and the presence of UK forces in Iraq. The paper stated: "This would not be desirable."

609. The paper stated that the UK could complement the Petraeus Plan by: continuing to support the MOI and IMOD; procuring equipment for the ISF in MND(SE); continuing training and mentoring the ISF; supporting NATO training of the middle and senior ranks and "consider whether the ISF require a heavy force".

610. Sir Nigel Sheinwald annotated the covering letter: "This is v. feeble".[548]

611. On 21 September, Maj Gen Houghton produced a paper for the Chiefs of Staff on "the prospects for developing capable and effective Iraqi Security Forces".[549] He described the development of the ISF as "not pretty". The reasons given for that included de-Ba'athification, the decision to disband the Iraqi armed forces and the absence of a strategy for Iraq's security sector architecture. The last had now largely been addressed by the National Security Strategy, although it was not "officially signed off".

612. Maj Gen Houghton wrote that there had been "an understandable tendency by some to 'talk-up' the timescales" for delivering manpower, equipment and training. Progress had been made but "must be set in the context of significant political frustration at the highest levels of Iraq, US and UK government". He offered that one conclusion was that:

> "… the current political frustration at the lack of progress in ISF development may be mis-directed. It is focusing too much on short-term, physical and – to an extent – symbolic representations of capability; it is not focusing enough on the capabilities which will actually allow Iraq to fight its own campaign. The need to meet this latter requirement may be brought closer in time as a result of the elections in the new year."

613. On 22 September, Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair with advice on how the ISF would develop.[550] He stated:

> "It is clear that Allawi feels frustrated with progress on Iraqiisation … Our current assessment is that the Petraeus Plan will deliver ISF scaled to meet Iraq's needs, including a limited offensive capability in time for the elections in January 2005. Allawi's concerns are undoubtedly genuine."

614. No.10 "pressed MOD for a full and imaginative response to Allawi's request".[551] Mr Hoon was "asked for more detail and a better focus" by No.10 after writing to Mr Blair on 27 September.[552]

615. Mr Naworynsky addressed that request in a letter to Mr Quarrey on 30 September after receiving advice from Lt Gen Fry.[553] While the MOD accepted that the pace of progress "could have been more rapid", its judgement was:

> "… that the Petraeus plan will deliver the required capability and does not need a radical overhaul. Indeed, to do so would stall momentum and delay the progress which Allawi desires. Indeed, we run the risk of a 'new plan' causing confusion with the existing plan."

616. Despite that judgement, Lt Gen Fry had identified that the ING could be provided with more firepower, mobility and logistic support. To do that, Mr Naworynsky listed six proposals at an estimated total cost of US$107m. He wrote that those proposals would "accelerate the development of capable ISF" but were "costly and unfunded" with no provision for meeting them within the MOD's budget. He concluded by pointing out that "even if all this is done, the impact on Iraqi capability for high end counter-insurgency operations before elections will remain very limited". It would, however, "give a highly visible Iraqi face to such operations which would be at least as important in perception terms as the military effect achieved".

617. Mr Quarrey summarised the MOD's proposals to Mr Blair as "effectively brush[ing] aside Allawi's demands".[554] He accepted that there was logic in the proposals but the focus on ING instead of the main counter-insurgency forces would not deliver what Allawi "really wants". He advised Mr Blair to speak to Mr Hoon, "emphasising the need for him to take a personal interest in the issue".

618. Referring to the MOD's proposals, Mr Blair responded: "It may be right but it's definitely not a response to Allawi."[555]

619. On 5 October, Dr Allawi wrote a letter to President Bush and Mr Blair.[556] The Inquiry has not seen this letter.

620. On the same day, Mr Blair and President Bush spoke by video conference.[557] Mr Blair's brief for the conversation suggested that he should ask the President if there had been progress on accelerating Iraqiisation; Secretary Rumsfeld was believed to be resisting such a move.[558]

621. In discussion, Mr Blair said that Prime Minister Allawi was pushing ahead with Iraqiisation as fast as he could. Mr Blair suggested that Dr Allawi's "twin track of political outreach and increased military capability" plus a statement from the US and UK that they were "in this until the job was done", was "key".[559]

622. Mr Blair and Prime Minister Allawi spoke on 22 October.[560] Mr Quarrey recorded that Dr Allawi said that Iraqiisation was "finally moving" and that "people – even including Rumsfeld – now accepted that Allawi was right about the need to accelerate this". Dr Allawi was expecting a detailed plan the following week.

Global Conflict Prevention Pool strategy update

On 29 September 2004, Mr Stuart Jack, FCO Director Iraq, provided an update on a revised Global Conflict Prevention Pool (GCPP) Strategy to Mr Straw's Private Secretary.[561] The Strategy had three objectives:

- building the capacity of the Iraqi Government and civil society to carry out conflict prevention and resolution;
- preventing further polarisation and reducing underlying tensions between different elements of Iraqi society; and
- building the capacity of the security sector, with special emphasis on the police and prisons.

On funding, Mr Jack wrote that Mr Blair had asked the GCPP to fund up to £2m for a project supporting the MOI. That was in addition to a £2.5m MOD bid approved by AHMGI on 16 September to purchase equipment for the ISF.[562] Both projects were considered to serve "our broader Iraq objectives", although the ISF project only "just about" met published eligibility criteria for the supply of military equipment.

Mr Straw wrote to Mr Hoon and Mr Benn on 4 October with the revised Strategy, recommending that the FCO, the MOD and DFID endorse it.[563] Mr Straw flagged that funding was "over-committed" that financial year and warned that future project proposals for Iraq would need to be carefully considered in that light.

There is no record that Mr Benn or Mr Hoon formally endorsed the Strategy.

Suggestions for improvements in SSR

623. Mr Robert Davies, Chief Police Adviser to the MOI, produced a briefing on the IPS for Mr Straw on 6 October.[564] He wrote:

> "The impatient focus on increasing its size (aspiration force of 130K – there are 130K on current payroll but only 90K accounted for!) has led to a large number of police joining the service as a result of General Petraeus' drive for '30K in 30 days', who have not received any training and who are of questionable integrity and quality."

624. Mr Davies summarised the IPS as "… brave but subject to intimidation, in part poorly led, weak in structures according to western standards, and in need of further equipment".

625. Mr Davies also noted that there was no forensic examination of serious crime, intelligence gathering was weak and "the inability of the IPS to plan operations is causing all sorts of serious problems in combined operations".

626. Mr Davies stated that two regiments of police were being formed from soldiers who were "simply changing the colour of their shirts" to form assault brigades. He also said: "The poor quality of leadership is being buttressed by Generals with a military background being transferred to the police."

627. Mr Davies suggested that the UK could offer further assistance through:

- developing a professional facility to deal with kidnapping and hostage taking;
- continued support for "operational planning training";
- doubling UK advisers to bolster support to senior IPS officers and cover other UK officers' leave periods; and
- supporting the development of the IPS intelligence strategy.

628. Following Mr Davies' report, Mr Straw requested advice from the IPU.[565] A junior official responded on 5 November, indicating that Mr Davies was in "daily contact" with the IPU on policing in Iraq and that the emphasis was "now on quality not quantity". The two most significant problems were identified as "the dysfunctional MOI and equipment shortages" and IPU highlighted the two recent GCPP funded initiatives to address those (see Box, 'Global Conflict Prevention Pool strategy update', earlier in this Section).

629. In November, DCC Brand produced a report highlighting a range of issues from his time in Baghdad and recommendations to address them.[566] Those included that:

- police involvement in pre-conflict planning could have helped to ensure the IPS were better prepared for their new role;
- the FCO providing terms of reference for seconded senior police officers would help to manage expectations for each mission; and
- a "fundamental shift should occur in HMG's [Her Majesty's Government's] policy on the raising of police officers to support international missions" to create a standing reserve of officers that are able to be deployed quickly.

630. In his conclusion, DCC Brand observed that many of his suggestions echoed earlier reports (including the Brahimi Report[567]) whose recommendations had been "largely ignored". He commented that he had "called this report 'lessons identified', as only time will tell whether any lessons have been learned".

631. The Inquiry has seen no acknowledgement of or response to DCC Brand's report by the Government.

NATO training mission – Iraq

On 22 June 2004, NATO received a request from Dr Allawi seeking support to Iraq through "training and other forms of technical assistance".[568]

On the same day, in a video conference with President Bush, Mr Blair suggested using the NATO conference in Istanbul, scheduled for later in the month, to secure agreement to Dr Allawi's request for NATO help with training.[569]

The matter was discussed at the Istanbul conference on 28 June and all Heads of State and Government in attendance agreed to offer assistance to the IIG with the training of its security forces.[570] A training mission was deployed in August to conduct training of Iraqi Headquarters personnel.

NATO's previous role had been limited to logistical support of the multinational division led by the Poles in MND(CS).[571] Personnel from Canada, Hungary, Norway, the Netherlands and Italy were all involved.

On 8 October, the North Atlantic Council agreed a Concept of Operations for enhancing NATO's assistance to the IIG by taking a role in training of the security forces.[572] Lt Gen Petraeus was given the additional role of the head of the NATO training mission.

On 21 February 2005, Mr Hoon was briefed that NATO was encountering problems fully manning its training mission in Iraq, with a shortfall of 25 posts (around a quarter of the total). At that stage, the UK had 11 personnel working in the NATO training mission.[573] To address pressure from NATO for a greater UK role Mr Hoon agreed that the UK could rebadge 11 personnel from MNSTC-I involved in Basic Officer Training as NATO personnel. Mr Hoon agreed with advice from officials that the UK should resist requests to take the lead on the Junior Officer Leadership Training Module.[574]

On 2 June 2005, Mr Roger Cornish, MOD Deputy Director Iraq, recommended the UK take leadership of the Basic Officer training module when it transferred to NATO.[575] That did not take effect until 1 July 2006, and then only after agreeing a Memorandum of Understanding that stipulated the UK would not be expected to make up any personnel or funding shortfalls.[576]

By July 2007, the UK contribution to the NATO training mission had reduced to 18 personnel, and was expected to decrease further to 14.[577]

The UK provided personnel to the NATO training mission until its withdrawal from Iraq on 31 December 2011.[578] The mission's mandate was not extended, as agreement could not be reached on the legal status of NATO troops operating in country. Over the seven-year period, the mission trained over 5,000 military personnel and over 10,000 police personnel at a cost of over €17.5m.

632. On 18 August 2004, Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blunkett about the importance of offering training and mentoring to the IPS.[579] He wrote that the MOI lacked "the ability to conduct even rudimentary operational planning" which restricted both "their ability to plan and execute police operations" and "the ability of the Iraqi police to assume greater responsibility from the Multi-National Force in Iraq".

633. The MOD planned to run a training course "in September/October for some 50-60 senior Iraqi police officers". Nine UK military personnel would be deployed to work with UK police officers in Iraq "to ensure that a coherent approach is maintained".

634. Mr Hoon wrote that the MOD's experience suggested "that the benefits of such training initiatives will fade quickly unless they are followed up with longer-term support and underpinned by mentoring". He had asked officials in the MOD to continue working with officials from the Home Office and the FCO to consider who should provide this support and how.

635. On 13 September, Mr Chaplin sought the FCO's views about a "high priority" programme of assistance to the MOI.[580] He described the MOI as:

> "… highly dysfunctional … and in need of significant assistance in a range of areas, from operational planning to the basics like recording minutes of meetings and following up action points."

636. Mr Chaplin reported that, while the UK and US had resources allocated to operational advice and supporting the IPS's development, nothing "adequately addresses the need for capacity-building" within the MOI. A meeting with the MOD, DFID and UK Police Advisers had concluded that a programme of assistance was needed to address this gap, and that the GCPP "would be the most appropriate source" of funding. The key elements of the programme were:

- operational planning;
- basic capacity-building – "getting effective structures and working practices in place";

- communications strategy;
- mentoring; and
- a training needs assessment.

637. In mid-October, the UK agreed to provide funds from the GCPP to build the capacity of the MOI, which was described as "a weak link in efforts to make the Iraqi police effective enough to operate without MNF support".[581]

638. At the SSR meeting on 7 October, it was reported that £3.5m of GCPP funding had been agreed for the MOI project over the next 12 to 18 months.[582] The first phase would be a scoping visit. The second phase would include two advisers until January 2005 and then four advisers for a further year. There was potential to use civil servants from the Home Office, such as a senior policy maker.

639. On 19 October, a group comprising Defence Advisory Team (DAT) personnel and a consultant were deployed to Iraq to do the initial scoping for the MOI project.[583] It reported that the MOI was "unable to carry out basic management functions".[584] Basic management information, including the number of police, remained unavailable. Decision-making at the top of the Ministry was improving, helped significantly by US mentors, but it was very difficult to translate decisions into action:

> "Iraqi politicians currently find it hard to work with their official colleagues and deputies, who have often been selected to achieve balance as part of a political settlement rather than on merit or because they share a political programme. In an unstable political and security environment, politicians are understandably reluctant to trust people whom they do not know, and prefer to work with trustworthy family and tribal members, regardless of formal structures or job titles."

640. The DAT also reported that the MOI was located outside the Green Zone[585] and that visits were currently limited to three two-hour slots per week.

641. The team recommended that UK support should focus on strengthening the capabilities of a small, permanent cadre of Iraqi officials who could provide a policy implementation capacity to any Minister within any overall structure. They also reported that in the absence of an agreed constitution they could not make recommendations to increase political accountability, and that they had been unable to consult civil society on their recommendations due to the security situation and because few representative bodies yet existed. Capacity would be built through a series of events focused on particular issues facing the Ministry, supplemented by a team of long-term advisers.

642. On 14 January 2005, a commercial proposal was submitted to DFID by Crown Agents, the company responsible for delivering the MOI project.[586] That was a revision of two earlier proposals (in December and January), following on from the project design team's visit in October. The project was scheduled to run for 15 months at a cost of £2.3m, "with a provisional start date of January 2005". The proposal stated that two international advisers and two Iraqi advisers seconded from the MOI would be based in the Minister of the Interior's office to ensure continuity and "a link to wider Ministerial, governmental and donor concerns".

643. Mr Howard visited Baghdad from 13 to 15 January.[587] He noted that increased UK assistance to the IMOD and the MOI ("by stepping up efforts … to fill key advisory posts") was important in helping Iraqis achieve effective leadership of their security forces. He encouraged UK support in developing an Iraqi tactical intelligence capability by setting up a "Special Branch" function.[588] He described the relationship between the MOI and the police as "very tenuous".

644. The MOD had been providing a team of civilian personnel to advise and assist with the development of the IMOD since January 2004.[589] UK military trainers were also working on the creation of the Iraqi Joint Forces HQ, to provide command and control of the Iraqi Armed Forces.

645. On 4 March, Mr Howard wrote to Mr Hoon about future UK support to the IMOD.[590] He stated that there was:

> "… definite value in increasing UK efforts in this area by proactively identifying posts where we think we can provide targeted expertise … and by finding the right people to fill them early on."

646. He also reported:

> "We are currently looking at the possibility of increasing UK civilian support to the MOI with FCO and DFID …"

647. Minutes from the GCPP Strategy Meeting on 8 March recorded that two consultants had withdrawn from the MOI project.[591] Three new candidates had been identified and a decision would be taken later that week to confirm the appointments.

The meeting heard that that could delay the project until early April, but that it could "prove beneficial, as the project will require the new Minister's backing if it is to be effective".

648. At the next Iraq GCPP Strategy Meeting on 16 March, the meeting was told that two new consultants had been appointed and would be deployed to Iraq mid-April.[592]

649. In his May 2005 review of policing priorities and resources, Acting Deputy Chief Constable Colin Smith, Chief Police Adviser Iraq, identified the need for a senior UK civil servant (from the Home Office) with experience in police strategic development and police structure to assist the MOI.[593]

650. That request was picked up by Mr Michael Gillespie, Home Office Head of the Public Order and Police Co-Operation Unit.[594] He advised Mr Peter Storr, Home Office International Director, that there were financial implications to the request, as the FCO would not reimburse salary or the additional costs of deployment. Aside from the financial implications, Mr Gillespie raised "the issue of whether this is a good use of Home Office resources".

651. On 27 November 2009, a draft review of the support provided to the MOI and IPS was circulated.[595] It stated that the MOI project had been merged with the FCO-led IPS training programme in 2007 following the last external review, to create "greater co-ordination and a more cross-sectoral approach to Security Sector Reform". Responsibility for the MOI element was transferred to the US in June 2009.

Fraud and assassinations in the Iraqi MOD

In his book The Occupation of Iraq, Mr Ali A Allawi, former IGC Defence Minister gave details of a major corruption scandal in the Iraqi IMOD (IMOD).[596] He stated that the Ministry of Finance was instructed to appropriate US$1.7bn in one lump sum, and put it at the disposal of the IMOD. The money was to be used for the formation of two rapid deployment divisions but no justification was given for the amount required and limits on spending were removed.

On 16 May 2005, the Iraqi Bureau of Supreme Audit[597] presented a "damning report" to the incoming Prime Minister. Later in 2005, the Director General of Finance at the IMOD was arrested and helped in exposing the involvement of senior IMOD officials. Two of her colleagues, the Director General of Planning and the Inspector General, were subsequently murdered.

JUSTICE SECTOR CONCERNS

652. The Justice Sector Adviser for the International Legal Assistance Consortium (ILAC) and DFID arrived at the British Embassy Baghdad on 22 September.[598] Her report described the positive reception of training programmes, but noted that that was "accompanied by clear statements of need for more". Reform of the Iraqi Bar Association would continue to be "complex and difficult due to the factional and political in-fighting"; it was seen as a "long-term project".

653. The consultant identified factors which should inform future training and strategy of the justice sector, including the importance of increasing the number of jurists being trained, to involving women and the regions, and for all training sessions to include the basic requirements of a fair trial (civil and criminal). She also recommended establishing a donor co-ordination mechanism under Iraqi leadership which would help to provide a clear picture of all assistance being provided and planned and identify outstanding areas of need.

654. At the AHMGIR on 9 December the point was made in discussion that "there was a demand in Iraq for more judicial assistance".[599] The minutes recorded that Lord Goldsmith was "exploring what more help we could offer".

655. On 15 December, a junior DFID official advised Mr Benn to write to Lord Goldsmith explaining DFID's work in the justice sector.[600] The official wrote that, following the AHMGIR on 9 December, Lord Goldsmith had "made clear his frustration" to officials that "more was not being done and that he [was] not being kept sufficiently informed".

656. Mr Benn wrote to Lord Goldsmith on 13 January 2005.[601] Mr Benn wrote that "DFID's bilateral assistance" had focused on the ILAC project and that, to date:

- 93 judges had received training on the independence of the judiciary;
- 263 judges, prosecutors and lawyers had received training by the International Bar Association in International Human Rights Law; and
- 13 trainers had been trained with "cascade training" reported for between 100 and 200 lawyers in Iraq.

657. The letter also highlighted two programmes being funded by the GCPP: the Southern Iraq Prison Programme (to ensure accordance with international minimum standards for the treatment of prisoners and monitoring capacity, and the MOI capacity-building programme. Mr Benn wrote that the work was undertaken "against the backdrop of the very difficult security environment in Iraq" and that "security concerns have inevitably delayed some of ILAC's work".

658. An update on donor support to the Iraqi justice sector was attached to Mr Benn's letter. This identified a number of constraints that were limiting access to justice, including the lack of scrutiny over court procedures, irregular sentencing, and weak integration between the police, courts and prisons. The update stated that "donor activity would benefit from a more co-ordinated and strategic approach, under the guidance of the Iraqi Minister of Justice and Chief Justice".

659. On 12 January, ILAC submitted their annual report on the Justice Sector Support programme to DFID.[602] Security was described as "the major constraint faced by legal professionals" and was listed as a risk to delivery against all programme outputs. ILAC warned that costs would be £182,000 higher than their grant proposal because the assumption had been that in 2005 training would be delivered inside Iraq; the security situation dictated that training would have to continue outside.

660. ILAC reported "no substantial progress" with regard to strengthening the admission requirements or disciplinary procedures of the Iraqi Bar Association (IBA). It wrote that "politicking" by the IBA leadership would continue to be a risk to the selection of delegation members. ILAC plans for 2005 included "ways of ameliorating this". The Judicial Training Institute remained closed with "no immediate plans to reopen". It was "disappointing" that it had "not been possible to engage that important institution".

661. A draft version of a Strategic Conflict Assessment (SCA) dated 27 December 2004 was circulated amongst officials on 2 March 2005 (it is described in more detail later in this Section).[603] The report recommended "the continuation of training of judiciary and linking aid to independence of judiciary".

662. In the Global Conflict Prevention Pool (GCPP) Strategy meeting on 7 April, it was reported that the SCA recommended "supporting the justice sector".[604] However, while there were "clear links" to the IMOD, MOI and SSR activities, "it was decided that the GCPP could not fund any sustainable development in the area with funds available".

Delays in transferring security

663. In Mr Blair's weekly Iraq update on 9 December 2004, Mr Quarrey reported that an upcoming JIC Assessment on Iraqiisation was likely to conclude that "progress remains slow" and that "we will not hit a key target for handing over 'provincial control' to Iraqi security forces across the country by mid-2005".[605]

[604] Minutes, 7 April 2005, Iraq GCPP Strategy meeting.
[605] Minute Quarrey to Blair, 9 December 2004, 'Iraq Update'.

664. The update also included the "latest version" of a paper on handling Iraq in 2005 sent by Ms Kara Owen, Private Secretary to Mr Straw, to Mr Quarrey on 9 December. Mr Quarrey wrote that Mr Blair had seen earlier versions of the paper and that it was "mostly fine, but it remains very much work in progress and will need to be revisited depending on progress with elections and Iraqiisation".

665. The FCO paper, described as an agenda for discussion with the US, considered that continued progress on Iraqiisation would allow MNF to change during 2005 from primary responsibility for security in all areas to a supportive role, either in support of ISF operationally or as trainers or mentors.[606] A transfer of security lead to the ISF could occur in summer 2005.

666. In a note dated 12 December to his No.10 staff, Mr Blair commented that the situation in Iraq was "worrying".[607] He gave six reasons for that assessment (see Section 9.3), one of which was that the Petraeus Plan did "not seem to be yielding the looked-for progress". His note called for a "proper strategy based on a hard-headed reality check"; the FCO paper was deemed "inadequate".

667. In a discussion with President Bush on 14 December, Mr Blair said that training issues needed careful consideration but he was not clear whether the problem was the strategy, or simply that it needed time.[608] He wondered "were we missing something that was holding back the reconstruction and Iraqiisation programmes?"

668. A JIC Assessment produced on 15 December considering the ISF found:

- On force levels; that ISF figures did "not provide a guide to real capability and quality", an example being that only "some 50 percent" of the 87,000 police "on duty" were classified as trained and equipped.
- On effectiveness; that while "some progress" had been made among elements of the ISF, the overall performance of the ISF continued to be "inadequate". There was a lack of "equipment, training, leadership, command and control, and, in many cases, determination to oppose insurgents, particularly when they feel vulnerable with little or no MNF support close by".
- On the environment; that the ISF had been "under sustained attack" and was "being undermined by increasing penetration and intimidation by insurgents". Over 300 ISF members had been killed since August.[609]

[609] JIC Assessment, 15 December 2004, 'Iraq: the Iraqi Security Forces'.

669. The JIC described the plan to address those issues:

> "Prime Minister Allawi wants more capable Iraqi forces to take on the hard-line elements of the insurgency and reduce his reliance on the MNF. More army units are coming on line: elements of a mechanised brigade (including some tanks and armoured personnel carriers) and two new army brigades are deploying this month, one to Mosul and one to Baghdad. Three more police special commando battalions are planned. But these units have limited operational capability (the new brigade in Mosul is doing badly and is being replaced). This will restrict their employability in the short term and may jeopardise longer-term ISF aspirations. A plan has been put forward to address some of the command and control problems: by the end of January 2005 a national command and control system will be in place linking the Prime Minister, MOD and MOI to the national Joint Co-ordination Centre (JCC) and provincial JCCs. This will help, but better political leadership and overall management by the MOI and MOD is required."

670. On prospects, JIC stated:

> "Through 2005 ISF capability will grow incrementally and significant units, up to brigade size should be deployable by the summer. The ISF should benefit from the planned improved training and equipment procurement programmes. After significant delays these are now reported to be on track, however the planned expansion of trained and equipped police from some 47,000 to 135,000 and the army from some 3,000 to 27,000 between now and July 2005 seems very ambitious. The more modest increases planned for specialist units may be more achievable. The NATO mission to assist leadership training is stalled. The ISF will remain reliant on support from the MNF in many areas, in particular heavy fire support and logistics. There is little sign of the development of a coherent intelligence capability, which is critical to success. Leadership and discipline will remain chronic problems affecting capability; … Attacks and intimidation will also continue to undermine effectiveness. Policing crime will have to remain a second priority in many areas.
> "According to the MNF, 15 out of 18 provinces will be under local control – requiring only limited support by the MNF – by the end of the year. But we judge local control, even in some Shia and Kurdish areas, will remain fragile. We assessed in October that the ISF would not be able to handle significant security responsibilities unaided until the middle of 2005 at the earliest. We have also previously judged that the MNF are constraining, not containing, the insurgency. We now judge that, if the Iraqi Government and the MNF are unable to improve the security situation significantly, particularly in and around Baghdad, a credible ISF capable of managing the insurgency unaided will not emerge until 2006 at the earliest."

671. The JIC advised that plans for Iraqi military forces had grown from three infantry divisions to two infantry divisions, six ING divisions, an Iraqi Intervention Force division and a mechanised brigade.

672. The JIC Assessment was discussed at the AHMGI on 16 December, where the consequences of slow ISF development on MNF drawdown were reiterated.[610] Ministers agreed that a number of papers should be prepared, including practical suggestions to adjust the Petraeus Plan, ways of improving the IMOD and MOI, a list of security and funding issues for Mr Blair to raise with President Bush and a list of useful activities that other countries could be asked to undertake.

673. In a Note to President Bush on 10 January 2005, Mr Blair described the Iraqiisation of security forces as critical but said that he was not convinced that the plan to deliver it was robust enough.[611] He identified work on ISF leadership – both Ministerial and operational – as necessary as well as the provision of "the equipment they need to be a match for the insurgents". Mr Blair suggested that the objective should be "more and tougher quality, while building quantity" and confirmed that he had authorised "an extra $78m from our MOD for the Iraqi Forces in the South". Although he could not be sure that funding was essential, Mr Blair wrote "I'll take the risk rather than find six months later it was".

674. When Mr Blair spoke to President Bush by video conference the following day, he suggested that the "Luck Review" (described later in this Section) would "give us a better idea of what was required on Iraqiisation".[612]

675. On 16 January, Mr Phillipson sent a note to Mr Geoffrey Adams, Mr Straw's Principal Private Secretary, with details of Mr Sheinwald's visit to Washington a couple of days earlier.[613] When he met Dr Rice, Mr Sheinwald raised the "gloomy assessment" that "only a few thousand of Iraqi Security Forces personnel were properly trained and led".

676. Mr Sheinwald said: "This showed the scale of the problem, as the official numbers for those trained and equipped was 120,000." Dr Rice was recorded as saying that "the problem with the police was simple. They were trained to walk a beat but were now facing terrorists with RPGs [Rocket Propelled Grenades]. They were either fleeing or dying, but not fighting."

677. On 21 January, Mr Phillipson wrote to Mr Chris Baker, Principal Private Secretary to Mr Hoon, with a summary of a meeting held between Mr Blair and Mr Hoon that morning.[614] Gen Walker, Ms Aldred, Mr Phillipson and Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff, were also present. Mr Blair "said that his primary concern remained that the Iraqiisation programme was not working". Gen Walker "conceded that it certainly was not happening as fast as we had hoped" and that "all of Gen Petraeus' timelines had been missed". He said that there remained a "crucial need to accelerate the Iraqiisation programme to advance the date when ISF could take over security".

Allegations of abuse by Iraqi police

On 25 January 2005, Human Rights Watch (HRW) published a report which alleged that the abuse of detainees by Iraqi police and intelligence forces had become "routine and commonplace".[615] The report was based on interviews with 90 detainees in Iraq between July and October 2004 and described "serious and widespread human rights violations". It alleged "the systematic use of arbitrary arrest, prolonged pre-trial detention without judicial review, torture and ill-treatment of detainees, denial of access by families and lawyers to detainees, improper treatment of detained children, and abysmal conditions in pre-trial detention facilities".

The report made a number of recommendations to MNF governments, including the immediate prioritisation of an investigation into allegations of torture or ill-treatment of detainees by the IPS, establishing new mechanisms to investigate allegations of abuse and an increase in the number of advisers deployed in detention facilities.

The press release issued by HRW on the same day stated:

> "International police advisers, primarily US citizens funded through the United States government, have turned a blind eye to these rampant abuses."[616]

A note highlighting the publication of the report was sent from a junior official in IPU to the Private Secretary of Mr Bill Rammell, FCO Parliamentary Under-Secretary, on 24 January.[617] It stated that the report had been expected for "some time" and that "Ministers were aware it was pending". The junior official wrote:

> "A preliminary reading would suggest that it is well-researched, although it appears to be biased towards conditions in central Iraq with relatively limited coverage of southern Iraq where the UK has a more direct influence on conditions."

The junior official outlined the support provided to the Iraqi police and prison services, and the procedures in place to ensure compliance with international law. The official wrote: "We will have to review our assistance in the light of this report."

The Inquiry has seen no reporting of this review in contemporaneous documents.

A telegram from Baghdad on 6 February stated that Mr Andrew Hood, Legal Adviser, had met Mr Bakhtiar Amin, Iraqi Minister of Human Rights, on 3 February to establish Mr Amin's response to the HRW report.[618] Mr Amin was "critical of HRW for issuing a report without bothering to check with him what corrective action was in hand". He explained his Ministry's team of prison inspectors had already raised the concerns highlighted in the report to the MOI and those responsible for individual facilities. He did, however, recognise that work was ad hoc and needed to be better established.

[618] Telegram 90 Baghdad to FCO, 6 February 2005, 'Iraq: Call on Minister of Human Rights'.

Mr Amin thanked the UK for its continued support of his Ministry, especially the training for prison inspectors in Basra, and asked Mr Hood to investigate whether additional funding might be available to extend the training to all inspectors.

The telegram reported that security concerns had prevented the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) carrying out "all but a few" inspections of detention facilities and the Minister of Justice was reticent to appoint an independent prison ombudsman. That meant there was "an even greater need" to support the training of Iraqi officials to carry out inspections.

The "Luck Review" and strategy for 2005

678. A telegram from Mr Chaplin on 21 January 2005 reported that the retired US General Gary Luck had left Iraq on 20 January after a week-long assessment of the ISF's development.[619] Gen Luck had been appointed by Secretary Rumsfeld to head a 20-strong team "asked to validate" the Petraeus Plan and "examine whether anything could be done to speed up the delivery of capable Iraqi forces".

679. Gen Luck would not be producing a written report but would brief Secretary Rumsfeld and the President on his findings. Mr Chaplin understood that Gen Luck would "broadly endorse the emerging MNF-I plan for ISF development" and:

- suggest departments other than Defense play a bigger role;
- "rubber-stamp the MNF-I's intention to switch its main effort from operations to training and mentoring" since that had worked well in MND(SE);
- recommend additional advisers in the Ministries to coach and mentor Iraqis; and
- recommend a fundamental overhaul of intelligence structures.

680. Mr Chaplin also referred to the Police Advisory Teams (PATs) concept, whereby a small number of MNF-I soldiers and police advisers would be placed in IPS stations. He wrote that there were different views on its viability. Iraqi advice was that this would "be a backward step politically", be resented by the IPS and "raise serious force protection issues" for those involved. Gen Luck had indicated that he did not intend to reflect any of those concerns to Secretary Rumsfeld, "presumably because [Gen] Casey was dead set on PATs, which he sold heavily in Washington". Mr Chaplin thought that PATs had "now got so much momentum that it will go ahead in some format" but that the UK "should influence the eventual shape it takes by encouraging MNF-I to engage seriously with the Iraqi concerns".

681. Mr Chaplin wrote that Gen Luck was "particularly impressed" by the UK's policing work in the South and that he was "seriously thinking of recommending that the UK should take the lead for all police work in Iraq". Mr Chaplin thought that "this would probably be a step too far for us, and possibly for the Americans as well", but that the

UK should consider how to use that opportunity to influence the strategic direction of policing in Iraq.

682. Mr Chaplin also reported that the importance of human rights had been raised with Gen Luck: "These were not nice to have add-ons but were fundamental to our chances of defeating the insurgency and sustaining democracy in Iraq." Mr Chaplin said that Gen Luck "agreed entirely" but "did not say whether he intended to flag this up".

683. On 23 January 2005, DCC Smith wrote a report about his role in the "Luck Review".[620] DCC Smith wrote that the review's "key recommendation" would be PATs, and to embed these "to a far greater degree than current International Police Advisors (IPAs)". He noted that the concept was not "universally supported" and cited concerns raised by US advisers, existing IPAs and the Minister of the Interior. DCC Smith did suggest that PATs could address other police issues such as leadership training and the "post initial training, quality and morale issues". DCC Smith later became the UK Chief Police Adviser in Iraq (in May 2005), a role that combined the two previous Senior Police Adviser positions in Baghdad and Basra. His reports feature extensively in this Section.

684. During a video conference on 17 January, Mr Blair told President Bush that they had to give a sense that Iraqiisation was "going somewhere" and that things would change after the elections.[621] He suggested that the Luck Review should feed quickly into a new, public, security plan. In Mr Blair's view the weakness of Iraqi structures remained "a real problem".

685. Ms Aldred and her team in the Cabinet Office co-ordinated a strategy paper for the 9 February AHMGI, which focused on how to achieve coalition objectives in post-election Iraq (see Section 9.3).[622] The draft 'Iraq: Strategy for 2005', sent to Mr Quarrey on 8 February, summarised General Luck's key recommendations:

- improve ISF capacity to conduct independent counter-insurgency operations as well as to maintain domestic order;
- establish partnerships between Iraqi and coalition units and develop military, special police, border force, and PATs from the coalition and embed them within Iraqi forces;
- build the institutional capabilities of the Government (MOD and MOI) to plan and direct counter-insurgency operations; and
- develop the concept of bureaucratic assistance teams to help Iraqi ministries establish a Government that functions across all the 'lines of operation' needed for the campaign.

[622] Paper Cabinet Office, 7 February 2005, 'Iraq: Strategy for 2005'.

686. One of the key elements of the "Strategy for 2005" was "building up the capability of the Iraqi Security Forces". It predicted that the incoming Iraqi Transitional Government (ITG) would regard security as a top priority and that they should be "encouraged to build on Allawi's new security plan" of which key elements were likely to include:

- an overarching and visible Iraqi structure responsible for security, under a single, senior minister;
- effective governance at provincial level to provide a political framework for ISF control;
- developing proposals on how to make SSR work and secure Iraqi ownership of the plan;
- adequate top end capability, including agreement on the size of the Iraqi Intervention Force (IIF) and Police Commandos and plans to deliver them;
- development of a "policing plan" setting out the role of the police, including self-protection, development of a paramilitary capability, its relationship with the military, and areas of police primacy; and
- resolving the de-Ba'athification dilemma to allow SSR to work.

687. The Strategy proposed offering further UK assistance with:

- continued training effort in MND(SE);
- development of a strategy for the IPS (deployment of experienced, senior officers to both the MOI and MNF could achieve considerable impact);
- provision of suitably qualified and experienced advisers to mentor senior Iraqi officials and support to build institutional capacity;
- development of Iraqi intelligence capability;
- building on MND(SE) practices to provide the conditions for handover to Iraqi regional control as soon as practicable;
- helping the Iraqis to co-ordinate international assistance; and
- encouraging other international forces (such as the Dutch and Portuguese) to keep at least some forces in Iraq in a training role, to mitigate the impact of their withdrawal from military operations.

688. The paper noted that there was no "silver bullet" for reforming the ISF.

689. The AHMGI approved the paper on 9 February, subject to various points including the need to cover judicial issues, which had not been addressed in the Strategy.[623]

[623] Minutes, 9 February 2005, Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq meeting.

690. A revised version of the Strategy was shared with the US on 11 February.[624] That version had removed references to the current security situation and to Military Assistance Teams (MATs) and Police Advisory Teams (PATs). However, on training the ISF, it did state the need to embed "military teams to mentor Iraqi forces in operational roles". Also added was the need to introduce a criminal justice system, Iraqi criminal tribunal and "improved regimes for detention facilities".

Military Assistance Teams and Police Advisory Teams

From November 2003 to November 2004, the number of US soldiers whose primary mission was to advise Iraqi units grew from 350 to 1,200.[625] Gen Luck advocated doubling or tripling the number of advisers partnering Iraqi units and MNSTC-I expanded the programme in response.

The 'Iraq: Strategy for 2005' paper considered by AHMGI on 9 February 2005 highlighted that the idea of Military Assistance Teams (MATs) was supported (as this followed practice in MND(SE)), but did "not favour" Police Advisory Teams (PATs).[626] It stated: "It is not yet clear whether the US will adopt the latter proposal, which carries a high risk for those embedded at local level."

On MATs, the paper said that the UK "would not anticipate providing personnel for Military Assistance Teams … outside our current area of operations".[627]

On 18 February, Mr Cornish advised Mr Hoon on an MOD review of the Iraq campaign, looking at why the plan "was not delivering the required results".[628] In considering the UK's involvement in "campaign enhancement", Mr Cornish wrote:

> "The US has accepted that the Security Sector Reform (SSR) models which the UK are developing in MND(SE) to train and mentor ISF are likely to be different from those that they might use elsewhere in Iraq."

Delivering MATs was listed as one of the possible UK military initiatives. A footnote explained:

> "The MATs concept will be implemented using the UK model, which is based on developing partner arrangements between UK and Iraq units, rather than embedding individuals in Iraqi units (the US approach) … Because of Iraqi Ministerial objections and force protection concerns, the PATs concept, as originally conceived (including with MNF-I embedded in local police stations), is now all but dead."

Major General Peter Wall, Deputy Chief of Joint Operations, attended a CENTCOM conference on the post-election strategy for Iraq on 21 to 23 February.[629] He reported:

> "MNF-I have walked back from their original PATs concept, though remained adamant that the principle of hands-on help to the police would still be required in areas where the insurgency was at its strongest … We are making progress in MND(SE). But we also need to find a way of forcing this issue in Baghdad."

THE "TRANSITION TO SELF RELIANCE"

691. On 22 April 2005, Gen Casey circulated a paper entitled 'MNF-I Campaign Action Plan for 2005 – Transition to Self-Reliance'.[630] The paper stated that the Iraqi Armed Forces would be "largely trained and equipped" by mid-2005 and that training of the police and Border Police would extend into 2006. Gen Casey wrote:

> "Generally, while Iraqi forces still lack the capacity to conduct and sustain independent counter-insurgency operations, they now have the capacity to begin assuming the lead in counter-insurgency operations across the country, and the coalition can begin to progressively transition that responsibility to them."

692. That would be "executed in four phases":

- Phase I, Implement the Transition Team Concept – MNF-I would "establish partnerships between Iraqi and coalition units" and embed Transition Teams in designated ISF units by 15 June 2005. Concurrently MNF-I with IRMO [Iraq Reconstruction and Management Office] advisers would "build capacity to continue the development of ISF leaders, organizations, supporting institutions and Iraqi security Ministries".
- Phase II, Transition to Provincial Iraqi Security Control – coalition forces would "pass the lead for conducting counter-insurgency operations to capable ISF as conditions warrant". The goal was to have the ISF in all provinces "well-postured" to provide security for the elections in December, with the coalition's visibility reduced.
- Phase III, Transition to National Iraqi Security Control – coalition forces to "progressively reduce their levels of support and presence" as the ISF became "increasingly capable". Given the training timescales, it was "unlikely" that that would occur "before mid-2006".
- Phase IV, Iraqi Security Self-Reliance – coalition forces would be "postured in strategic overwatch outside of Iraq with training, security co-operation and advisory presence remaining", with the "exact nature" of support being "determined in close co-ordination with the Government of Iraq".

693. Gen Casey stated that implementation of the strategy would "vary across Iraq based on the security situation and the readiness of Iraqi security forces and Ministries".

ISF performance during the January elections

Beginning on 28 January 2005, two days before the election, Iraqi authorities implemented curfews, imposed severe restrictions on traffic, closed Iraq's borders and banned the carrying of weapons by civilians.[631] Approximately 130,000 ISF personnel secured over 5,000 polling sites throughout the country.

Reflecting on the election in a telephone call with President Bush on 31 January, Mr Blair said it was encouraging that so many ISF had reported for duty over the weekend, but the problem remained that they were not able to cope with "big battle situations" against a well-armed and motivated enemy.[632] They lacked the necessary training and leadership. The key question remained whether they could "take over, hold and run a major city".

On 3 February, the JIC assessed:

> "On election day, the Iraqi security forces reportedly performed effectively at static guarding duties. But overall, their operational performance continues to be inadequate, particularly in Sunni Arab areas."[633]

The Iraqi elections passed smoothly in MND(SE) with the GOC commenting that "the ISF needed our help but their momentum gathered. They had the courage to stand up and be counted."[634] For the elections, Provincial Joint Operations Centres were established in MND(SE) to improve co-ordination between different security elements. Maj Gen Riley described them as "a crucial element in the security system that managed election-day security".

2005 policing strategies

694. On 21 February 2005, the FCO produced a paper for the AHMGIR (on 24 February) on UK support to civil policing in Iraq.[635] Drawing on the "Strategy for 2005" and the Luck Review, it contained proposals for a greater focus at the national level where there was "an urgent need for an Iraqi national policing strategy, supported by an appropriate training syllabus to address established weaknesses". There were 56,900 IPS officers now trained and equipped but there was still a need for the development of leadership, technical capabilities, forensics, crime scene management and investigative techniques.

635 Note FCO, 21 February 2005, 'Iraq – UK Support to Civil Policing in Iraq – 2005'.

695. Current UK commitments were summarised as:

- support for basic training – 86 officers in Jordan, az-Zubayr and Baghdad; including a combination of serving and retired police officers and MOD police officers, at a cost of £7.3m per annum from the GCPP International Peacekeeping Fund;
- enhancement of capabilities in MND(SE) – six senior and middle-ranking officers mentoring Iraqi Provincial Chiefs of Police at a cost of £500,000 from the GCPP International Peacekeeping Fund; 40 IPAs providing mentoring in the South (through ArmorGroup), costing £4.8m for six months; and
- enhancement of national capabilities – Mr Davies' role as Senior Civilian Adviser, reporting to the Minister of Interior and supported by 12 officers in advisory roles at a cost of £500,000 from the GCPP International Peacekeeping Fund.

696. Two new priorities were identified arising from the 2005 Strategy: the development of national strategies and the development of Iraqi intelligence capability. Developing a Special Branch capability was still a UK priority but the Metropolitan Police would currently not deploy staff to Baghdad on security grounds.

697. The GCPP International Peacekeeping Fund could cover existing commitments but was not able to meet new ones. New expenditure would therefore fall to the GCPP (Iraq) fund. SSR so far amounted to £5.5m for 2005/06, not including the project to support the MOI (£2.57m) or the human rights programme (£950,000). While funding was "available for all planned police activity for the next six months", an extension of the ArmorGroup contract for a further six months would create an overspend. That would leave no funding for renewing other contracts, such as the Prison Mentoring Contract, or for new projects such as additional support for the Iraqi Special Tribunal (IST– for trying crimes committed under the Saddam Hussein regime).

698. At the AHMGIR, the FCO said the "key message" from the paper was that funding beyond September was "extremely tight".[636] One of the points made in discussion was:

> "The Government would need to be prepared to make tough decisions and prioritise carefully on funding for activity in Iraq. There should be no expectation of drawing down on the Treasury Reserve."

699. Officials were tasked with taking forward funding issues, with the close involvement of the Home Office and ACPO.

[636] Minutes, 24 February 2005, Ad Hoc Group on Iraq Rehabilitation meeting.

700. On 25 February, Mr Blair wrote a note to his Private Secretary, instructing that Mr Straw be "put in charge" of the AHMGI and that each week a report is provided containing actions on "e.g. reconstruction in the South; Sunni outreach; progress on security plan".[637]

701. On 10 March, at the first meeting of the AHMGI under his chairmanship, Mr Straw explained that Mr Blair "had asked a core group of ministers to meet on a weekly basis to focus more closely on the delivery of policy in Iraq".[638]

702. One point made in discussion was that there was pressure within Iraq for some unofficial militia to be incorporated into the ISF: "The benefits of bringing them under greater control needed to be balanced against risk to ISF cohesion and political complications".

EU integrated police and Rule of Law mission for Iraq

On 21 February 2005, the EU announced that it had decided to establish an integrated police and Rule of Law mission for Iraq, known as 'EU JustLex'.[639]

Mr Straw's Private Secretary outlined the main elements of that mission in a letter to No.10 on 10 March:

- a planning office in Brussels to arrange senior management and specialist technical training for 520 judges and criminal justice officials and 250 senior police officers;
- a five-man liaison office in Baghdad to identify specific projects where EU member states could provide assistance;
- training that would take place in Member States or the region, but not in Iraq until the security situation had improved.[640]

Mr Straw's Private Secretary wrote that the 21 February package had "followed months of internal deliberations and a tough final negotiation". While there was a "more positive political mood, opposition to any association with MNF programmes or training in Iraq remains strong". He stated:

> "… the package as it stands … is modest given the scale of the task and the immediacy of the needs. If all goes to plan over the next year, the EU will provide training for some 250 police officers. During this time, we [MNF] plan to train over 40,000 policemen through the academies in Baghdad, Basra and Amman."

The operational phase of the mission began in July 2005 and was initially mandated to run until 2006. Between 2005 and the end of 2009 it was headed by Former ACC Stephen White, who had served as the UK's Senior Police Adviser in Basra in 2003.[641] The mission comprised around 40 staff and by June 2009 had spent €30m. Former ACC White described the purpose of the mission as to:

> "… focus … on the most senior members of the Iraqi police, judiciary and penitentiary services … [to] create a critical mass of credible, influential leaders who are properly equipped to make plans and decisions relevant to their responsibilities … in Iraq."[642]

In 2009, the mission began to scope the provision of training and advice in Iraq and then to progressively shift its focus to in-country work, opening additional offices in Erbil and Basra.[643] By July 2010, the mission had trained, advised and mentored:

- 805 judges (over 60 percent of the Iraqi judiciary);
- 1702 senior police officers (around four percent of senior police officers); and
- 903 prison officers (nearly 80 percent of senior prisons staff).

703. On 14 March 2005, Mr Quarrey asked the MOD for an update on progress against the Petraeus Plan.[644] Mr Naworynsky replied on 17 March and reported that ISF development was:

> "… largely on track, meeting the demands of a well-entrenched counter insurgency campaign and the evolving expectation of the Iraqi leadership … From January 2006 the ISF should be approaching full strength and the transfer of regional control will be under way. Over the next six months of 2006, the generation of ISF units should be complete, the Multi National Force (MNF) training and mentoring commitment is expected to reduce, and in all but the most volatile provinces, Iraqi-led security operations should become the norm.
> "Trained and equipped MOI forces currently number almost 82,000 personnel, but this includes a large number of absentees due to intimidation, injury, and corruption, varying dramatically in proportion across the country … The largest component (135,000) will be Iraqi Police Service (IPS), which remains an area for improvement. Conceived for peace time constabulary duties, the rate of IPS development continues to lag, as standards of equipment, personnel and training are reviewed to answer the demands of the insurgency."

704. The covering note for Mr Blair from Mr Quarrey described the MOD's paper as "rather insubstantial, and almost certainly too optimistic in its assessment of the quality of much of the ISF".[645]

705. Lieutenant General Sir Graeme Lamb, General Officer Commanding (GOC) MND(SE) from July to December 2003, reflected on the quality of the ISF in his evidence to the Inquiry.[646] He said:

> "The point of corruption in this part of the world is with the police and at the lowest level and yet we somehow were looking to try and make them into state troopers. We were never going to achieve that. It was an aspect of us approaching in many ways the problem seen through a Westminster or Washington perspective rather than one that was very much more locally focused …"

706. In a telephone call with President Bush on 22 April, Mr Blair commented that "the Iraqiisation plan did seem to be going well".[647] However, the insurgency remained well armed and well financed. Mr Blair felt that there would be a greater sense of momentum after the formation of the ITG.

707. Lieutenant General John Kiszely served as the SBMR-I from October 2004 to April 2005. His Hauldown Report contained an assessment of the ISF.[648] He described the leadership of the IMOD as "completely out of their depth" and the MOI as "dysfunctional", with the Minister bringing in his uncle to set up and run the Special Police.

708. In relation to the IPS, Lt Gen Kiszely assessed:

> "… the selection process for these policemen … is rudimentary; they undertake only eight weeks training; they are paid a very low wage; leadership at all levels is generally poor; corruption is high. To expect such a force, mostly under-strength and poorly equipped, to perform well in the face of a ruthless insurgency is unrealistic, and there have been occasions (for example in Mosul in November) when the whole of a city's police force has deserted their police stations in the face of attack or the threat of it."

709. Lt Gen Kiszely expressed concern about the Iraqi Special Police Commandos. He considered that they had been "highly effective in tackling the insurgency" but he stated that they had "no police training and are more akin to Black-and-Tans; many are former members of the Republican Guard. Their methods are robust, and there have been several cases of serious abuse, duly investigated, and no doubt many more that have not been."

710. On the insurgency, Lt Gen Kiszely assessed:

> "The high level of intimidation has been the insurgency's biggest gain of the past six months and, helped by a weak, incompetent and corrupt police force, has led in many Sunni areas to a complete absence of law and order – in effect, anarchy. Initially intimidation was used by the insurgency to gain control of cities and towns, the favoured method being to capture and execute (blindfold, hands tied behind back) anyone who stood in the way of the insurgents or who was associated with the coalition or the government. In one city (Mosul) in one five week-period (from 12 November to 19 December) the bodies of 220 victims executed in this way were found, and in one single incident (Baquba, 23 October) a busload of 50 army trainees were similarly murdered."

711. On INIS he wrote:

> "In the past six months, INIS has been somewhat discredited in the eyes of both the IIG and the coalition due to evidence of incompetence, corruption and penetration by hostile agencies, both Iraqi and external … this is an area ripe for UK advice and input."

712. On 15 May 2005, DCC Smith produced a report of his review of UK policing support to the development of the IPS.[649] His report described UK efforts in both Baghdad and Basra; those recommendations relating to policing specifically in MND(SE) are described later in this Section.

713. DCC Smith observed a weakening of UK influence in Baghdad. Following the Luck Review, the US was increasing resource for police training at a rate that the UK was unable to match. He also reported that the "UK inability to 'walk the talk' and tendency to write long, strategic doctrinal papers … has been interpreted by the US as typical British procrastination".

714. DCC Smith recommended targeting UK resources on a number of priority areas to increase influence at a strategic level in Baghdad. They included:

- the strategic development of the IPS – "there are currently no resources, except myself, dedicated to this key activity";
- intelligence and crime investigation, including forensics, identified as "one of the few areas where the UK still has a foothold", thanks, in part to the introduction of the TIPS scheme (described below); and
- continuing the Police Centre of Excellence – staffed primarily by Canadians, this was described as "a small resource but a disproportionate influence [which] helps to 'fly the flag' for policing in a land dominated by the Military".

[649] Paper Smith, 15 May 2005, 'Next Steps on Policing – Review'.

TIPS hotline

The 'Police Forward Look' paper produced in November 2006 described TIPS as:

> "… the UK's biggest success story, and one where we have delivered more than we promised. The scheme has developed beyond the original plan, a 'Crimestoppers'-style hotline, into a sophisticated intelligence system, including source cultivation."[650]

Former DCC Brand told the Inquiry:

> "Because we had British policemen in there, there was a huge uptake of people calling in, telling us about weapons and missiles and all sorts of things like that … It was so successful that one of the last things that Mr Kerik did before he left was to announce: 'It was so successful we are now handing it over to the Iraqis', and all the calls stopped. So we had to reinstitute, because we understood after a while that it was … the fact that people knew there were British police at the other end of the phone made for the calls to happen, and that was a really successful part of our small contribution."[651]

In his statement to the Inquiry, Former ACC Smith stated:

> "TIPS in Baghdad generated increasing 'actionable intelligence' for coalition and Iraqi Security Forces with reports averaging from 150 per week in early 2005 to over 400 per week by the end of that year … TIPS was one of the real successes of the UK work which … brought in a large volume of intelligence that undoubtedly saved many Iraqi and coalition lives."[652]

In his report dated August 2006, Former Chief Superintendent Barton stated that there were 14 ArmorGroup contractors working on the TIPS hotline.[653] He added:

> "The day-to-day successes (terrorist related arms finds, source development, target development) is extremely successful [sic] and receives accolades from coalition partners.
> "However, to date, whilst Iraqi staff man the telephones there is no Iraqi 'lead' and no Iraqi trainers."

A recently developed Basra TIPS line was described by Former Chief Superintendent Barton as "new and slow to start".

715. Five key areas were prioritised in DCC Smith's report:

- Training: Basic, Leadership and Developmental areas to be prioritised. Courses and regional, provincial or local training arranged;
- Police Support Infrastructure: at Police Headquarters level – Human Resources, Finance (and contracts), Communications, Logistics;

650 Paper BE Baghdad, November 2006, 'Police Forward Look'.
651 Public hearing, 29 June 2010, pages 98-99.
652 Statement, 25 June 2010, page 10.
653 Report Barton, August 2006, 'The window of opportunity'.

- Intelligence Capability: the Collections, Collation, Analysis, Action and Dissemination of Intelligence – criminal, terrorist and counter-insurgency;
- Operational Capability: Police to have effective Command and Control Systems with aim of Policy Primacy; Co-Ordination; Specialist Support SWAT [Special Weapons and Tactics] and TSU [Tactical Support Unit]; Criminal Investigation (inc. Forensic); and
- Public Support: Development of Police interaction with the Criminal Justice System (Courts, Prisons etc), Media and Public; Development of Public and Civil Accountability; Ability to remove corrupt and inefficient police officers through a robust, transparent and accountable Complaints System (Professional Standards)."[654]

716. The report also analysed the UK resource requirement to meet those priorities and sought to identify any gaps. DCC Smith commented that, while he knew how many UK personnel were currently working on policing in Iraq, he was:

> "… unsighted on … the overall 'staffing' allocation or budget for Iraq. There is no clear indication of the number of posts that are budgeted by the FCO either in Baghdad or Basra … This is not a personal failing on any department but reflects a sometimes unstructured approach."

717. In his statement to the Inquiry, Former ACC Smith wrote that, although those five areas became "the focus of successive plans", the strategy itself "did not become, in the long run, the driver in MND(SE)".[655] He wrote:

> "Why? Perhaps lack of adequate consultation and explanation with the military, possibly the changing situation on the ground or the military expectation that as the main provider of resources etc they had the better understanding of the issues. Attempts to support a strategic aim of 'developing an efficient, effective, credible and community-based accountable police service' rapidly became subsumed within military operational and logistical plans …
> "In the absence of an agreed strategy, plans were driven on the ground by successive six month military and staff rotations and changes in security and political expectations."

718. On 10 June, DFID commissioned a consultant to "assist the FCO in drawing together a cross-Whitehall strategy for UK support to the development of Iraqi policing capacity".[656] The Terms of Reference for the strategy stated that UK support needed "a more strategic focus" and that FCO's draft strategy now needed to be "expanded and amended by inputs from the various department specialists". The strategy should be completed by 17 June.

[656] Letter DFID [junior official] to [Consultant], 10 June 2005, 'Cross-Whitehall Strategy for UK support to Iraqi Policing'.

719. A junior DFID official emailed the FCO on 14 July to say that DFID felt that the strategy could not be agreed across Whitehall.[657] He wrote: "We see your paper as something that we have tried very hard to inform and influence, but have failed. It's way off something that we would wish to put our name to." He suggested that it was instead presented as an FCO-led document.

720. On the same day, Commander Simon Huntingdon, MOD, emailed the FCO to say that the MOD also did not feel the strategy represented an agreed FCO, DFID and MOD position on policing in Iraq.[658]

721. On 18 July, MOD, DFID and FCO officials met to discuss policing in Iraq.[659] They agreed that the strategy could not be viewed as "complete and usable" until additional information was sent by the British Embassy. The minutes recorded:

> "In the meantime, we should avoid giving the impression that policing was on track when the reality was that we did not know."

722. The group agreed that a background paper on the strategy should be submitted to senior officials on 22 July and possibly to Ministers afterwards. A second cross-departmental paper would be submitted by the end of August outlining the intended "end state" for the IPS, including "a route map of how to get there", an analysis of the risks (such as the sustainability of policing) and "an indication of the resources required". While the FCO accepted that it led policing activity in Iraq, it "stressed" the need for all relevant departments to agree the papers; there was a "shared responsibility for delivering policing".

723. Commenting on the draft background paper, an FCO junior official described policing as "the Cinderella of SSR".[660] The "reasons/factors" for that included:

- "The insurgency broke the original plan, but no-one was prepared to admit it."
- "The international policing community has not responded adequately to Iraq" – even the reduced figure of 1,500 (from 6,000) International Police Liaison Officers (IPLOs) had not been achieved.
- As the US was "the monopoly supplier of assets and people", its "military vision [had] prevailed".
- "The original vision of the Iraqi police force as a community based service is (and was) idealistic pie-in-the-sky. It does not fit with the culture or environment."
- The Iraqis were seeking to balance the police against the army to prevent a coup.

[660] Email FCO [junior official] to FCO [junior official], 21 July 2005, 'Background paper on police'.

724. The official wrote that the UK had:

- "over-promised and under-delivered";
- "sent the wrong people and not enough of them"; and
- "fixated on strategies that gather dust", gaining a reputation with the US "for procrastination rather than delivery".

725. The official wrote that there were "a lot of lessons to be learnt" and that the absence of Home Office officials from the addressee list "tells its own story".

726. On 7 August, a junior official from the British Embassy Office Basra circulated a draft of a policing transition paper.[661] He wrote that "the level of micro-management" had "at times almost beggared belief" but that the police team in Basra had remained committed to making it work "if only so the police here can get on with implementing it, rather than sitting around re-editing it all day!"

727. The final version of the document was circulated on 7 September and is discussed later in this Section.[662]

Training the IPS

Training for IPS officers took two forms:

- Basic Recruit Training was for personnel with no previous police or military experience. That took eight weeks, increasing to ten weeks in mid-2005.
- Transition Integration Programme was a three-week programme for personnel with previous police or military experience.[663] In July 2006, TIP training was offered to serving officers who had not been trained but had been serving for over a year.[664]

Training took place at the Jordan International Police Training College (JIPTC), the Baghdad Police College and seven smaller regional academies; including az-Zubayr near Basra.[665] By the end of 2006 all regional Iraqi Police academies had transitioned to Iraqi control.[666] Basic recruit training ceased at JIPTC at the end of February 2007.[667]

Leadership training began in 2006 with the Bagdad Police College running police officer commissioning courses.[668]

STRATEGIC CONFLICT ASSESSMENT AND SSR PROJECT REVIEW

728. In October 2004, DFID commissioned a Strategic Conflict Assessment (SCA), an analysis of conflict drivers in Iraq to help the UK Government identify conflict prevention and reduction opportunities.[672]

729. A draft version of the SCA (dated 27 December 2004) was circulated amongst officials on 2 March 2005.[673] The official circulating the document raised the need for an objective assessment of the SSR work being done to "ensure we are on track, are getting value for money, achieving aims" and making improvements where necessary. An email from a DFID junior official in response said that Mr Benn was in support of such a review.

730. At the Iraq GCPP Strategy meeting on 7 April, it was reported that the final SCA would be produced within a week and would feed into a revised GCPP Strategy for 2005/06.[674] In addition, the team conducting the SSR review would depart for Basra on 14 April and report in May. It would only focus on GCPP-funded activity.

731. The SCA's findings were discussed at the Iraq GCPP Strategy meeting on 28 April.[675] Concerns were raised about the quality of the report; amendments were necessary before it could be disseminated more widely. While the GCPP Strategy could draw on the SCA, it was not to be the only source used.

732. Minutes from a meeting about Iraq policing and SSR on 28 April reported that an SSR review team would be giving feedback on their findings at DFID on 9 May.[676] It would have "both positive and negative aspects".

733. The Government has been unable to provide any record of the SSR review team mission or of its conclusions, but understands that the views of the review team were expected to be incorporated into a report by DCC Smith examining the UK effort on policing in Iraq (described earlier in this Section).[677] The review also informed the revised GCPP Strategy.

734. Minutes of the Iraq GCPP Strategy meeting on 3 August recorded that a draft of the GCPP Strategy had been circulated but the final version still needed to be "drawn together".[678]

735. The objectives outlined in the GCPP Strategy for 2005/06 remained similar to those in 2004/05 but were re-ordered and re-worded to reflect their "condensed scope" and the shift in prioritisation.[679] They were:

- Build the capacity of the security sector to prevent and manage conflict, with special emphasis on police and prisons.
- Support government and civil society institutions in preventing and resolving conflict.
- Promote good relations between groups inside Iraq."

736. It was identified that the 2004/05 Strategy had "proved too ambitious in the worsening security context" and therefore 2005/06 objectives had been "narrowed down" to reflect the difficulties surrounding implementation. Some of the SCA's recommendations would not be taken forward at that time, such as the recommendation "for more support to the ISF in favour of the IPS". The Strategy stated that the MOD had a "large budget" for that purpose. The recommendations of the SSR review had been accepted in their entirety.

The Iraqi Transitional Government

737. On 24 March, Mr Straw sent his first report to Mr Blair on the AHMGI, which dealt with the first three meetings of the Group (described in more detail in Section 9.3).[680] On the political process Mr Straw wrote that messages to Iraqi contacts had emphasised "the importance of getting good people into the key security related Ministerial positions (Defence and Interior)" and of the "enormous damage that could be done to efforts at outreach by a significant renewal of the de-Ba'athification drive".

738. On 28 April, Prime Minister Designate Ibrahim al-Ja'afari presented the majority of his Cabinet to the Transitional National Assembly for ratification.[681] The new Minister of Interior was Mr Bayan Jabr and the new post of Minister of State for National Security was given to Mr Abdul Kareem Al-Anizi. Dr Sadoun Dulaimi was confirmed as the new Minister of Defence some days later.[682]

739. On 11 May, a JIC Assessment on the ISF stated:

> "There is no coherent Iraqi counter-insurgency strategy and the balance of responsibility between the MOD and MOI and other government departments is undefined."[683]

740. Mr Blair spoke to Prime Minister Ja'afari for the first time on 26 May and said that "we stood ready to help in any way we could", in particular on developing the ISF.[684]

741. On 3 August, a junior official in Baghdad emailed FCO officials and No.10 to inform them that Prime Minister Ja'afari would announce a 12-point security plan the following day.[685] The official described the intended announcement as "nothing particularly new", with the exception of a plan to co-ordinate intelligence, "neighbourhood watch", and a possible amnesty for political groups. The purpose of the plan was to structure activities that the government and MNF-I had been taking into measurable objectives with actions assigned to specific Ministers.

742. Following the announcement, the official told Mr Asquith that Prime Minister Ja'afari had been "ultra-cautious" and omitted "many of the details that were most interesting". He reported that the possible amnesty had been toned down to "national dialogue with those with whom a dialogue is possible".

743. The JIC reported on 12 October that:

> "The Iraqi Transitional Government (ITG) has failed to develop a coherent national security strategy. This will not change in the short time remaining before the December election. Nor will there be a significant increase of capacity in the security ministries or development of intelligence capability. The need to establish a new Iraqi administration following the elections means that we are likely to see little momentum in these critical areas over much of the next year."[686]

Police and judicial reform

744. At the Ministerial Committee on Defence and Overseas Policy - Iraq (DOP(I)) on 16 June, there was a discussion of progress on police and judicial reform within Iraq.[687] The following points were raised:

> "Having effective police would be one condition for achieving the successful drawdown of the coalition's military forces in Iraq.

> "The requirement in Iraq was for paramilitary style policing. A plan was now in place but it would take time to deliver. There was also a funding gap in the Global Conflict Prevention Pool that would need to be addressed."

745. On judicial reform, the minutes indicated that the discussion focused on the arrangements for the Iraqi Special Tribunal (IST) rather than on the wider criminal court system. The Committee agreed that the UK "needed to concentrate on seeing progress on the judicial process including the IST, and the police".

746. Mr Blair wrote to President Bush on 27 June, to share concerns raised with him by Ms Clwyd during her recent visit to Iraq.[688] On the IST, Mr Blair wrote:

> "Our people are already working together on plans to help build the capacity of the Iraq Special Tribunal. We are making some progress, but there is much still to be done. A credible IST process which delivers – and is seen to deliver – justice for the appalling crimes of the previous regime will have major political impact … We may need to make sure, however, that they do not rush to try the most serious cases before they are ready."

747. The discussion at DOP(I) on 7 July under the item "Progress on the Iraqi Special Tribunal (IST) and judicial issues" focused exclusively on the IST.[689]

Developing Iraq's intelligence organisations

In April 2004, the Iraqi National Intelligence Service (INIS) had been established (see Box, 'An Iraqi intelligence service', earlier in this Section).[690]

On 15 July 2004, Prime Minister Allawi announced the creation of a new intelligence organisation – the General Security Directorate – that reported to the IMOD.[691]

General Luck's Review in January 2005 assessed the intelligence structures as very weak and in need of a fundamental overhaul.[692]

In May 2005, the Criminal Intelligence Unit was established in Basra as part of an MOI project. It reported directly to the MOI and was structured similarly to the US FBI.[693]

The National Information and Intelligence Agency (NIIA) was re-named the National Information and Investigations Agency in September 2005.[694]

On 11 May 2005, the JIC assessed:

> "Iraqi intelligence organisations will be critical for success: they are developing but are still largely unproductive and unco-ordinated … Provincial and local structures are also emerging. A number of these are under the control of rival militias and political groups; some are Iranian financed. The degree to which these organisations are able – or willing – to be absorbed into a national structure is unclear. The tensions between the Ministers of Defence and Interior, and the addition of a new Ministry of State for National Security, will complicate the issue."[695]

On 12 October, the JIC assessed:

> "Some progress has been made, including establishing central co-ordinating mechanisms … There is some co-ordination between INIS and DGIS, but overall co-ordination remains poor. INIS is perceived by local politicians as run by the CIA; DGIS is making some progress but is undeveloped and under-resourced; and the MOI's relationship with other agencies remains difficult …"[696]

On 6 September 2007, a report from the Independent Commission on the Security Forces in Iraq stated:

> "The level of information sharing and cooperation between the Iraqi intelligence community and the Iraqi Security Forces is not satisfactory – a problem exacerbated by bureaucratic competition and distrust among duplicative intelligence organisations."[697]

The report advocated low technology solutions, describing Iraq as "principally a human intelligence theatre of operations" and commended the TIPS hotline set up by UK police officers (see Box, 'TIPS hotline', earlier in this Section).

Request for an "honest assessment"

748. On 21 July 2005, Mr Naworynsky forwarded to Mr Quarrey an update from Lieutenant General Robin Brims, now SBMR-I, on the ISF's progress.[698] Lt Gen Brims wrote:

- The Iraqi Army was "steadily building in confidence and competence" though units "were not yet able to conduct complex operations".
- The IPS was "lagging the Iraqi Army". Personnel were "of a doubtful quality" but plans were being implemented "to address these shortcomings". The "broad judgement" was that the IPS would "not fail when Multinational Forces step back, but we may be uneasy about their methods".
- The IMOD was "immature and struggling with implementation of its policies".

749. Mr Roger Cornish, MOD Deputy Director Iraq, wrote to Mr Ingram's Private Secretary on 10 August with a draft note on ISF capacity-building.[699] He wrote that, having read Lt Gen Brims' report, Mr Blair had asked for further advice, giving "greater clarity on ISF capacity-building. Specifically: exploring the detail beneath headline numbers; discussing the delivery of equipment and training; assessing the Iraqi command structure; and an honest assessment of the progress of Iraqiisation."

750. Dr John Reid became Defence Secretary in May 2005. Dr Reid sent Mr Cornish's note to Mr Blair on 28 August, advising that "numerically, generation of ISF remains on track, but significant development in key capability areas is still needed".[700] The problem areas were:

- the ability of IMOD forces to direct and sustain independent operations;
- equipment maintenance and effective command and control;
- IMOD's financial management, acquisition and logistics; and
- IPS's progress – its capability thought to be 12 months behind the Iraqi Army.

751. Dr Reid wrote that those issues were being addressed but that "with the focus on quantity rather than quality, this inevitably will take time". On the political control of the ISF by the Iraqi Government, he stated:

> "… the succession of short term 'power sharing' governments has not created the conditions for the generation of coherent policies … Armed militias are a reality and cannot be ignored; both the Kurds and Shia have them and their presence is implicit in the form of local militias to protect businesses mentioned in PM Ja'afari's twelve-point security statement. We must beware that the ISF we are creating does not migrate into yet more locally owned militias."

752. The IPS remained "riven with bribery, corruption, intimidation and politicisation" and Special Police Commandos had been "linked to human rights abuses and extra judicial killings". Dr Reid wrote:

> "Across Iraq, the Rule of Law is hampered by institutional fragility in the police and criminal justice system. Shortcomings in basic infrastructure, equipment, training and specialist capabilities such as forensics continue to limit IPS performance."

Progress on disbanding militias

A report to Congress in July 2005 stated that, under CPA Order No.91, nine militias were to be integrated into the ISF.[701] Of those nine, only the Kurdistan Democratic Party, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan Peshmergas and the Badr Organisation remained as "significant entities". The other six organisations had either disbanded or been "assigned to personal security details". JAM was not part of the integration process as it was viewed as a potential insurgent organisation rather than a militia. The report assessed:

> "The ITG and its predecessor have had some success in integrating militias into the ISF, but militia elements integrated into the ISF typically remain within pre-existing organisational structures and retain their original loyalties or affiliations."

The nature of the insurgency was discussed at the DOP(I) on 26 May.[702] Mr William Ehrman, Chairman of the JIC, said that it was looking likely that elements of JAM would be absorbed into the ISF. In discussion, concerns were raised about the Minister and the Ministry of Interior, with rumours that the MOI was sanctioning sectarian attacks.

A JIC Assessment on 12 October stated:

> "The issue of militias and their incorporation into the ISF has still not been resolved … In the absence of an effective local ISF, the MOD with MNF support has begun to recruit a Sunni tribal militia in Anbar province to help deal with AQ. In both Shia and Sunni areas of Baghdad there have been calls for local militias to be raised to improve security. We judge the perpetuation of militia forces, on ethnic, tribal, or political lines, carries significant risks for the future."[703]

753. Dr Reid's letter to the Prime Minister on 28 August 2005 made clear that the original timescale for the completion of the Petraeus Plan (mid-2006) was not achievable.[704] The number of trained and equipped IMOD forces was "just below 80,000" and would "reach full authorised strength (currently 106,000) in November 2006". MOI force numbers were "just over 95,000" and "should reach full strength (193,500) in 2007".

754. A JIC Assessment about the ISF on 12 October reported that the forces had "again expanded rapidly": the Iraqi Armed Forces stood at 91,000 personnel and MOI forces 106,000 personnel.[705] The JIC cautioned that those figures did not take account of absenteeism or "provide an indication of true capability". MNF planners foresaw a continued need for substantial MNF forces, capable of conducting combat operations, to support the ISF until the end of 2007, and for advisory teams at least until 2009. Assessing those targets, the JIC judged:

> "… the ISF and MNF together have been unable to contain the level of violence, which continues to grow. If the insurgency persists at anywhere near current levels, these timeframes will be unachievable, at least in Baghdad and the Sunni heartlands."

755. A report to Congress on 13 October stated that IMOD force generation was due to be complete by late 2006 and MOI force generation complete by August 2007.[706]

Assessing readiness for Provincial Iraqi Control

On 27 September 2005, an IPU official wrote to Mr Straw with details of the Joint Committee to Transfer Security Responsibility (JCTSR). The JCTSR had been established in July and tasked with establishing the conditions to permit transfer of security responsibility to the Iraqi civilian authorities.[707] Membership included the Iraqi Interior and Defence Ministers, the National Security Adviser, the UK and the US Ambassadors and the Commander and Deputy Commander of MNF-I.

The Committee published its conditions for transferring security responsibility to an Iraqi civilian authority on 10 October 2005.[708] Those fell into four categories for both urban and provincial areas:

- Threat assessment: MOI, IMOD, MNF-I and the National Intelligence Coordination Council (NICC) assess the threat from terrorist/insurgents as low, and steady or on a downward trend determined by the IMOD, MOI and MNF-I. For provincial areas, the threat to critical infrastructure and lines of communication should also be assessed as low.
- Iraqi Security Forces readiness: The IPS has capacity (at TRA level 2 [TRA levels are explained in Box, 'Provincial Iraqi Control']) to maintain domestic order and prevent the resurgence of terrorism. The Iraqi Army are able to respond to requests for assistance from the city and able to contain the insurgency in the provinces with appropriate support.
- Governance: The Governor must be capable of overseeing security operations in the urban area and province, as assessed by the IMOD, MOI, Ministry of Justice, the Ministry of Human Rights, the US Embassy and MNF-I. The PJCC must be operational and co-ordinating operations and there must be systems in place for detention, trial and incarceration under Iraqi law.
- Coalition forces: must maintain the capability to reinforce if ISF capabilities are exceeded; co-ordinate civil construction activities; provide support and force protection for Transition Teams; and retain freedom of movement and the capability to conduct counter-terrorism operations.

Corruption, infiltration and abuse

756. Despite improvements in size and performance of the ISF, concerns about corruption, infiltration and abuse continued to grow during 2005. The incident on 19 September at the Jameat Police Station in Basra is described later in this Section.

757. In its 12 October Assessment, the JIC reported that both the IMOD and the MOI were "dysfunctional, with their capacities developing very slowly if at all" and that neither could "administer their forces effectively".[709] Units were unpaid and unsupplied for significant periods and nepotism was ingrained.

758. The JIC repeated its warnings about the IPS, judging:

> "Elements of the ISF, primarily those under Ministry of Interior (MOI) control, are involved in sectarian violence. This is fuelling broader tensions across Iraq.
> "The Iraqi police are a particular concern. They often suffer from divided loyalties and a significant number are involved in criminality for financial gain. Their command and control mechanisms remain confused, as does the exact relationship between local police and the MOI in Baghdad."

759. The JIC reported that some senior Iraqi politicians viewed MOI paramilitary units as "a particular problem: they are seen as a Shia force and as perpetrating a campaign of violence against Sunnis".

760. On 25 October, Mr Blair and President Bush held a video conference between London, Washington and Baghdad.[710] Mr Straw and a number of officials and military officers were in attendance. They discussed Iraqiisation. Mr Blair said that the development of the police seemed to be lagging behind that of the army and asked what more could be done. He also asked how important were the Ministries of Interior and Defence. He was told that a major effort was required with the police in 2006 and that the Ministries were crucial. Lieutenant General Nicholas Houghton, SBMR-I from October 2005 to March 2006, said that the problem with the police was not limited to their quantity and quality; there was also an issue with the commitment to national goals. Strong national leadership was required at the political level.

761. In response to a question from President Bush about the situation in the South, Sir William Patey, British Ambassador to Iraq, stated that the political process had exposed deep divisions within the Shia and that those had impacted on local government. He warned of "local turf wars", declining consent for the MNF, and Iranian interference. He stated that the police were key and training efforts needed to be stepped up. Lt Gen Houghton said that the situation in the South remained much calmer than in other parts of the country. Progress had been made on SSR and the South might well be able to lead the process of security transition.

Responsibility for the security ministries moves to MNSTC-I

A report to Congress on 13 October 2005 stated that the US Embassy Iraq and MNF-I had "recently agreed" to assign responsibility for the Iraqi security ministries' development to MNSTC-I with effect from 1 October 2005.[711]

A paper produced by the MOD for DOP(I) on 15 November stated:

> "MNSTC-I has overall responsibility for providing assistance … to the IG [Iraqi Government] in the development of the MOD and MOI. This helps to generate some short-term capacity assistance; however, the UK must use its senior representation within this Command to help the Iraqis build indigenous capacity within the security sector. This can be achieved through full manning of agreed liaison posts throughout the IG and recognising the need for local participation and ownership at all stages of the capacity-building project."[712]

An eGram from Baghdad on 2 November reported that merging efforts on MOI reform "should combine IRMO civilian expertise with MNSTC-I military resources and manpower".[713] The "bedding-in process [was] still under way" and "some tension between the civilian element and the military" remained.

In his weekly report of 1 January 2006, DCC Smith stated that military personnel were gradually replacing police officers in key CPATT roles.[714] He cited the upcoming vacancy for a Senior IPLO Advisor post at CPATT as "a further opportunity for Senior UK influence" and that if the UK was to embed officers into CPATT, it was "essential" that it include a senior strategic position or the UK would "simply be providing more 'indians'". DCC Smith was "not convinced" that the US would allow the post to be taken by a "non-American". He described "a weakening morale among IPLO colleagues and … increased military encroachment".

A report to Congress on 26 May reported that MNSTC-I had awarded a contract to provide civilian experts to help build organisational capacity by working alongside Iraqi officials in the IMOD and MOI in February that year.[715]

An eGram was sent from Baghdad on 8 September about the development of the MOI and progress of the GCPP-funded project (as described earlier in this Section).[716] It said that a new structure for the MOI was "now more or less in place", although there were still insufficient systems in place to reduce corruption and staff had difficulties delegating tasks because they lacked the understanding about how responsibility should be matched with accountability and authority.

The eGram acknowledged that capacity-building was a long-term process but that "measurable progress" had been made. Collaboration with MNSTC-I had been "very good" and represented "an example of how civilian (DFID) and military (MNSTC-I) efforts can effectively complement each other".

THE JADIRIYAH BUNKER

762. On 13 November, the US military visited an MOI-controlled detention facility in Baghdad, known as the Jadiriyah bunker, to facilitate the release of a detainee.[717] Upon entering the facility they discovered "around 170 detainees" in an emaciated state. Instruments of torture, including belts, rubber hoses, electrical cable and truncheons were recovered and there was evidence of links to the Badr Corps militia.

763. The following day, Gen Casey and Mr David Satterfield, the US Deputy Chief of Mission, made a strong demarche[718] to Mr Jabr, and demanded both a full criminal investigation and a nationwide audit and inspection of MOI facilities conducted by Iraqi and US officials.

764. In the Chairman's brief for DOP(I) to be held on 15 November, Mr Blair was advised that Mr Patey should raise the issue "in the strongest terms" with Prime Minister Ja'afari and Mr Jabr.[719]

765. A note from an IPU official to Mr Straw on 22 November stated that Prime Minister Ja'afari had announced on 15 November that a full investigation into the matter would be held.[720]

766. The official advised Mr Straw that the Embassy had "first picked up suspicions about maltreatment" at the facility on 4 and 5 September in "an uncorroborated informant report to a police adviser". The Embassy's Senior Police Adviser had accompanied the US military to the location on 24 October but saw no evidence of abuse in the areas where he was allowed access. The official wrote that before follow-up action could be taken, the US had "stumbled" upon the mis-treated detainees.

767. There were indications that Mr Jabr had "been in direct contact with MOI operatives at the Bunker" and that there were "suspicions of other illegal detention centres". The media had reported Mr Jabr was "playing down the incident significantly".

768. The IPU would "instruct Baghdad to maintain pressure" on Prime Minister Ja'afari to address the issues.

769. Mr Straw issued a statement the same day, welcoming this decision and condemning illegal detention and torture.

770. On 27 November, The Observer published an article on human rights abuses in Iraq, based on an interview with Former Prime Minister Ayad Allawi.[721] It quoted him as saying:

> "The Ministry of the Interior is at the heart of the matter. I am not blaming the Minister himself, but the rank and file are behind the secret dungeons and some of the executions that are taking place."

771. The IPU was concerned that the investigation would slip in the run-up to elections, and advised Mr Straw on 2 December to reiterate the importance of its progress during a telephone call with Prime Minister Ja'afari.[722] The IPU had "received indications" that a representative on the investigation committee and an Iraqi Minister were "trying to whitewash the report". Concurrently, the IPU was considering with the US and the MOD "the possibility of taking direct MNF-I action" in other suspected locations of abuse.

772. The IPU raised concerns about the delay in the investigation again with Mr Straw on 7 December.[723] A note by a junior official advised Mr Straw to raise the matter with Dr Rice during their bilateral meeting that day. The note said that no action had been taken, other than two meetings of Deputy Prime Minister Rosch Shaway's committee.

773. As well as continuing to apply pressure for a report to be delivered, the official advised Mr Straw to suggest "snap inspections" of other locations, which ideally would be Iraqi-led, but could be led by MNF-I if necessary.

774. An eGram sent from the British Embassy on 17 January 2006 stated that there was "still no sign of any report".[724] Mr Shaway had spoken to the US on 16 January and had blamed the delay on Shia and Badr members appointed to the Commission by Prime Minister Ja'afari and difficulties in working around the election and local holidays. He had told the US that he intended to report in between 10 and 14 days.

775. The eGram also stated that:

- There had been three unannounced inspections of detention facilities by joint Iraqi/MNF-I forces. The US/MNF-I selected the sites but Iraqi officials led the investigations.
- Details had been provided about two of the inspections, one facility had 234 detainees claiming abuse (though mostly from previous facilities and not within the last two months), and the other held 13 detainees and was "of a fairly good standard".

- The US planned to conduct one unannounced search per week, starting the following week.
- The Judicial Commission was carrying out a separate investigation, and was working through the case files of every detainee in Jadiriyah.
- Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI)/Badr had begun to "push back" against accusations of detainee abuse.

776. In early 2006, the MOI began establishing an abuse complaint process system involving the Inspector General, Internal Affairs and a Public Affairs Office.[725] Detention was a particular cause of concern. The DoD's May 2006 Report to Congress stated:

> "Many human rights violations occur at detention centres because the centres have inadequate facilities. The centres have no places to shower, pray, or prepare food; plumbing and electrical systems are substandard. Furthermore, the police are not trained as jailers … To date the Joint Iraqi Inspection Committee, consisting of Iraqi Inspectors General from various ministries, supported by the US Embassy and MNF-I, has inspected seven facilities."

777. A junior official at the British Embassy Washington emailed IPU on 17 March with a summary of a meeting with US officials.[726] She noted that it had been agreed that the UK and US should confront Prime Minister Ja'afari about any efforts to suppress evidence from the Jadiriyah bunker report.

778. Dr Reid visited Iraq from 17 to 20 March.[727] A report of his visit from his Private Office on 21 March referred to a meeting with Mr Zalmay Khalilzad, the US Ambassador to Iraq, in which Dr Reid was told that the US investigation into the Jadiriyah facility had "concluded terrible abuses had taken place and that senior figures were likely to have been aware of them". A copy of the US investigation report had gone to Prime Minister Ja'afari but "nothing seemed to have come of it", although they said they had not "pushed that hard".

779. The minutes of DOP(I) on 30 March recorded that Dr Kim Howells, FCO Minister, had stated:

> "… the UK and the US had to press Ja'afari to publish an unexpurgated version of the report into abuse by the Ministry of Interior at the Jadiriyah bunker, and be ready to press the new Iraqi Government to take action against those responsible … Our legacy could not be to construct an edifice in Iraq based on human rights abuses."[728]

[728] Minutes, 30 March 2006, DOP(I) meeting.

780. Dr Reid, who chaired the meeting, concluded that it was "critical" to the UK's objectives that the Iraqi security forces were non-sectarian; officials "should work urgently on an action plan and messages for use with the US … and an incoming Iraqi Government".

781. On 20 April, an email from Mr Straw's Private Secretary to a junior FCO official stated that Ms Clwyd had raised the delayed publication of the Iraqi investigation's report with Mr Straw that morning: "She asked what we could do to force the publication of the report."[729]

782. A junior official in Baghdad relayed a telephone conversation between Ms Clwyd and Mr Patey.[730] Mr Patey said:

- Mr Shaways had passed Mr Patey a copy of the report on 19 April.
- The report was consistent with the US report but was "not as hard-hitting in implicating those involved".
- It had been sent to Prime Minister Ja'afari but was only signed by Mr Shaways (and not other members of the committee).
- There was no indication that it would be released or acted upon until a government was formed, after which recommendations could be made public.
- The report would not damage Mr Ja'afari but "would be seen as an attack on SCIRI".

783. Mr Patey also said that other work was in hand on detainee abuse: the bunker was closed, spot-inspections continued, and the UK was working to remove SCIRI's influence on the MOI. It wanted to stop the MOI running detention facilities in the longer term. Ms Clwyd "seemed broadly content with this explanation".

784. On 5 May 2006, Mrs Margaret Beckett became Foreign Secretary. On 9 June, an IPU official advised her that "serious abuse and torture", including of juveniles, had been discovered at another detention facility ("Site 4") on 30 May.[731] Mr Khalilzad had taken "swift action" with the newly elected Prime Minister, Mr Nuri al-Maliki, "pressing him to take public action" and to revisit the Jadiriyah bunker incident. Mr Al-Mailki's response was "positive"; he committed to establishing a committee to investigate the Site 4 incident.

785. On 19 September, an eGram from Mr Dominic Asquith, now British Ambassador to Iraq, reported that investigations into Jadiriyah and Site 4 abuse were still ongoing.[732] He had met Mr Hashim Al-Shibli, Iraqi Minister of Justice, the previous day, who had been "evasive about when prosecutions would happen". Mr Asquith had encouraged Mr Al-Shibli to push for unannounced inspections to be resumed, despite the Minister's resistance on the basis that security conditions made it difficult.

786. Mr Asquith considered Mr Al-Shibli "honest and aware of the problems", but that he had a "weak political base" and an "inability to confront effectively the powerful vested interests behind the MOI".

2006 as the "Year of the Police"

787. An eGram from an FCO official in Baghdad on 2 November 2005 reported that Gen Casey had designated 2006 as the "Year of the Police", recognising that "a national police force that can help enforce the Rule of Law [was] vital to any exit strategy".[733]

788. The official wrote that UK police officers were embedded within CPATT and providing a mentor to the Minister of Policing. The UK military had influential positions in CPATT and MNSTC-I. The official wrote that the US had indicated they wanted the UK to "do more" in discrete areas, such as forensics. They stated that another possibility was to embed a high-ranking police officer in CPATT to help direct strategic development but "the key remains the quality as well as the quantity of civilian staff we are able to deploy to Iraq".

789. Gen Walker visited Iraq from 22 to 23 November 2005.[734] He stated:

> "ISF development across Iraq is seen to be on track. For most, this includes the IPS (by design the IPS plan delivers more slowly than that for the Army)."

790. The MOD produced two papers for DOP(I) on 20 December.[735] The first was an update on progress of Iraqiisation. It stated:

- development of the Iraqi Army remained "on track" for the fully funded and trained figure of 130,000 by December 2006;
- the Iraqi Police were making an "increasingly significant contribution" but were behind the Iraqi Army in development terms;
- malign militia influence, incompetent personnel and weak national control were issues that needed to be addressed by the new government;
- the Department of Border Enforcement (DBE) was due to reach full strength by May 2006; and
- the Iraqi Navy was a "success story" that risked being undermined by the failure of IMOD to provide a suitable acquisition programme.

791. The second paper was entitled "Ensuring the Iraqis are Ready for a Handover of Security Responsibility". It highlighted two high level areas where there was cause for concern:

- the output of the Ministries – their ability to command, control and sustain their security forces, with control of the Chiefs of Police being a "major issue"; and
- the proper government control of the Ministries.

792. The paper stated that the coalition had "got what we resourced": an increasing number of officers on the ground but no overarching leadership and control from the Ministries to which they were responsible. Action in the first 100 days of government was seen as "essential". MNSTC-I was developing a plan on that basis, with a surge in resources:

> "… MOI advisers up from 76 to 113; MOD advisers up from 45 … to 103. It is envisaged that military, civilian and contractors will be used to fill civilian slots."

793. The paper made a number of recommendations, including that consideration should be given to increasing the number of UK security sector advisers (to "include some 'doers' in IMOD") and measures to strengthen government control including bolstering the MCNS.

794. The minutes of the meeting indicated that those recommendations were not explicitly addressed.[736]

795. On 23 December, Mr Blair sent a Note to President Bush.[737] On Iraqiisation, he wrote:

> "I was surprised people were more upbeat than I expected (and most important the ordinary soldiers working alongside Iraqis). The two clear messages were: the vital nature of leadership of the MOI and MOD; and 2006 being the year of the police. There may also be equipment issues with the military and the police."

796. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Gen Sir Nicholas Houghton said:

> "It is quite difficult to compartmentalise the aspiration and the optimism of late 2005 … the realities of the true state of the police were more dawning realities, as we moved into 2006, where some of the … problems about death squads, torture dens, the degree of militia infiltration of police, both nationally and locally in Basra, became more evident, and I think that probably it was the policing issue that lay on the critical path to most of the conditionality for effective transition.
> "… 2006 was to be the year of the police, so it is not as if we were not aware of the fact that this was the critical problem.

"But I think that the degree of the problem, just recalling another sense of the time, is that we could pour significant resource into … training the police and in the quantity of their generation but we never had the ability to command their loyalty at a local level or a national level.

"This is where you probably get into the dark business of the degree to which police loyalties were affected by political loyalties, links to criminality and corruption, and I don't think that we had a full understanding of that at the back end of 2005. That was more revealed to us incrementally, as 2006 ensued."[738]

797. In his weekly report of 1 January 2006, DCC Smith wrote about the "Year of the Police": "… the strap line that 'just enough is good enough' is, whilst probably realistic, not particularly encouraging". He wrote that it could be "a defining factor in the development of an effective Iraqi Police Service".[739]

The Iraqi border police

The Department of Border Enforcement (DBE) was established in 2003.[740] A report to Congress on 7 March 2008 described the DBE as having two key missions:

- Ports of Entry (POE) policing to ensure the smooth transition of legal goods and persons; and
- to interdict illegal traffic – including smuggling and movement of terrorists and foreign fighters – within and between POE.

Securing Iraq's border was a considerable task – in total Iraq has 2,268 miles of land border and 36 miles of coastline.[741]

In June 2004, Maj Gen Houghton described the DBE as "successfully … reconstituted with over 19,000 Iraqis now in roles as border police, customs officers, immigration officers and nationality and passport officers".[742]

The first border police graduated in September 2004, after receiving training in Jordan.[743]

AM Torpy visited Iraq from 13 to 19 February 2005.[744] On DBE, he commented:

> "The DBE in MND(SE) has advanced considerably since my last visit and are now an effective force, with a good system of refurbished forts along the Iranian, Kuwaiti and Saudi borders."

798. DCC Smith completed his tour of Iraq in April 2006.[746] He described a number of difficulties experienced during his tour in his end of mission report, including:

- lack of an agreed, resourced strategy: "There was not a shortage of … plans … What has been lacking for three years is a will and an organisational capability to develop, and act upon, such a strategy";
- confusion over command of various personnel involved in policing: "Even the Review conducted by Sir Ronnie Flanagan [HM Chief Inspector of Constabulary; the Review is described later in this Section] … failed to provide a clear statement", with the security situation making a military lead inevitable in 2006; and
- prioritisation of scarce resources: he highlighted a number of areas where the UK could have played a significant role but were unable to resource initiatives either through funding or appropriate personnel.

The rise in sectarianism

799. Elections were held in December 2005 but it was not until May 2006 that the Iraqi Government was formed (see Section 9.4). As the period of time taken to form a new government extended, British military commanders in Iraq observed an increase in violence.[747]

800. A report to Congress on 30 November 2006 stated that Sunni and Shia "death squads" were responsible for the significant increase in sectarian violence in Iraq.[748] Those were defined as "armed groups that conduct extra-judicial killings; formed from terrorists, militias, illegal armed groups, and – in some cases – elements of the ISF".

801. During his visit to Baghdad in March 2006, Dr Reid had raised the role of the militia with a number of interlocutors.[749] Mr Sa'adoun al-Dulaimi, Iraqi Minister for Defence, reported that he felt under pressure to incorporate sectarian militias into the IMOD, noting that "the Ministry of the Interior seemed completely open to the integration of militias". Mr Jabr commented that "too many old regime staff had been brought back in" and "could not simply be removed".

802. A JIC Assessment on sectarianism in Iraq on 5 April stated:

> "The MNF and Iraqi security forces (ISF) have been able to constrain only some of the violence. After the Samarra mosque bombing, MNF reporting indicated the Iraqi Army proved effective in many areas, deploying in numbers to protect both Sunni and Shia mosques. Some local police units also performed well, although the Ministry of the Interior (MOI) itself was sluggish in its response. The imposition of a curfew and a large security force presence probably deterred some violence. But the picture is patchy: in some Shia areas of Baghdad, militias were allowed free rein.
> "The most focused and disciplined anti-Sunni campaign is being run by SCIRI's Badr organisation. Since the formation of the interim government, SCIRI has systematically embedded Badr members and units into the state security structures, particularly the MOI where they control intelligence and some paramilitary units. Forces under the control of the Ministry of Defence, with its close ties to MNF, have proved less penetrable …"[750]

803. On 20 April, Lt Gen Fry, now SBMR-I, was asked by Mr Blair to give DOP(I) his assessment of the capacity of the Iraqi Army and police, and what impact the new government would have.[751] He stated that progress with the army was relatively positive, but progress with the police was less good; the "weakness and sectarian bias of the Ministry of Interior" had "exacerbated" problems. He judged that "the key challenge … remained to bring in the Sunnis".

804. In discussion at DOP(I) the following points were raised:

- the UK should not underestimate the sectarian character of the ISF, the new government would need to tackle this issue actively; and
- the UK had to be realistic about how possible it would be to develop non-sectarian forces at that stage in Iraq's development.

SSR in the South: summer 2004 to summer 2006

805. On 15 July 2004, the FCO produced a paper considering the options for the commitment of UK police officers in southern Iraq after handover of sovereignty to the IIG.[752] The FCO recommended maintaining current staffing levels until mid-2005, which could mean extending ArmorGroup's contract and a further roulement[753] of UK police trainers. That would recognise "that SSR remains a main effort for the UK" and mirrored current MNSTC-I and CPATT projections on the completion of IPS training. The paper noted that "the UK would have a diminishing influence if we were to withdraw before IPS training was complete".

[753] A roulement is the deployment of forces, especially for short periods of duty.

806. On 29 August, Lt Gen McColl reported that Prime Minister Allawi had decided to appoint an Iraqi Military Commander for southern Iraq – initially for Basra and Maysan.[754] The Military Commander would have command of all the ISF in the area and be answerable to a committee in Baghdad, made up of the Prime Minister and the Ministers of the Interior and Defence. Lt Gen McColl's view was that there was "plenty of scope for friction" between the local Military Commander's HQ and those of the GOC MND(SE), now Major General William Rollo, who was reported to be concerned about the introduction of "another layer of approval and consultation before forces can be deployed".

807. On 2 September, Maj Gen Rollo reported that Prime Minister Allawi was considering the appointment of General Rachash as Military Commander of the South-East. Maj Gen Rollo had concerns about Gen Rachash's views on the need to consult provincial Governors and the lack of legal basis for his appointment.[755]

Security restrictions on UK police officers

On 26 September 2004, a report from Mr Robert Davies, Chief Police Adviser to the MOI, stated that the FCO's Overseas Security Adviser had directed UK police staff not to travel in Snatch Land Rovers because of inadequate armour (see Section 14.1).[756] Mr Davies wrote:

> "This direction places a significant limitation on the deployment of our staff. The role of mentors requires them to be able to travel frequently to see their chiefs of police. The essence of their role and indeed, the role of the International Police Advisers, needs them to go to the stations. The appropriate protection could be provided by a team from the Control Risk Group, but there are insufficient numbers to meet our requirement."

In March 2005, DCC Smith wrote to Mr Stuart Innes, British Consul General Basra, about travel and movement protection in Basra.[757] He raised concerns that UK police officers were subject to an "inflexible and restrictive" policy that was "likely to hamper the conduct of work in the next 12 months". In particular, UK police officers could only travel overland by vehicle if accompanied by a team of bodyguards. That was during daylight hours only and with 24 hours' notice. However, ArmorGroup and Dyncorp officers were able to travel by military vehicles, unaccompanied and without such tight restrictions.

DCC Smith stated that, as the policing effort moved from classroom-based training to mentoring and monitoring at IPS stations, officers would need more flexible travel arrangements. He recommended that UK police officers should have the option, with additional training if required, to operate on the same basis as the International Police Advisers (IPAs). He also suggested supplying UK police officer secondees with enhanced weapons, also with additional training.

CC Kernaghan visited Iraq from 12 to 17 May 2005 and wrote a report of his findings on 25 May to Mr Charles Clarke, the Home Secretary, and Mr Chris Fox, President of ACPO.[758] The first part of this visit was spent investigating the role of UK police officers with Sir Ronnie Flanagan, HM Chief Inspector of Constabulary, CC Hugh Orde, Chief Constable of PSNI, and Mr Colin Cramphorn, Chief Constable of West Yorkshire.

In his report, CC Kernaghan endorsed the use of armoured vehicles within military convoys for police officer secondees, but considered enhanced weaponry "a step too far". He cautioned against treating police officers who had served in Northern Ireland differently from those without this background, noting that this "could be interpreted as … placing a lesser value on their safety and treating them as de facto cannon fodder".

On 24 October, Major General James Dutton, GOC MND(SE) from June 2005 until December 2005, wrote that "clarity" in the contractual obligations of UK police officers and ArmorGroup personnel was needed.[759] In addition:

> "…we will need to resolve the issue of movement restrictions on the CivPol and ArmorGroup personnel. There appear to be different transport restrictions placed upon civil servants employed by MOD to those working for the FCO and their contractors, CivPol and ArmorGroup (although there are even differences between them). The principal problem is that the FCO and their contractors are not permitted to travel in military vehicles."

On 11 November, CC Kernaghan emailed a junior official in the Home Office following a report from DCC Smith that stated Maj Gen Dutton wished to assume control of police and ArmorGroup assets, and see police personnel travel in Snatch vehicles.[760] Maj Gen Dutton had reportedly suggested he would review the relevant contracts of employment to enable the latter.

CC Kernaghan wrote that it was important that the arrangements for police officers were not considered in isolation from those of other deployed civilians and emphasised his expectation that he should be consulted on any move to change the command and control arrangements for deployed police officers, not presented with a "fait accompli".

Acting Commander Kevin Hurley, Chief Police Adviser in Basra, June 2004 to December 2004, told the Inquiry of the challenges of trying to effect police training and mentoring while being unable to travel:

> "Security conditions made road travel almost impossible … We were all but ineffective for most of our time. Ultimately … we reached a stage whereby if we could not get a helicopter ride we did not move."[761]

In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lieutenant General Jonathan Riley, GOC MND(SE) from November 2004 to June 2005, said that the "chief difficulty" of the FCO rather than the military leading police work was the restrictions placed on civilian personnel meant that he could not guarantee that the mentoring of police was done "to the depth, to the degree, to the duration that it had to be".[762] That meant that he had to "fill that gap using soldiers and military police so that instead of partnering my military forces with Iraqi military forces only, which would have been the ideal situation, I also had to partner them closely in many cases with the Iraqi police to fill that void".

Lt Gen Riley said that he had discussed that difficulty with colleagues many times but the rules for civilian personnel were fixed; "So it became a given".

The arrangements for civilian personnel are described in Section 15.1.

A decline in security

808. On 18 August 2004, a Current Intelligence Group (CIG) Assessment stated:

> "Little is being done in Basra by the security forces to stop a minority of Mahdi Army militants causing disruption. The police chief is in league with the militants and elements of the Iraqi police were involved in the kidnapping of the British journalist [Mr James Brandon, subsequently released – see Section 9.3]. A report suggests the Amara police chief has agreed not to interfere in the activities of the Mahdi Army in the city, but this is due to police concern at their own vulnerability rather than support for al-Sadr."[763]

809. In his letter to Mr Fergusson on 20 August (as detailed earlier in this Section), Mr Phillipson wrote that the Prime Minister considered "problems with the police chief in Basra" as one of the "real risk[s] to our objectives".[764]

810. The IPU's paper entitled "Iraq: Next Steps", produced on 27 August, stated that the Chief of Police in Basra was "co-operating with the Sadrists" but did not suggest a way of addressing that, or of addressing the issue of divided loyalties more widely.[765]

811. Two days later Mr Blair produced a minute to No.10 staff which stated:

> "… we cannot have a situation as in Basra where the police chief is working with Sadr's people."[766]

812. On 3 September, the CIG reported that a senior Badr organisation official had been appointed as Basra Governor and that he intended to remove the Basra Police Chief.[767]

813. On 11 November, the JIC reported that the Police Chief had been "sacked".[768]

814. On 26 September, Mr Davies reported that 38 ArmorGroup mentors had deployed to Basra.[769] Their roles included: three personnel in Maysan developing a criminal intelligence database and mentoring the Tactical Support Unit (TSU); five personnel based at the az-Zubayr Police Academy providing training for the TSU; and the bulk of the remaining staff engaged in mentoring and developing the investigative capability of the Basra investigators.

815. That deployment had been planned for June 2004, but on 11 June Mr Straw was advised by a junior official that the deployment should be delayed from June to September because of a decline in security in southern Iraq.[770] An additional factor was that the type of mentoring they were contracted for would be "of little value until the Iraqi police ha[d] undergone more specialist skills training".

816. Minutes from an SSR meeting on 7 October reported that ArmorGroup had all police mentors operating in various locations across MND(SE).[771] The contract was due for renewal at the end of November 2004 but it was likely that a proposal for an extension would be submitted based on the positive feedback received.

817. A six-month extension of the contract was agreed at the Iraq GCPP Strategy meeting on 7 January 2005.[772] The Committee agreed that the ArmorGroup contract for 68 mentors costing £4.8m should have "specific reporting procedures, including monitoring and evaluation" with a "clearer work plan". The project would be reviewed again after six months.

818. On 12 October, an email from a junior FCO official confirmed that 12 US IPAs had been deployed to MND(SE) in late September: six to the Sector and District Command, two to the traffic unit, two to the forensic unit and two to the TSU.[773]

819. On 14 October, Mr Simon Collis, British Consul General in Basra, wrote to the FCO in London stating: "we need help in the form of more senior police officers, flexible security rules for their deployment, less nationalist policies on behalf of MNF contributors and more specialist trainers and equipment."[774] He also highlighted limited co-ordination between civilian and military structures in MND(SE).

820. Lt Gen Rollo, who left MND(SE) in November, told the Inquiry that:

> "Not all the Iraqis were ineffective. We focused on getting relatively small numbers of them to a relatively good standard."[775]

821. Commenting on how to raise effective forces, Lt Gen Rollo said:

> "… the answer to more forces ultimately was more Iraqis, and the real trick was to raise effective Iraqi forces, and that the way to do that was to take relatively small numbers and to try to instil into them a sense of loyalty to the state, which was really quite difficult to achieve … So loyalties were fragile and depended on human contact."[776]

The Iraqi Navy

A US report from the Independent Commission on the ISF, published on 6 September 2007, explained that Iraq's coastline was very small but strategically significant.[777] It included the al-Basra and the Khor al-Amaya oil terminals (responsible for 90 percent of Iraq's revenue) and Iraq's only deep water port, Umm Qasr. The maritime borders with Iran and Kuwait were contested and not clearly demarcated.

The Iraqi Navy reported through the Joint Headquarters to the IMOD.[778]

A paper produced by the MOD on 9 December 2009 stated that "the notable UK contribution" during Phase IV was the development of the New Iraqi Navy, led by the Royal Navy at Umm Qasr.[779] The Royal Navy also trained the Iraqi Coast Guard, which operated in close proximity to the Iraqi Navy but reported to the MOI.[780]

On 1 February 2005, a junior MOD official advised Mr Hoon that 49 personnel were deployed in Navy Advisory Support Teams (ASTs), including force protection.[781]

The Chief of the Naval Staff visited Iraq in July and observed that recruiting and training of the Marine force was almost complete and subject to the procurement of suitable support vessels they should be able to resume responsibility for the security of oil platforms later in the year.[782] He noted problems with funding but stated: "our AST and the Iraqi Navy have done well … I am content that we have reached the stage where the AST can start to draw down provided it is adequately supported by MND(SE)".

In the same month Lt Gen Brims described the development of the Iraqi Navy as "a significant UK success".[783] recent assessment of all UK government staff in Iraq had determined that "the prisons contribution" was vital. Risk assessments were being conducted at military locations to enable the deployment of prisons mentors to the provinces. Support to the prisons effort was being maintained by the RMP.

823. On 20 January 2005, minutes of the SSR meeting recorded that the prisons programme had been extended for a further six months and the Prison Service had confirmed they would provide officers for phase two. A UK criminal justice adviser had also been deployed.[785]

824. On 9 August, the IPU submitted an initial bid for the prison programme to receive funding until 31 March 2006.[786] The bid stated that since it had begun in May 2004, the programme had:

- trained every prison officer in MND(SE);
- established a training school for the Iraqi Correctional Service (ICS);
- developed a corps of Iraqi trainers;
- built and established a new prison in Basra that would "become a model prison for Iraq"; and
- "substantially improved conditions and treatment of prisoners" in each other prison in the region.

825. The bid was for funding to continue supporting prisons advisers, to help to increase the capability of the ICS and to complete the ongoing infrastructure projects.

826. In describing the effects of the programme, the IPU cited Iraq's "dreadful human rights record" in prisons and stated that the first two phases of the programme had "already dramatically transformed the functioning of the prisons in MND(SE) both by improving the physical conditions in which prisoners are kept, and changing attitudes amongst staff". Continuing work would build on that, particularly in respect of female and juvenile prisoners.

827. On 15 August, Mr Collis sent a telegram to the FCO reporting allegations of "systematic abuse" at al-Maqil prison in Basra.[787] The allegations, made by an Iraqi prison officer, included the sexual abuse of a female prisoner and the payment of bribes to avoid beatings and facilitate visits by relatives. The prison officer claimed that one-quarter of the prison staff was involved, including at a senior level.

828. Mr Stephen Fradley, the British Senior Prison Adviser, had raised the concerns with the Regional Director of the Iraqi Correctional Service, who subsequently spoke to the Prison Governor. The Governor said that an investigation had been undertaken and that he was satisfied there had been no abuse. The Regional Director had concluded that no further action was necessary.

829. Mr Collis was considering how to ensure that a proper investigation was carried out. He had referred the matter to the ICRC and waited to hear whether they would investigate. Plans were in place on how to press the issue if the ICRC were denied access.

830. On 26 October, Baroness Symons, Minister of State for the Middle East, International Security, Consular and Personal Affairs at the Foreign Office, wrote to Mr Straw about a meeting she had held with Mr Bakhtiar Amin, the Iraqi Minister of Human Rights, the previous evening.[788] Mr Amin had expressed concerns over the current conditions in Iraqi prisons and said that he would be "most interested" in help on rehabilitation programmes and prison monitoring.

831. On 6 February 2005, a telegram from Baghdad sought an indication of whether further funding would be available to develop the prison inspectors' training programme in Basra.[789] Reporting on a meeting between Mr Andrew Hood, Legal Adviser, and Mr Amin, it stated that Mr Amin was positive about the training prison inspectors had received and that he would like all this to be available to all inspectors. Speaking to Mr Hood, Mr Amin requested further assistance: "he had sufficient funds to employ more prison inspectors if there was sufficient capacity to train them".

832. A bid for additional funding to extend the prisons programme was submitted on 17 August.[790] The bid mentioned co-ordinating MND(SE) activity with the US programmes elsewhere in Iraq, but did not specify supporting the extension of the Basra training programme outside southern Iraq.

UK equipment for the Iraqi Security Forces: Project OSIRIS

833. At the AHMGI on 28 October, Mr Paul Boateng, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury informed Mr Blair that, of the US$107m worth of equipment requested by the MOD to speed up Iraqiisation in MND(SE), US$29m would be funded by the US, the remaining US$78m/£40.6m could be funded by the Treasury from the Reserve on a "one-off" basis.[791] That was in addition to the US$4.5m/£2.5m GCPP-funded ISF equipment purchase agreed in September.

834. On 24 November, a junior official in the MOD submitted a draft departmental minute to Mr Hoon to be laid before Parliament for the first tranche of ISF equipment

(detailed further below).[792] The press lines annexed to the document explained that Prime Minister Allawi had "made a direct call for assistance to No.10":

> "The Prime Minister is keen to assist, not least as the speedy Iraqiisation of the security sector is a key strategic aim of the UK and will ultimately facilitate our own withdrawal."

835. Between November 2004 and July 2005, equipment was delivered to the ISF in four tranches through "Project OSIRIS". Over that period, minutes from MOD officials to the Defence Secretary detailed what would be provided in each tranche:

- Tranche one for £15m was approved in early December and focused on items that could be procured quickly through existing contracts, such as small arms, ammunition, public order and urban operations equipment as well as seven infrastructure projects.[793]
- Tranche two for £3.6m was approved in mid-December and comprised grenade launchers, pistols, radios and ammunition. That was to be procured through both new and existing contracts.[794]
- Tranche three for £6.2m was approved in late January and consisted of three batches of equipment covering protective vehicles, search equipment for DBE and machine guns.[795]
- Approval for tranche four covering the remaining £15.6m was not sought until 18 July "because of the need to align expenditure plans with the planning for operational transition" and "changing US expenditure plans". It included infrastructure projects, vehicles and communications equipment.[796]

836. Parliamentary approval was sought for the first three tranches but the obligation to give Parliament 14 days to raise any objections to gifting[797] the items was reduced to two days with Treasury approval. Tranche four was approved by the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee (PAC), who had authority to grant approval, given the imminence of Parliamentary recess.

837. On 18 July, a junior MOD official wrote to Dr Reid, stating that the Chairman of the PAC had "expressed dissatisfaction with the shortcuts we took to gaining parliamentary approval" for the first three tranches and that "a couple of backbench MPs" had objected.[798] The official considered the final tranche "less likely" to generate objections because it did "not contain any weapons" but:

> "We will need to explain why we have again been unable to allow Parliament to consider this gifting as fully as some MPs might wish."

838. The official wrote that an additional £58m was likely to be needed for the year ahead: £38m for OSIRIS II (protected and other mobility, infrastructure construction for forces training, communications, logistics and command and control functions) and £20m for a Civil Effects Fund. He recommended that Dr Reid propose that expenditure to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, now Mr Des Browne. He also noted that Project OSIRIS had "been an understated success story" that should be highlighted in the presentation plan for operational transition.

839. As advised, Dr Reid wrote to Mr Browne on 19 July stating that the additional £58m was "central to the success of our plans".[799]

November Force Level Review

Air Marshal Glenn Torpy, Chief of Joint Operations, wrote to General Sir Michael Walker, CDS, on 10 November 2004 about the interim Force Level Review conducted for Operation TELIC (see Section 14.1).[800] AM Torpy stated that the training, mentoring and monitoring of the NIA and ING was one of three emerging tasks from the review. All three tasks were discretionary for the UK but not for MNF-I and if other Troop Contributing Nations did not undertake them, they could fall to the UK.

AM Torpy wrote that the new tasks could be conducted by a battalion plus senior mentors, "possibly of one-star rank", and work was under way to confirm the requirement. He had agreed with Lt Gen Rollo that the work should be delayed until after the election. AM Torpy advised that "for force generation purposes we should assume that this is a new – potentially enduring" task.

Mr Roger Cornish, MOD Deputy Director Iraq, wrote to Mr Hoon about the review on 19 November.[801] He reiterated AM Torpy's assessment of the training task, assessing that the force package needed to undertake it would be 650 personnel in total.

Mr Naworynsky replied to Mr Cornish on 24 November, stating that Mr Hoon had noted the emerging tasks.[802]

Police reform

840. On 5 November 2004, Mr David Hayward, FCO Military Liaison Officer, sent a teleletter to Mr Tom Dodd, Deputy Consul General in Basra, in reply to "a number of problems" Mr Dodd had raised about policing in the South.[803] On the provision of UK police officers, Mr Hayward wrote that:

- Mr Hugh Orde, Chief Constable of PSNI, had confirmed his commitment of six Chief Inspectors for Iraq.
- CC Orde would extend the current PSNI officer deployments until replacements were available.
- Nineteen junior officers in az-Zubayr would end their tour in December but 14 officers were trained and ready to replace them. They were looking to recruit others and had a small reserve capacity of trained officers that could be deployed if necessary.
- GCPP's funding for 40 IPAs had been extended by one month and a bid to extend it for a further six months would be submitted.

841. A second phase of the ArmorGroup contract was agreed in early 2005. It extended and expanded the deployment to 68 personnel, including five forensic experts.[804]

842. On 12 January 2005, Major General Jonathon Riley, GOC MND(SE) from November 2004 until June 2005, reported:

> "Although the work of the International Police Advisers is much trumpeted, the reality falls well short of perception. Responsibilities for various areas of police reform are unclear, and as a result, progress is lagging behind that of the military."[805]

843. Acting DCC Colin Smith arrived in Iraq in January 2005 as part of General Luck's Review team. In his statement to the Inquiry, ACC Smith wrote:

> "On arrival … there appeared to be a number of competing plans including SSR with police training at az-Zubayr and in Basra, Maysan and Al Muthanna and that ubiquitous term 'mentoring'. Civilian contractors, funded by the UK, largely worked under their own direction and command structure. The only apparent link to any pan-Iraq coalition Strategy was through the US International Police Liaison Officers."[806]

844. DCC Smith wrote that "an attempt was made to develop … an integrated '12 month IPS Development Strategy' … 12 months being seen … as the likely duration of UK training in Iraq". The plan acknowledged that the military should play a key role in 'generic' policing areas such as infrastructure, equipment and non-specialist training. Police officers would be left to concentrate on enhancing specialist capability.

New Chief of Police for Basra

In his update on 12 January, Maj Gen Riley reported that a new Chief of Police for Basra, Major General al-Saad Hassan, had been appointed by the MOI.[807]

A telegram from Mr Collis on 21 January reported that (now General) Hassan had removed a Badr officer from his post as Head of Police Intelligence, and whilst allowing him to remain Head of Internal Affairs, ordered Internal Affairs to stop carrying out arrests or search operations following a number of suspicious deaths involving the unit.[808] Mr Collis saw this as "a welcome example" of the new Chief of Police "making his mark".

Considering whether to embed personnel in Iraqi units

845. The US began embedding MNF personnel in Iraqi units in January 2005.[809]

846. In his 19 January update, Maj Gen Riley reported on a conference he had attended in Baghdad about the future of the MNF's mission.[810] Referring to the emphasis on Military Assistance Teams (MATs) and Civil Police Assistance Teams (CPATs),[811] he wrote:

> "… this is the direction we have taken in MND(SE). The MNF leadership will not impose a template, but … [allow] local conditions to determine how the assistance teams are to operate. This suits us very well."

847. On 21 January, Mr Phillipson sent a letter to Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary about a meeting between Mr Blair, Mr Hoon and Gen Walker on Iraq strategy that morning.[812] In discussing Iraqiisation and delays to the Petraeus Plan, Gen Walker referred to MATs and CPATs as the "latest US plan" but added "this was not the answer".

848. At the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 2 February, it was observed that there were differences between the UK and US implementation of MATs, but they "were unlikely to be an issue".[813] The CPAT concept was "not favoured by the UK". There is no record of the rationale for that view in the minutes.

849. On 11 February, AM Torpy produced a paper on SSR for Gen Walker ahead of the latter's visit to Washington on 15 February.[814] In the paper, AM Torpy outlined two options being considered to support MNF-I's focus on assistance teams:

- Full support ("the MNF-I default"): MATs placed with every ISF unit in MND(SE) (excluding the police), and at training schools, requiring 324 personnel.
- Targeted support: "continuation of current partnering arrangements with ISF units" targeted at "areas of weakness, such as formation headquarters, training schools and logistic bases", requiring 110 personnel. MATs would not be involved with the Public Order Battalions or the DBE units.

850. AM Torpy wrote that the UK's emphasis had been on "partnering" and there were currently no UK personnel embedded within Iraqi units. In introducing the options, he stated:

> "Given MOD guidance to avoid a significant increase in commitment, our scope to implement this SSR strategy will be constrained by our ability to free up and refocus manpower."

851. The resource implications of both options were to be assessed by a US Joint Force Headquarter team deploying to Iraq the following week. It was anticipated that "coalition partners" would offer "significant contributions" once briefed by the US at a Bucharest Conference in February. That briefing would also "provide further clarity, thereby allowing the UK to refine its potential contribution".

852. AM Torpy visited Iraq from 13 to 19 February.[815] He reported:

> "[Gen] Casey is entirely comfortable with the UK's approach in MND(SE); indeed, he has told his commanders to visit MND(SE) to see how we handle the task."

853. Major General Peter Wall, Deputy Chief of Joint Operations, attended the CENTCOM conference on 28 February. He reported that the US approach to embed trainers at division, brigade and battalion level (and also with Special Police and Border Enforcement units) would have "implications" for the UK's "current policy".[816] He would discuss with Maj Gen Houghton and Mr Howard.

854. On 11 March, AM Torpy produced a paper for the Chiefs of Staff on delivering SSR in MND(SE).[817] There was no specific reference to his 11 February paper, but the plan he set out for MTTs[818] was consistent with the "Targeted Support" option proposed in that earlier paper.

[818] 'MTTs' were formerly referred to as 'MATs'.

855. The Chiefs discussed AM Torpy's SSR paper on 16 March.[819] The minutes record:

> "The continuous burden of manning MTTs and STTTs [Short Term Training Teams], and its potential impact on the requirement for augmentees was highlighted. DCJO(Ops) [Maj Gen Wall] indicated that the majority of posts would be filled from current force levels and that the requirement for UK augmentees was not expected to exceed 20."

856. On 17 March, Mr Hoon's Private Secretary wrote to No.10 to provide an update on SSR progress.[820] On the creation of MTTs he stated:

> "MNF-I plan to have Military Transition Teams (MTTs) established across Iraq and working with Iraqi units by June. In MND(SE) we expect to have MTTs established by May. The MTTs will train and mentor their affiliated Iraqi units, remaining with them both in barracks and on security duties. In MND(SE) the MTT organisation will be developed from the existing partnership arrangements between coalition and ISF units, which first highlighted the benefits of this approach."

857. The MOD's Directorate of Operational Capability considered the differing approaches to mentoring the ISF undertaken by the UK and US militaries in 2010.[821] It commented:

> "The UK and US approaches were fundamentally at odds; this was identified by those in theatre at the time and reported back … The decision not to embed mentors … may seem perplexing, particularly considering UK troops in Afghanistan were embedding in this manner at that time …
> "We have pondered the reasons for this approach, without reaching an entirely satisfactory conclusion. During interview a number of people have suggested that this very different approach to embedding mentors between two UK theatres of operation, as well as the difference between the UK and US approaches in Iraq, was that senior politicians (or perhaps military leaders) in the UK were risk-, and in particular, casualty-averse. Whether this is true, and if so whether it can be seen as a result of the different way in which the two theatres were viewed by the British public – Iraq as an unpopular "war of choice", with Afghanistan a "war of necessity" – is unclear. What is certain is that, at the time, the total number and rate of casualties being experienced in Afghanistan were both far lower than had been suffered in Iraq. We might reasonably conclude that this would have had an effect on the political-military discussions and decisions regarding embedding and force protection. This seems especially likely as the focus in Iraq became predominantly on reducing troop numbers in order to hand over to the Iraqi Security Forces, allowing the UK forces to withdraw and focus on [Afghanistan]."

The US approach to Transition Teams

A Report to Congress on 29 August 2006 stated that "more than 160" Police Transition Teams (PTTs) were helping to develop the IPS.[822] International Police Liaison Officers (IPLOs) were integrated into PTTs, providing expertise in all technical aspects of criminal investigation and police station management. The Report stated that an additional five (US) Military Police companies were deployed in July 2006 to bolster the PTT programme.

The next Report on 30 November stated there were 177 PTTs, each team with 11-15 members: three or four IPLOs, hired as contractors from US State Department and the rest typically military personnel (often Military Police).[823]

A Report to Congress on 2 March 2007 stated that there were a total of around 6,000 international advisers in more than 450 Transition Teams.[824] The Transition Teams were established in the following proportions:

- 200 Police Transition Teams;
- 40 National Police Transition Teams;
- 30 Border Transition Teams;
- 170 Military Transition Teams; and
- Transition Teams in various ministries and command establishments including the MOI, IMOD and the JHQ.[825]

Even with the extra personnel, shortages of PTTs were limiting observation of the IPS in 13 of the 18 provinces, including Basra and Maysan.[826] The DoD's Report to Congress in March 2007 cited cost and risk to personnel as the reasons for limited coverage.[827]

Concerns about strategy

858. In his weekly update on 2 February 2005, Maj Gen Riley wrote:

> "IPS reform is a problem wider and deeper than the Army, and the incoming Chief Police Adviser will be key to turning them into an effective counter insurgency force … there is a proposal to send the new Chief Police Adviser to Baghdad instead of here … I would advise against this in the strongest possible terms: this will lead to a delay of months (probably) in police reform here, months that we do not need. UK can have the greatest effect here on the ground …"[828]

859. On 17 March, Lt Gen Fry produced a paper for the Chiefs of Staff examining the consequences of "the UK's MND(SE)-centric strategy" and the likelihood that ISF development in MND(SE) would progress faster than elsewhere in Iraq.[829] The Chiefs were briefed that the eventual move to provincial control would be based on "complex, inter-dependent conditions" that were not fully defined and would depend upon the development of a national security framework and that, although military SSR activity in MND(SE) was progressing well, the scope for significant military disengagement in 2005 would be limited. Military SSR was expected to be completed in MND(SE) in March 2006.

860. Lt Gen Fry highlighted that non-military Iraqi capabilities, especially the IPS, were lagging behind the Iraqi Army and stated:

> "This imbalance must be redressed not only to ward against an overly dominant IA [Iraqi Army], but also to allow us to realise the potential military dividend of our efforts with the IA."

861. Lt Gen Fry suggested that the UK needed to:

- influence the development of a national policing strategy;
- encourage greater international involvement, particularly for gendarmerie-type training;
- develop IPS leadership and niche capabilities; and
- develop an effective judiciary and prison system to support IPS activity.

862. Lt Gen Fry stated that the FCO was planning to address some of those shortfalls but that those plans required "significant extra funding and depend largely on the availability of suitable senior UK policemen". MOD activity to support IPS development at that stage comprised:

- basic skills training;
- training of TSUs (to focus on public order, dangerous criminality and low level insurgent action); and
- the provision of military officers to support planning and co-ordination at the Provincial Joint Operations Centres (PJOCs).

863. Lt Gen Fry identified three risks to ISF development in MND(SE) progressing ahead of national development:

- The ISF in MND(SE) would not mesh into national Iraqi security structures.
- The ISF would become autonomous and "prone to tribal, political and confessional influences rather than national control".
- There may be a lack of national logistical, equipment, procurement and maintenance structures for them to access.

864. Lt Gen Fry suggested that those risks could be mitigated, to some extent, by UK advisers in Iraq's security Ministries seeking to accelerate the development on coherent national policies and structures and that where possible the UK "should seek to achieve a demonstrable vanguard effect by spreading UK 'best practice' in the development of ISF to other areas in Iraq".

865. On 24 March, Dr Roger Hutton, MOD Director Joint Commitments, provided an update to Mr Hoon on discussion of Lt Gen Fry's paper by the Chiefs of Staff.[830] The update gave further detail on how the UK military would support that new approach in MND(SE), to include:

- the provision of MTTs at divisional and brigade level (there were four Iraqi Army brigades in MND(SE); it was envisaged that the UK would provide MTTs for two of them and the Australians and Italians would provide one MTT each for the other two brigades);
- two Short Term Training Team deployments, one in June and one in December to look at the effectiveness of training; and
- continued "partnership" with the UK brigade partnering the divisional headquarters of 10th Division and a coalition battlegroup working with each of the four brigades in the 10th Division.

866. Dr Hutton advised that there would be a requirement of only 25 extra troops to implement this approach.

10th Division

The 10th Division was the Iraqi Army division in MND(SE) that had been trained by UK personnel. It was established by Maj Gen Riley as reported in his update on Southern Iraq on 12 January 2005. He wrote that he had established the 10th Division alongside HQ MND(SE) at the Basra Air Station.[831]

867. Gen Jackson visited Iraq from 17 to 20 April 2005.[832] On his return he reported:

> "… military SSR continues to progress well and the provision of Military Transition Teams (MiTTs) should provide a qualitative boost to ISF performance … Overall, GOC MND(SE) remains confident that his military SSR efforts will be complete in Maysan and Al Muthanna circa October 2005; and in Basra and Dhi Qar circa March 2006."

868. On the IPS, Gen Jackson wrote:

> "In contrast to the satisfactory progress with the development of the Iraqi Army, the lack of discernable progress with the IPS is alarming … It could become our Achilles heel because without an effective IPS, not to mention a criminal justice system – there can be no Rule of Law, a pre-requisite for our eventual military disengagement. The scale and quality of International Police Adviser effort is woeful and the arrival of the new Senior Police Adviser has failed to re-invigorate IPS development. Although theoretically the military is acting in support of the IPA, we find ourselves de facto > in the lead without appropriate funding and resources … We must be prepared, however, to make some difficult decisions across Whitehall including, perhaps, transferring leadership for IPS reform from the FCO to the MOD and subsequently restricting IPA effort to developing certain IPS specialist functions. There is further concern, which I share, that the UK model of policing is not necessarily the most appropriate for the Iraqis. A gendarmerie model might be more suitable."

Restructuring SSR

869. Mr Stuart Innes, British Consul General Basra, sent an eGram on 3 May 2005 reporting a meeting he had held with Maj Gen Riley and DCC Smith a day earlier.[833] Mr Innes stated that Maj Gen Riley had "said that SSR was now the main focus of the UK's military efforts in MND(SE)" and that the IPS programme required greater attention if responsibility for security was to be handed to the ISF by October.

870. On 5 May 2005, Maj Gen Wall wrote to Lt Gen Fry about the 2 May meeting, stating that the FCO's eGram provided "a partial explanation of the proposed way ahead" which was "open to misinterpretation".[834] On the increase of military support he wrote:

> "The lead for police reform remains with the FCO. The military continue to fulfil a supporting and co-ordination role with greater planning responsibility.
> "No additional UK military resources are required, and none will be 'fixed' if there is an opportunity to reduce force levels … Nor does it require resources being redirected from existing tasks.
> "Military assistance to the Iraqi Army will remain the Division's main effort; support to the IPS is a lower priority."

871. DCC Smith became the UK Chief Police Adviser in Iraq in May 2005, a role that combined the two previous Senior Police Adviser positions in Baghdad and Basra. He told the Inquiry:

> "… part of my remit to go to Baghdad was to increase UK influence at a strategic level, which had for different reasons … dropped off since the time that [DCC] Doug Brand was there."[835]

872. On 15 May, DCC Smith produced a report of his review of UK policing support to the development of the IPS.[836] His report described UK efforts in both Baghdad and Basra; those recommendations relating to policing in Baghdad are discussed earlier in this Section. DCC Smith wrote that he had appointed two Deputies at the rank of Chief Superintendent; one based in Baghdad, the other in Basra. The team in Baghdad was also strengthened from around 10 to just under 20.

873. The review included a 12-month policing strategy, which DCC Smith identified as a priority for the three provinces to implement. DCC Smith wrote that it had received wide circulation and consultation "with all stakeholders" and particularly with Iraqi Chiefs of Police. The paper stated:

> "It will concentrate on areas that have 'Iraqi buy in', are achievable within 12 months and importantly, sustainable (by the Iraqis) beyond 12 months."

874. He described the operational implementation priorities in MND(SE) as focusing on two key areas:

- implementation of the "12 month IPS Development Strategy and Plan"; and
- further strengthening the Regional Police Training Academy at az-Zubayr to enable it to train the Iraqi trainers who would, in due course, be responsible for police training.

875. DCC Smith stated that Gen Petraeus had taken the decision to put the 20 CPATT International Police Liaison Officers in MND(SE) under the command of Maj Gen Riley, a move which DCC Smith described as:

> "… at best misguided and at worst a major difficulty. GOC MND(SE) now has his own private US Police Advisers!! It is clear that at the senior level in Baghdad the US Authorities have not been made aware that we have done things more professionally in MND(SE) with senior serving CivPol Officers leading on IPS Development."

876. DCC Smith stressed the importance of extending the ArmorGroup contract, noting that police officers "cannot meet the major priorities without ArmorGroup support". He identified a number of other opportunities to increase available resources, including:

- seeking input from the Commonwealth and EU;
- identifying police officers currently serving in the Territorial Army in MND(SE) and attaching them to joint military/police teams; and
- better recruitment of recently retired police officers, particularly from Northern Ireland.

877. DCC Smith concluded:

> "We have failed in the past through lack of appropriate succession planning … Substantial effort has been put into driving UK effort forward in both Basra and, more recently, Baghdad … We must not allow … poor communication with, and within, the UK to diminish this drive. [The police] have many critics in Iraq in the … military. We must not fail."

878. CC Kernaghan's visit report on 25 May stated:

> "… progress has been made in training Iraqi Police Service personnel. However, with the exception of groups such as the Tactical Support Unit they remain of questionable quality. The initial concept of creating a community policing force on the classic Anglo-American model appears to have been overtaken by a more realistic recognition, that first and foremost a police force must be effective if it is to secure public support. Thus in the face of an insurgency, it is essential that the force can defend itself and its police stations. This has improved but philosophical confusion still appears to bedevil the project … I am still of the view that there is a disconnect between CPATT [Baghdad] and the British led effort within MND(SE)."[837]

Should the UK focus be on Baghdad or the South?

On 4 July 2005, the record of the Iraq Senior Officials Group stated:

> "The work of our international policing adviser in Baghdad was being hampered by the scale of the US presence and the difficulty of securing buy-in from the Minister of the Interior. An emerging conclusion was that we should concentrate our effort on MND(SE), moving our adviser there and away from the national policing strategy. This would be consonant with our broader policy, but could risk sending the signal that we were concerned only with the South-East."[838]

879. On 19 May, Dr Reid briefed Cabinet that he had "been encouraged" by the progress in building up the ISF and that he hoped it would be possible for the ISF to take over from UK forces in MND(SE) in "the course of the next year".[839] He stated that progress with the Iraqi police was "less advanced" and that the border forces were the "least capable".

880. On 5 June, Maj Gen Riley produced a post-tour report.[840] On SSR he wrote:

> "A good plan is now in place for the expansion of the Iraqi Army … The barrack building plan is properly resourced and is delivering. The training and recruiting plans are in place … Equipment is going well … I remain concerned about the ability of the IA chain of command to issue orders and ensure compliance with those orders.

and equipment husbandry … This leaves the Civil Police and IPAs with: criminal intelligence … serious crime investigation … forensic investigation, [and] tactical support units and SWAT teams.

"Looking to the future, the original model, which failed in Bosnia and Kosovo, and was failing here, must never be used again. Great Britain must only step forward to take the lead on police reform if our policing model is appropriate to the problem … Beat Bobbies from Hampshire, and even RUC men, concerned with human rights and traffic violations, are of limited use to a paramilitary police force fighting an insurgency … In the future, we should have the courage to decline the lead where it is inappropriate for us … Only professionals – whether soldiers or policemen – can produce professionals."

881. In DCC Smith's six-month update on 20 November, he wrote:

"My greatest concern for the future is co-ordination with the military … Senior UK Military have almost totally failed to acknowledge the equivalent seniority of their Civilian colleagues. In the UK … we are used to working as part of multi-discipline teams comprising civil servants, military, professionals from private and public sector. That is what we have become used to. I think the UK Police dot [sic] it well with style and expertise.

"I sincerely hope that will develop in MND(SE). We must move away from comments made by … [Maj Gen Riley] … to a true partnership."[841]

Raising concerns with the Iraqis

882. On 28 April 2005, a junior IPU official sent a note to Mr Asquith and Baroness Symons highlighting serious concerns about the links between the Iraqi police and the Shia militia, particularly in southern Iraq.[842] There was an increasing picture of "systematic collusion between the Basra Police Intelligence Unit (within the IPS) and Shiite militias to interrogate, torture and murder Sunni prisoners, particularly suspected Ba'athists". Specifically, the Police Intelligence Unit (PIU)[843] based at the Jameat police station in Basra was suspected of abusing and killing an Iraqi criminal detainee, Mr Abbas Allawi.

883. The junior official sent advice to Dr Kim Howells, FCO Minister, on 18 May, recommending that the UK continued providing assistance to the IPS but "at the same time taking strong and urgent action" with the IPS and MOI to stop abuse and torture.[844] They would recommend a partial or complete withdrawal of support if the Iraqis were not co-operative.

884. The advice said that the "Iraqis have promised action". The Basra Governor had agreed to establish an investigation committee following "strong pressure" from Mr Chaplin and Mr Innes. It was not clear whether the Governor and Maj Gen Hassan were willing to prosecute any officers if found guilty. The official added:

> "It is even less clear that they will take firm action on the wider issues of abuse that appear to be inherent in some Iraqi police detention facilities, notably that of the PIU."

885. Dr Howells' Assistant Private Secretary responded to IPU on 19 May.[845] He agreed the recommendation and asked for "firm, decisive and urgent action". He also requested that IPU raise the issue with the US administration (to "exert pressure on the Iraqis"), and brief Ms Clwyd (to raise it "at a senior level on her visit to Iraq next week").

886. Dr Howells subsequently visited Baghdad from 13 to 15 September. He met Mr Jabr and raised concerns about human rights abuses by the ISF, pressing for independent investigations.[846] Mr Patey handed Mr Jabr a dossier on three members of the ISF in Basra who were implicated in abuses and requested their dismissal.

887. In his weekly report on 22 May, DCC Smith wrote that he had attended a "police to police meeting" on 18 May with Maj Gen Hassan, senior CPATT IPLOs and senior ArmorGroup Advisers.[847] Maj Gen Hassan was "pushed very firmly" to take action against the PIU and "a range of options were put to him to assist in rooting out the problem". It was still hoped that he, with the backing of MOI, would "take action".

888. On 23 May, a junior MOD official briefed Dr Reid that FCO and MOD officials had made "strong representations" to Iraqi authorities in Baghdad and Basra for thorough investigations.[848] UK forces had "minimised" their contact with the PIU and reduced joint detention operations with the Iraqi police to those deemed essential. The official wrote that, while the recent reports were "serious and disturbing", they were "largely limited to a small element of the IPS in one province, Basra".

889. Dr Reid noted this briefing on 24 May.[849]

890. Major General James Dutton was GOC MND(SE) from June 2005 until December 2005. In his first report on 15 June he noted:

> "… political pressure to clean up the Police Intelligence Unit (PIU) in Basra is having some impact. For example, moves seem to be afoot to reform practices in the Jameat [the police station where the PIU was based] through a new overseeing judge and a new head of internal affairs. We also hear rumours that the PIU may be subsumed into a larger MOI intelligence organisation."[850]

891. A junior official in Baghdad emailed the IPU on 14 June to report that Mr Patey had met Mr Jabr that day and raised Mr Abbas Allawi's case.[851] He had "stressed that support from the top was needed to ensure that there was meaningful investigation – it was necessary to embolden General Hassan". Mr Jabr was supportive of action being taken against the suspects and had established the investigation commission but pointed out that it was the British who had chosen the police in the South.

892. Mr Fraser Wheeler, Deputy Consul General in Basra, emailed FCO officials on 15 June to report a mix-up over who was the investigating judge on Mr Abbas Allawi's case.[852] He wrote:

> "I do not put this down to incompetence (though there is clearly some of that too) but to deliberate obfuscation. We are being passed from pillar to post, and the Allawi case is not receiving the treatment and attention a case of this nature deserves."

893. On 16 June, Mr Wheeler and the Justice Sector Adviser met a senior judge in Basra to discuss Mr Abbas Allawi's case.[853] In his record of the meeting, Mr Wheeler reported that the case had been passed between four judges so far. It was important that a police station without Jameat links conduct the investigation, but the branch had officers in many stations. The Basra Judicial Committee would appoint an investigating judge on 19 June.

894. Mr Wheeler wrote that, although there had been an autopsy and arrest warrants had been issued for four suspects, none had been arrested because "no-one dare arrest them". The judge had "commented that the judiciary is not afraid but is hampered by a lack of support from the police who do not effect judicial orders". Mr Wheeler wrote that this was "hard to accept" given the reluctance to deal with the case.

895. An email from a junior official in IPU on 17 June reported that General Hassan had "been fired".[854] There was concern over the impact that could have on progressing Mr Abbas Allawi's case and that those responsible may view General Hassan's removal as "proof that they are untouchable".

896. Mr Straw raised the issue with Mr Jabr in the margins of the Iraq Conference in Brussels on 22 June.[855] Mr Jabr agreed with the importance of investigating the case and said that a team had already travelled to Basra to do so. He said that "the problem was that the policemen responsible had been appointed well before he assumed office".

897. On 4 July, Mr Innes emailed Mr Paul Fox, Head of IPU, to report that the PIU had been disbanded and the Department of Internal Affairs (DIA) purged. Around 290 of the 560 officers from the PIU and the DIA had been transferred to the new Criminal Intelligence Unit (CIU), a unit established a few weeks earlier as part of an MOI project to establish an "FBI style organisation" with branches around the country.

898. Mr Innes raised further concerns that the former head of the DIA, who had been sacked in January, had been appointed by the MOI to command the CIU.[856] Mr Innes summarised:

> "So, where does all that leave us? I think we can take a good deal of credit for provoking the dismemberment of the PIU and the DIA. The old rings have been broken, and the practice of systemic abuse has been disrupted. There has been a real shake-up in personnel and command. According to intelligence and eye-witness reports, the Jameat has indeed turned over a new leaf … The fact remains however that bad men are still at large; of the three officers we named in our earlier lobbying of MOI, two are now in the new CIU and the third … is still in the DIA. We will continue to urge their arrest, investigation, and prosecution – though we need to accept that the political and tribal constraints on this actually happening are considerable. Their sacking from the IPS would at least send an important signal, and we may have to settle for that."

899. On 17 July, DCC Smith reported that the PIU's closure had left 100 incomplete cases that were now being reviewed by the Serious Crimes Unit (SCU).[857] There was also the release of a number of detainees because there was "no evidence against them in the case files". A Ministry of Health team had visited the Jameat on 13 July to carry out medical checks on all detainees and a routine of daily visits had been put in place.

900. DCC Smith wrote that details about the CIU's structure were "conflicting" but it appeared to have "approximately 350 staff". It was directed from Baghdad to act as an intelligence-gathering agency without powers to make arrests, though DCC Smith observed that this direction was unlikely to be followed. He commented that "the Governor and Chief of Police currently refuse to work with the CIU and their remit and responsibilities are unclear". A former head of the CIU had made "currently unsubstantiated allegations" that the CIU was being funded by officers taking bribes to release detainees and that the CIU were using force to beat confessions out of prisoners.

901. On Mr Abbas Allawi's case, DCC Smith reported that a second meeting of the investigation team had been held and one of the suspects had been arrested. Two new suspects had been identified but it was "unlikely" they would be arrested without MOI support because of the "instability" it would cause. A representative from the UN would be taking the matter to the Minister for Human Rights and Baghdad to "add more pressure for action to be taken".

902. Mr Fox visited Iraq from 17 to 21 July.[858] He reported that progress was being made on policing, stating he "left Iraq believing the overall picture to be positive". He explained that DCC Smith was creating a link between the strategic and operational levels and recommended he took on the role of adviser to the Deputy Minister of the Interior responsible for policing.

903. When in Basra, Mr Fox had requested details from personnel on achievements against the 12-month plan and on the next steps. Mr Fox's report made no mention of concern about corruption, infiltration or abuse.

904. Mr Fox described the GCPP-funded prisons project in MND(SE), where eight UK trainers had trained 250 prison staff, as having "established an independent detention monitoring team" and worked closely with the US "to spread best practice elsewhere" as a "good example of a small-scale, low cost (£1.9m) project delivering outcomes far greater than the inputs".

905. On 22 July, a junior IPU official briefed Dr Howells that reports suggested that abuse by the Iraqi police was much more widespread. Pressure should be maintained on the Iraqi authorities to tackle the issue.[859]

906. The official wrote that Mr Abbas Allawi's case had "shown that our policy of engagement and strong lobbying can work" and "the alternative - to disengage and cease co-operation – would only give abusers a free rein to continue abuse unmonitored".

907. The official advised that the UK should continue to lobby both in Iraq and internationally, should ensure that abuse was on the agenda at weekly meetings in Baghdad, and should push for a strong Iraqi Human Rights Minister. He also stated that there was a need to increase police human rights awareness to overcome an "inherited ethos of abuse and stifle any tendency towards sectarian victimisation". UK forces had reviewed their procedures for transferring detainees to Iraqi custody and were in the process of introducing further guidance on protecting detainees' human rights but there was no specific evidence that the police with whom MNF-I in MND(SE) engaged were abusing detainees.

908. On 29 July, a junior official from the MOD submitted a similar briefing to the Private Office of a Parliamentary Under Secretary for Defence.[860] The official wrote:

> "It has become increasingly clear … that abuse in the Iraqi Security Forces may be far more widespread than the specific incidents of which we are aware suggest, with reports now beginning to reach the media. This raises two issues: what should be done to address human rights abuses in Iraq – FCO are leading on this area; and the nature of our wider involvement with the IPS?"

909. The official described work under way on tackling abuse and added:

> "Although instances of abuse by the IPS are ultimately a matter for the Iraqi Government, our involvement in the training of the IPS … means that we may be judged by the media and others to be culpable. Legally, we may also be at risk if our involvement could be judged as directly assisting units that systematically torture detainees."

910. In his weekly report on 28 August, DCC Smith highlighted that the CIU's name was likely to be changed to the National Information and Investigation Agency: "The Iraqis are not 'keen' on either 'intelligence' or 'criminal' in the name."[861] He wrote that a number of officers previously involved in corrupt or criminal behaviour remained members of the CIU and that the unit's training could not begin until they were removed by the MOI. There had been no progress in investigating Mr Abbas Allawi's case.

On 16 June 2005, Dr Reid advised his colleagues in DOP(I) that:

> "… considerable progress had been made on the development of the Iraqi Security Forces. 165,000 were now trained. There could be a drawdown in British troop numbers starting at the beginning of 2006 … culminating in the middle of that year."[862]

On 20 July, Dr Reid presented a paper to DOP(I) on transition in Iraq.[863] The paper suggested that handover in Maysan and Muthanna would occur from March 2006, with Basra slightly later in July 2006 (no specific date was given for Dhi Qar). "Handover" would see Iraqis assuming security control of their province. The paper described the ISF in MND(SE) as "fragile and untested" but made no reference to issues of loyalty, corruption or abuse by ISF personnel. The failure to deliver an effective ISF and wider criminal justice capability was seen as one of two key risks to transition (the other being a deterioration in the security situation).

DOP(I) agreed Dr Reid's proposed approach on 21 July.[864]

UK equipment for the Iraqi Security Forces: Project OSIRIS II

911. In Dr Hutton's update to Mr Hoon of 24 March (described earlier in this Section), Dr Hutton warned of risks that other aspects of SSR were lagging behind the Iraqi Army and of a requirement for further funding since there were "constraints on GCPP funding for existing policing projects beyond the next six months, and no identified resources for additional policing effort".[865]

912. Dr Hutton advised that SSR required the "sufficient and appropriate investment of UK financial resources". Work was under way to develop a coherent plan for the financial year 2005/06 which would form the basis of a request to Treasury for support from the Reserve. The plan was to be aligned with other government departments and sources of funding from others, including the US.

913. On 29 April, a Force Level Review by the MOD recommended an increase of 535 personnel to "resource properly the Security Sector Reform (SSR) task" which was where the "main effort" lay.[866] Of the 27 military sub-units (each of around 100 personnel) that would be in MND(SE) following the troop rotation, only four were to be fully dedicated to SSR and a further 12 available would provide some input when their primary tasks allowed.

914. On 15 June, an official in PJHQ wrote to Dr Reid to highlight ongoing discussions with Treasury for an additional £38m[867] to fund a successor programme to Project OSIRIS.[868] The bulk of expenditure would be spent on mobility and the remainder on ISF training infrastructure, communications, logistics and command and control functions. The Treasury had taken "a close interest" and was keen to ensure that there was "no duplication" with funding allocated to the FCO and DFID.

915. The official in PJHQ wrote that Project OSIRIS had been "a success". The 10th Division could "deploy battalions with all four of their rifle companies correctly armed and equipped" and had improved communications equipment. The IPS, who "bear the brunt of the violence in the region", were correctly armed, wore body armour and were able to communicate at a local level when on duty. The border police were also armed correctly and had basic communications equipment.

916. Dr Reid responded on 23 June, acknowledging that expenditure on SSR and military-led reconstruction had been judged as a success and confirming that he was content for negotiations with the Treasury for the additional funding to be pursued.[869]

917. Mr Des Browne, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, wrote to Dr Reid on 23 August, approving £16m from the Reserve for the package of vehicles, infrastructure and communications equipment that had been presented by MOD officials.[870] Of the future, he wrote:

> "Looking ahead, I hope that it will be possible for you to find other means of funding the remaining elements – either by negotiating with Baghdad, for a larger share of what is available (it is striking that MND(SE) provinces are right at the bottom of the priority list for ISF funding from Baghdad despite being among the best candidates for early transition to ISF control), or by encouraging our allies – most of whom are spending far less than we are in maintaining forces on the ground – to play a bigger role."

918. On 30 November, Dr Reid wrote to Mr Browne again, explaining that the MOD had secured funding from MNSTC-I for infrastructure projects valued at £15m and from Australia, Italy and Japan for other projects.[871] The MOD reduced its request to £19.6m for 734 IPS vehicles and for 11 ISF infrastructure projects. Dr Reid stated that the additional funds he was seeking were "on the critical path to enable the transfer of lead responsibility for security to the ISF within the timescales we have been discussing in DOP-I".

919. Mr Browne wrote to Dr Reid on 20 December, approving an additional £19.6m from the Reserve for 734 patrol vehicles and 11 major infrastructure projects.[872] That was "on the basis that they continue to meet the ISF's highest priority needs and that funding from alternative sources does not become available".

920. Mr Browne added that the delay to commencing withdrawal from Muthanna and Maysan was "regrettable, particularly when the military advice is that there is no overwhelming security need to postpone our withdrawal". He asked to be kept informed of the resource implications.

921. On 21 December, AM Torpy wrote to Lt Gen Fry to highlight key issues for 2006 (as described earlier in this Section).[873] On SSR resourcing, AM Torpy stated:

> "The best efforts of our staff are being hampered by the speed of decisions that were designed for a different era."

Legacy in the South

922. Lt Gen Dutton told the Inquiry that, on his arrival in June, "the priority was definitely Security Sector Reform".[874] He said that the UK was optimistic about progress in the South-East:

> "I can remember being told actually, in my briefings in the MOD, that my job was to go there for six months and make sure nothing went wrong because things were going right, you know, just keep the thing ticking over and we will be okay."

923. He said that the priority of SSR was skewed "massively" by the increased security threat shortly after he arrived which meant that more resource had to be devoted to force protection.

924. At the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 13 July, CJO briefed that, of the planned total of IPS officers, 58 percent had now been recruited and trained.[875] Reports suggested that Maj Gen Dutton was encouraged by the progress made.

925. On 26 August 2005, the IPU produced a discussion paper on what MND(SE) should look like in autumn 2006.[876] The objective for "security/Rule of Law" was:

> "Security forces (including police) which can provide sufficient law and order to avert descent into full-blown criminality and chaos, and which owe their allegiance to the state and local administrations, with tribal and militia allegiances managed."

926. The IPU noted that local political parties were inserting their followers into the IPS and that there were reports of assassinations, abductions, torture, intimidation and corruption.

927. The IPU then posed a number of suggestions and questions that needed to be addressed. Alongside lobbying various politicians and securing convictions of corrupt police officers, the IPU asked:

- How far do we go in reaching out to Shia militiamen … Is it fruitless to give support to a Chief of Police who has no militia links?
- Working a dialogue on 'transfer of responsibility, not irresponsibility', into the work of the Committee to Transfer Security Responsibility in Baghdad without inadvertently including a nebulous target and further conditions the Iraqis cannot hope to meet.
- A cultural shift (on, eg, abuse, corruption) will take years. Are we prepared to commit mentors and advisers for years to come?"

Crime and power in Basra

Mr James Tansley took over as Consul General in Basra in September and sent a telegram to FCO colleagues with his first impressions on 31 October.[878] He described Basra as "a city whose social, political and economic structures had largely decayed". The political scene had been "dominated by rivalry between Sadrists and Baristas" and differences between the two groups had grown in the last two years, flaring up into "open confrontation".

Mr Tansley wrote that the city was "a less liberal place than it was a year ago, with gangs enforcing clampdowns on the sale of DVDs, musical instruments, alcohol, women's attire and behaviour and gambling through intimidation. Both Sunnis and Christians ha[d] been targeted by Shia extremists."

On crime, Mr Tansley wrote:

> "The Iraqi Police do not compile crime statistics. But over the summer, our police advisers have recorded an average of 65 murders a month in the province. Kidnapping and extortion are rife. Basra has long been known for smuggling and prostitution … [and] in recent years, the province has become an increasingly important conduit for illegal drugs from Afghanistan via Iran.
> "But the serious money today comes from oil smuggling … estimates from both the US IRMO [Iraq Reconstruction and Management Office] and MND(SE) suggest that possibly as much as 30 percent of the South's oil production is appropriated illegally …
>
> "Corruption may be endemic throughout Iraq. But in Basra, where the opportunities for illicit gain are greater, the stakes are higher … Links between crime and politics abound. No prominent politician seems untainted, and all the main players have their own militias with links to the various law enforcement agencies …
> "Compared to Central and Northern Iraq, the number of coalition casualties in Basra has been low. But the threat of kidnapping and EFP IED [Explosively Formed Projective Improvised Explosive Device] attacks by anti-coalition groups remains high, and disrupts both our and MND(SE)'s work. In addition, the levels of criminal, political and sectarian violence are high and rising. This lawlessness overshadows all life in Basra, and acts as a major obstacle to development …
> "The police (IPS) are currently unable to address Basra's security problems. Minimal screening of entrants to the IPS after the fall of Saddam [Hussein], poor leadership and the connections between politicians and crime in Basra have resulted in a force riven with factions, many of whom are as likely to be involved in criminal activity as helping to prevent it …"

[878] Telegram 16985/05 Basra to FCO London, 31 October 2005, 'Basra: First Impressions'.

929. On 7 September, the FCO circulated a Transition Plan for the IPS in southern Iraq, which had been produced by the Consulate in Basra in consultation with UK police and military in theatre and agreed with DFID, the MOD and the Home Office.[879] There was recognition that the Iraqi police had been limited in what they could achieve due to a lack of trained personnel, shortages of equipment and inadequate facilities. The plan aimed to address those factors by achieving a set of quantitative and qualitative targets in the areas of training, police support infrastructure, intelligence capability, operational capability and public support. The timetable for those targets was driven by the established plans for military withdrawal.

930. The plan stated:

> "The IPS runs its own operations in Southern Iraq. Standards across the South vary, but generally speaking the IPS has a growing capacity to perform policing functions from community patrolling to counter-terrorism. It has enough training and equipment to allow it to patrol 24 hours a day. It has the capability to respond to calls for assistance from the public and co-ordinate with other agencies in an emergency. It has the resources to tackle public disorder and is capable of gathering intelligence and detecting crime. It knows how to manage a crime scene and exploit forensic evidence."

931. The more detailed figures on police training provided in the FCO plan, when compared with earlier MOD papers, made clear that the overall figure of 55 percent of police trained masked considerable variations across MND(SE) – whereas 90 percent of personnel in Dhi Qar province had received training, the figures for Muthanna and Basra were considerably lower (40 percent and 42 percent respectively). The plan noted:

> "Police reform in Basra is the most complex task facing us. Far more police need training than in the other provinces [in MND(SE)] combined; and the culture of corruption and abuse is deeply ingrained. Militia infiltration threatens our efforts to encourage an independent apolitical police force."

932. The plan stated that the ability to solve those problems lay with the Iraqi authorities and that there were no effective levers within the UK's control. The FCO concluded:

> "The IPS in Southern Iraq is functioning, with minimal supervision. We could leave today and it would continue to function. There would, however, remain serious question marks about the destabilising activities of the militias, corruption, lack of public accountability and human rights abuse within the IPS. We are addressing these problems but they will not disappear overnight … We know where we want to be at transition … We must be realistic about what we can achieve here: our aim should be to leave an IPS comparable to other competent police forces in the region."

933. On 9 September, Mr Quarrey provided Mr Blair with a number of weekly reports.[880] On the covering note he listed a number of causes for concern including: the "apparent involvement of members of Basra Police in attacks against the MNF, and a claim from the Basra Chief of Police that only 500 out of 12,000 Basra Police are loyal to him".

934. Mr Quarrey concluded by saying:

"We still do not have the comprehensive picture that we need of what is going on in Basra. Kim Howells visits next week. I have spoken to his office today and emphasised that you are personally very concerned about the situation and that we need a serious report from him on this."

935. Mr Blair's manuscript comments said: "This is v.worrying. It all depends on the ISF being built up credibly."[881]

THE IMPACT OF POLITICAL AND TRIBAL MATTERS ON THE POLICE IN THE SOUTH

936. On 22 August 2005, Chief Inspector Barry Pollin, the Senior Police Adviser in MND(SE), produced a report on the impact of political parties and tribes on the IPS in MND(SE).[882] That paper was circulated to Iraq Senior Official Group members on 14 September, along with the Transitional Plan (as described earlier in this Section) which was to be considered out of committee.[883]

Tribal justice

The paper produced by Chief Inspector Barry Pollin, the Senior Police Adviser in MND(SE), on 22 August 2005, included an annex on extra-judicial justice, which stated that it was important for that issue to be "thoroughly addressed" given those influences were "notoriously strong" in the South-East.[884]

The annex stated that a void within the Iraqi Law on criminal proceedings allowed for the use of tribal justice through agreement between the tribes of the aggrieved party and the perpetrator. In the majority of cases, that involved payment of financial compensation, although other resolutions, such as arranged marriages, were also known.

[884] Report, 'Annex B – The Judiciary and Extra-Judicial "Justice"' attached to Paper, 'The Impact of Political and Tribal Matters on the Iraqi Police Service in South-East Iraq'.

It found that the "post-war instability of the Iraqi society appears to have increased reliance on tribal justice even in the urban areas". In some cases offences were not reported to the police at all, but simply dealt with through the tribal justice system. One example provided was alleged rape victims being placed in prison custody "to protect them from honour-related violence from their tribe".

The annex recommended that, in the longer term, the Iraqi Government should engage the public in a general debate on tribal justice, including "its reasoning and justification". A comprehensive study of tribal justice was needed to understand its impact on the criminal justice system. Efforts should also be made to raise awareness in criminal justice institutions. Police training should include understanding which offences could legally be resolved through the tribal system, and which must be referred to an investigating magistrate. A dialogue should be commenced with tribal leaders to improve compliance with Iraqi law.

937. CI Pollin wrote:

"Immediately post-April 2003, the relationship between the IPS and the political parties and their militia was largely opportunistic: it was based on the affiliation and sympathies of individual members who were joining. (This is not the case in other parts of the security forces.) However, more recently, political parties and militia have been exploiting the lack of transparent recruitment, vetting and central oversight to deliberately place their supporters within the IPS.

"It is assessed that the majority of IPS officers are associated with a political party and/or tribe with whom their allegiance is stronger than their allegiance to the IPS. The extent to these ties and the degree to which they undermine the efficiency of the police to support the Rule of Law is significant. It is now likely that if called upon to take action against them, the IPS would support their party's militia or tribe. The larger parties have well-armed and well-organised militias, but the paramilitary capabilities of the tribes vary.

"Often, political party and tribal allegiances of one or both heavily influence the dynamics of the relations between the Chiefs of Police and Provincial Governors. The potential of the parties to use the IPS to effect political, social and religious influence is a serious concern. By using affiliated IPS officers to carry out 'de-Ba'athification', the political parties are able to create vacancies in influential positions within the IPS for their own members. There are also signs that Islamic fundamentalism is increasing within IPS ranks.

"It is clear that the judiciary in the South is subject to interference either direct or indirect from tribes, political parties, militia and IPS intimidation. Subsequently, they are not the Rule of Law bulwark that they should be or that they need to be in order to address tribal, religious or political party influence."

The Jameat incident and subsequent developments

938. On 17 September, UK forces detained two leading members of a JAM splinter group.[885] On 19 September, two UK soldiers were arrested by the IPS in Basra and taken to the Jameat Police Station. Negotiations to release the soldiers failed, and a rescue was mounted by MND(SE). That became known as 'the Jameat incident' and is described in detail in the Box below.

The Jameat incident

On 19 September, two UK soldiers were arrested by the IPS.[886] According to the account provided to No.10 by Dr Reid's office, the two soldiers had been working under cover following up the operation against JAM the previous weekend. They had been parked at the side of a road when an unmarked vehicle with four men in plain clothes pulled up behind them. Two people got out of the car and walked towards the soldiers' vehicle, with weapons cocked. The UK soldiers, believing they were "facing death or serious injury", opened fire killing one of the men and wounding the other. Not realising the men they had shot were police, the soldiers tried to escape but were blocked by police in several marked vehicles who opened fire. At that point, the two soldiers put down their weapons and produced their identification.

Although the uniformed police initially appeared willing to talk constructively with the soldiers, "the atmosphere changed significantly" when Iraqi police arrived in plain clothes. The two UK soldiers were reported to have been beaten and then taken to the Jameat Police Station, which was known to MND(SE) as a "notorious detention facility" and home of the Serious Crimes Unit (SCU), "which had been infiltrated by militant elements, especially the Jaysh al Mahdi and (by his own admission) were outside the control of the Chief of Police".

Negotiations to hand over the arrested soldiers to MNF, in line with agreed practice where MNF personnel were arrested by ISF, failed and the negotiators themselves were unable to leave the Jameat Police Station. The Governor and Chief of Police had made it clear that they were not in a position to offer any assistance and, despite explicit directions by the Chief of Police to release the two soldiers, the IPS refused to comply. Orders from the MOI in Baghdad were similarly disregarded. The General commanding the 10th Division of the Iraqi Army also "refused to get involved in the incident".

A rescue operation was successfully mounted by MND(SE) using armed force to free the six negotiators and the two soldiers. That was achieved without casualties on either side but caused significant damage to the wall of the police station and several police vehicles. The two soldiers who had originally been arrested were found to have been taken to a house away from the police station and held by what was suspected to be a mixture of JAM and IPS personnel. A further rescue operation was carried out successfully (again without casualties) to free them later that evening.

939. The Chiefs of Staff considered the events at their meeting on 21 September, briefed by Lieutenant General Andrew Ridgway, the Chief of Defence Intelligence.[887] The minutes recorded that:

> "The incident in Basra was the inevitable product of the dual loyalties of IPS members: whilst giving Iraqis status and pay, it also enabled them to sustain their tribal, religious and – in the worst cases – militia associations; these reflected Iraqi and Middle Eastern society, did not necessarily represent infiltration, but would endure and thus would remain a key planning consideration for Security Sector Reform (SSR).
> "The success of SSR depended on the proportion of the Iraqi Security Force (ISF) personnel that enjoyed these dual loyalties benignly without affecting their professional integrity, against the number that exploited their ISF positions to effect intimidation and murder … this proportion was not known and was unlikely to be clear for another six-nine months …
> "The continued existence of insurgents in the ISF evinced the weakness of the Iraqi Ministry of the Interior (MOI): having failed to purge and reform the IPS, despite being aware of problems for at least a year, the MOI needed to be galvanised by UK Government pressure through the Cabinet Office."

940. Mr Straw chaired a meeting on 23 September – involving Dr Reid, Mr Benn, Gen Walker and senior officials from No.10, the FCO and DFID – to discuss the incident and agree what advice should be put to Mr Blair on current policy for South East Iraq.[888] A record of the meeting by Dr Reid's Private Secretary stated Sir Nigel Sheinwald "stressed that the PM needed advice on how to deal with the political and security strands of our policy; he was not expecting a sudden lurch in any direction away from our current plan".

941. The record stated:

> "During discussion it was stressed that the incident … should be seen as a relatively minor one which had resulted in a great deal of media attention."

942. Those present at the meeting "agreed that the incident would probably prove to be a blip but it had highlighted the need to review the overall strategy and ensure we were on the right track". Dr Reid "suggested that the IPS be audited by a UK specialist", Mr Asquith agreed to investigate the practicality of getting someone like Sir Ronnie Flanagan, HM Chief Inspector of Constabulary, to provide the analysis.

An assessment of the Iraqi Security Forces

On 28 September 2005, the JIC assessed the security situation in the South.[889] On the ISF and local governance, it stated:

> "This fragility of local governance is not new and is mirrored to a greater or lesser degree across the country. We have previously judged the Iraqi security forces (ISF) in the South to be brittle, largely untested and under the influence of political and tribal factions; and noted that the relationship between regional and national government is tenuous. The effectiveness of the police in particular has been a persistent concern. Policemen have been implicated in the recent murder of two journalists working for US papers; intelligence has indicated serious abuse of prisoners on political and sectarian grounds; and […] some police were conducting assassinations on behalf of political militias […] The scale of divided loyalty within the police, and the ISF more generally, is difficult to quantify. Most members of the ISF undoubtedly have allegiance to political factions or tribes: under pressure their reliability will be doubtful. We judge that a significant number actively colludes with Shia extremist militias."

943. The Iraqi and UK authorities in Basra conducted separate investigations into the Jameat incident.[890] Mr Patey met Prime Minister Ja'afari to discuss the Iraqi report on 30 September. The Iraqi investigation found faults on both sides but attributed "80 percent of the blame … to the British", a position that was refuted by Mr Patey. When pressed on the need to take action against the militia influence at the Jameat Police Station, Mr Ja'afari claimed that the Transitional Administrative Law (TAL) gave central government very little control over the local police. Mr Patey reminded Mr Ja'afari that the worst offenders were the CIU which reported directly to the Minister of the Interior.

944. The UK military's investigation into the incident concluded that no crime had been committed by the UK's soldiers, as reported to Dr Reid by a junior MOD official on 28 November.[891] Two separate investigations were carried out by military officers from the regiment responsible for troops at the Jameat cordon who judged that the actions of British troops were compliant with the Rules of Engagement and their right to self defence. They deemed that no further investigation by the Special Investigation Branch was required. Those findings had been reviewed by "a higher authority" and endorsed by AM Torpy and Gen Walker.

945. At the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 5 October, the minutes recorded a "need to resolve differences" between the UK's enquiry into events at Jameat and those of the Iraqi investigation team.[892] They hoped to close the issue with a "Joint (Iraqi/UK) statement when one could be agreed".

946. The Annotated Agenda for the DOP(I) meeting on 12 October (circulated on 11 October) confirmed that a joint statement had been agreed.[893]

947. The final paper for Mr Blair was produced on 30 September by the FCO, the MOD and DFID.[894] It was sent to No.10 by Mr Peter Hayes, Principal Private Secretary to Mr Straw. It stated:

> "The security incident on 19 September … highlights what was previously more opaque, that we face acute challenges in achieving our objectives in the South-East region. Stability in the South-East is being threatened by intense rivalry among political parties and their militias. Criminality, jockeying for patronage and leaders' differing political visions are being exacerbated by tribalism and increasing religiosity. Specifically, this has a severe impact on the effectiveness of the police service."

948. The paper stated that negative media reporting was "wrong":

> "While militia rivalry is a fact of life in the Basra police, the behaviour of the Jameat police station … is not representative of the police service as a whole. Some 70 out of 240 Jameat officers are pursuing primarily a militia rather than an IPS agenda. This should be set against a total southern police force of around 14,000. Police officers will continue to have dual loyalties to the state on one hand and militia/tribe on the other. It will take five, possibly 10 years to train up a sufficiently large cadre of middle management police officers loyal to state institutions."

949. Although the Basra Governor and Provincial Council had "refused to do business with us", their credibility meant that the effect was "not significant". The "immediate problem" was whether there would be "reprisal" attacks on UK personnel, and whether police and prison mentors could safely be deployed to ISF units. Training teams had been withdrawn from Basra city and some areas beyond, but the British military were "back on the ground visiting police stations".

950. On whether the UK was "on the right policy course", the paper stated:

> "Asserting direct British control over local government and rule of [law] institutions is out of the question. There is no legal base for this … If, on the other hand, we were to pull out more rapidly, the Transitional Government and security forces would be unable to fill the vacuum. Militia rivalry would escalate. Iran's influence would be entirely unchecked. We would be accused of 'cutting and running'.
> "Our only realistic option is to maintain our course and see the job through. But we need to make adjustments to our policy, while sticking to our strategic approach of ensuring in due course successful transition of responsibility for Rule of Law in the South-East to the Iraqis … We should apply pressure on the Iraqi > authorities to take action against those who abuse and represent a threat to law and order … they should start with firm action against Jameat personnel."

951. The immediate next steps identified by Mr Hayes included to:

- "Secure an explicit undertaking from the Governor and (new) Chief of Police that our personnel will be able to operate in safety";
- "Get a clear commitment from Baghdad politicians to grip the South-East";
- "Get the Interior Minister to visit Basra, immediately";
- "Demonstrate to the international community (in particular, the US) that we can handle the situation" – while the underlying problems in Basra were "serious", they were "not new" and could be managed by the UK; and
- "Consider the dispatch of a senior UK police officer" to "audit the police in MND(SE)".

952. Amongst the actions advised by Mr Hayes for the medium and longer term were that the UK would need to ensure an "effective" Chief of Police was in place (potentially replacing the incumbent with no party ties with one with "political clout"), to redeploy training teams and allocate more resources.

953. The paper also cautioned: "we may not be able to deliver, by next year, the minimum standards required in Rule of Law and governance."

954. In response, Mr Blair agreed that there was no need to change the overall strategy but Sir Nigel Sheinwald recorded in a letter on 4 October to Mr Hayes:

> "He [Mr Blair] is convinced … that we need a major and sustained push over the next few months on the political and security lines of operation if we are to get what we need – the political process moving ahead on time and producing an effective and moderate Iraqi Government after the elections, with visible progress on the Iraqiisation of security."[895]

955. Mr Blair agreed to a review to establish "whether our police training strategy in the South-East is working, and whether the national policing strategy knits together". He also agreed that a visit by Sir Ronnie Flanagan would be a good idea. Mr Blair wanted "a UK Minister to take ownership of our overall policing strategy, including our liaison with the US over national strategy" and that "this needs to be supported by a dedicated and sufficiently strong team in London". The FCO was asked to work on that with the Cabinet Office and the MOD, though the letter also noted that "the Prime Minister would be grateful if the Defence Secretary could continue to oversee the overall security strategy".

[895] Letter Sheinwald to Hayes, 4 October 2005, 'Iraq Strategy'.

956. In an email on 7 October to senior officials in the Home Office and the FCO, CC Kernaghan said that he was "naturally supportive" of Sir Ronnie's appointment to review the UK's policing contribution in Iraq.[896] However, he expressed concern that there was an "apparent lack of strategic vision" within the UK Government and asked whether Mr Blair had ever been briefed on his earlier reports, particularly his first report dated May 2003 (described earlier in this Section). He highlighted a number of issues that he believed a review of the UK's strategy on policing in Iraq needed to take into account, including:

- the level of resource – finance and personnel – that the UK was willing to commit;
- an assessment of what influence the UK had with both the Iraqi Government and the US in the context of SSR; and
- whether the UK's interest was limited to MND(SE) or applied to Iraq as a whole.

957. On 10 October, Mr Wheeler produced an update of policing in each of the four MND(SE) provinces.[897] He described both Muthanna and Dhi Qar provinces as "conducive to police reform" but highlighted more serious issues in the other two provinces. His comments on Maysan province are dealt with later in this Section.

958. On Basra, he said:

> "In Basra the situation is most complex. The security threat is high (we are in lock-down but are reviewing whether PAT movements might happen under military escort). There is significant IPS/militia affiliation, abuse and assassinations are carried out by those in the Jameat and the Governor and Council have recently been encouraging non co-operation …"

959. On 24 October, Maj Gen Dutton wrote to Maj Gen Wall, setting out his views and proposals for action to improve management of the IPS programme.[898] On the nature of the current problems, he stated:

> "The events of 19 September 2005 in Basra brought the issue into sharp focus and to public attention, but nothing that happened in that incident will have come as a surprise to anyone who had been involved or who had followed the reporting from MND (SE) over a period of many months. The problems associated with the Jameat Police Station: the lack of control and authority of the Basra Chief of Police and the problems of the divided loyalties of many policemen who are controlled (and indeed in some places planted in the Police) by militant factions, was well known and reported. Knowledge of the problem does not of course make the situation any more tolerable but my point is that nothing changed on 19 September and we should not therefore assume that the existing strategy for police SSR is wholly off-track or now inappropriate, nor should it overshadow the excellent work being done at the tactical level."

960. In his evidence to the Inquiry Lt Gen Dutton said that the military was "certainly aware" of the reputation of Jameat police station, but:

"… did it come as a surprise? Yes, because … it was an event that was triggered by individuals getting themselves into a fire fight and then being taken to that police station. So … it is not as if the Jameat police station incident … evolved from a series of other events; it was a particular thing that caused it. So it was certainly a surprise."[899]

961. Lt Gen Dutton said that the incident had "huge effect" in London and at PJHQ but that "it calmed down quite quickly". With hindsight, Lt Gen Dutton said that "there perhaps wasn't as much upwards communication to Baghdad, to keep them in the picture, as would have been useful".

962. Lt Gen Riley told the Inquiry that, although the Jameat incident occurred after he had left Iraq, he "would not have expected it".[900] Explaining how it arose, he said:

"The Iraqi police in the South … reflected the local political climate and the tensions, and all the tensions that were present in southern Iraqi society played out in the police …"

963. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lieutenent General John Cooper, GOC MND(SE) from December 2005 to July 2006, referred to the fall-out with the Basra Provincial Council as "the divorce".[901] He said that the restricted access to Basra's police stations that followed enabled "a series of murder squads and corruption to become endemic" and "produced a climate of lawlessness" inside Basra's police. Lt Gen Cooper told the Inquiry:

"… because we were not allowed to go back into contact until May of 2006, it meant that we lost ground and we lost time."

964. Lt Gen Cooper added that "some policemen would still allow us in, but the vast majority were following the Provincial Council direction that they weren't to have anything to do with us".[902] He said that the Council only re-engaged when a "major security incident" occurred after a Lynx helicopter was shot down in May 2006.

965. Lieutenent General Sir Richard Shirreff, GOC MND(SE) from July 2006 until January 2007, also told the Inquiry about restrictions on visiting Basra's police stations.

He said that in the six months following the incident "there had been virtually no activity" in police stations, and many "had simply not been touched".[903]

The MOD takes the lead on policing

966. On 12 September 2005, a week before the Jameat incident, Dr Reid wrote to Mr Blair advising that "considerable progress" had been made in training the ISF since May.[904] He recommended that "consequently, an overall reduction of about 500 troops" would be possible in "October/November".

967. On 10 October, Dr Reid announced in the House of Commons plans to reduce force levels in MND(SE) by "about 500".[905]

968. In the subsequent debate, Mr Michael Ancram asked Dr Reid about the level of infiltration by "Iranian-backed insurgents" in the police. Dr Reid responded:

> "In any theatre of combat in the world where competing factions have been at war with each other there is always a problem of split loyalties when rehabilitating and restructuring the police force afterwards. The question is not whether those split loyalties exist, but whether we can diminish them by human rights training and training the police to be as objective as possible … However, although there are certain elements in the police service in Iraq about who we ought to be worried, I would not want him to believe that that is the majority or anything like it. Let us remember that every time Iraqi policemen put on their uniforms in the morning, they go out to face the threat of death. Many of them have died leading operations. Even in Basra, there were police around the Jameat Police Station trying to ensure that the 250 to 300 militant demonstrators did not approach it. So it is not the case that all the police, even in Basra, were antagonistic towards us."

969. Dr Reid provided Mr Blair with a security update on 11 October.[906] He reported:

> "Despite a lack of an Iraqi lead from Baghdad, MND(SE) have continued to build bridges with the local authorities post the Basra incident. Outside Basra city, Security Sector Reform (SSR) work has continued with little interruption, including joint patrolling. In Basra itself, our soldiers are again visiting IPS stations and we are able to talk in private to the Chief of Police …

Enforcement (DBE) … whilst playing a supporting role in the training and mentoring of the Iraqi Police Service (IPS) …

"Progress on Iraqiisation continues. There are now 190,000 members of the Iraqi Security Forces trained and equipped …

"SSR for the Iraqi Army continues to be on track for our transition plans …

"On policing, the situation is less satisfactory. We need to do further work between MOD, FCO, DFID and the Home Office to improve support to IPS development at the strategic level … Problems of divided loyalties and militia links can only be dealt with by the political will of an effective Iraqi Government …

"We need to review our strategy on policing … at two levels … In Baghdad … there would be a good case for providing a senior Home Office official with the right experience to work with the MOI … Sir Ronnie Flanagan [will] visit MND(SE) soon to carry out an audit of the effectiveness of [the] police training programme … Part of this work might include an assessment of the Italians' programme in Dhi Qar province."

970. Dr Reid's paper sought clarification of whether or not it was intended there should be a re-assignment of Ministerial responsibilities for policing, noting that DOP(I) would need to take a collective view on the issue and that "there would be resource implications if MOD were to take this on".

971. Gen Jackson visited Iraq from 10 to 13 October.[907] His visit report noted that, of the four key strategic areas (SSR, governance, reconstruction and counter-insurgency work), he "only saw encouraging signs of progress in one: SSR" though that progress was still "patchy", with the UK's "undoubted success with the Iraqi Army" contrasting with the position of the Iraqi police:

"The events of 19 September in Basra are merely indicative of a wider malaise across the IPS as a whole. We are where we are, but it is not to our credit that we have known about the inadequacies of the IPS for so long and yet failed to address them. We must do so now … Whatever the eventual remedial plan is, it must be resourced and led properly. It must also address the specific needs of an Iraqi police force facing Iraq's current security climate. More UK Police trainers are not the answer. I have heard not one complimentary word about their involvement during my last two visits. We, the military, must be prepared to shoulder an extra training burden here."

[907] Minute CGS to CDS, October 2005, 'CGS Visit to Iraq: 10-13 Oct 05'.

972. At the meeting of DOP(I) on 12 October, the Committee discussed the need "to do more to speed up the development of police" but considered that "the plan for ISF development that was in place was largely sound".[908]

973. The Committee agreed that the MOD would take the lead on "police issues in Iraq" as "the Iraqi policing situation called for a para-military, rather than a civilian, style of policing".

974. Although the MOD would take responsibility for police issues, the FCO continued to administer the police secondments to Iraq and to manage the contract with ArmorGroup for IPAs.[909]

975. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lt Gen Dutton commented on the move of responsibility for policing to the MOD:

> "I didn't get the impression that it had a great deal of effect at all, because what did it actually mean? On the ground it didn't really mean anything; it meant that one particular Secretary of State felt he was now responsible for the police as well … but it didn't produce more resources, it didn't, to my mind, sort out the structural problem we have … about being able to train those sorts of policemen."[910]

976. On 31 October, an MOD paper about the reform of the IPS described the number of UK civilian personnel devoted to policing.[911] It totalled over 200 and comprised:

- 105 UK police officers funded through the [FCO's] Peacekeeping Fund at a cost of £3.3m for financial year 2005/06:
  - 61 UK staff based in Jordan, delivering eight-week Basic Recruit Training;
  - 26 serving and retired UK police officers in MND(SE) mentoring, liaising and conducting specialist training courses with the Iraqi police; and
  - 18 serving and retired UK police officers in Baghdad, including the UK Chief Police Adviser focusing on: IPS development, planning and mentoring the Police Minister, forensics, criminal intelligence, training at the staff officer college.
- 106 UK International Police Advisers provided by ArmorGroup, funded by the GCPP (£11.1m for financial year 2005/06) and by the Dutch and Japanese governments; five of those contractors were based in Baghdad and the remainder in MND(SE), acting as advisers, mentors (including to each Provincial Chief of Police in MND(SE)) and trainers.

977. Additionally, in Dhi Qar province the Italian brigade was responsible for IPS training and mentoring, employing their Carabinieri. Royal Military Police (RMP) and other coalition troops (including Danes and Czechs) were involved in mentoring and follow-up training in the other three provinces. CPATT also provided International Police Liaison Officers (IPLOs) to MND(SE) to conduct training and mentoring, and to ensure that training in MND(SE) was consistent with efforts elsewhere in Iraq.

978. In total, including the spend on equipping the police under Project OSIRIS (described earlier in this Section), police SSR spending represented less than two percent of the annual spend by the UK on Iraq – estimated to be £1bn in financial year 2005/06.

979. The Chiefs of Staff considered SSR on 18 October.[912] They concluded: "The military effort was well resourced compared to the commitments by other Government departments." Now that Dr Reid would be responsible for SSR in Iraq, it would be "important to calculate the resources needed to deliver [this] and to secure appropriate HMT [Treasury] funding".

980. On 24 October, Maj Gen Dutton sent a paper with proposals on how to reform the IPS programme in MND(SE) to Maj Gen Wall.[913] He wrote that:

> "As time has gone by, it has become clear that the aspirations in the existing plan are unachievable. We need to be realistic about what we can expect to achieve: we should be aiming for a police force that is relevant and 'good enough' for this region."

981. Maj Gen Dutton stated: "We must dismiss any ideas of starting again: it is reform that is required, not complete re-design." He proposed "a three-point plan":

- removal of those senior elements of the IPS who were engaged in serious crime, acknowledging that that may require the MNF to act if it could not be achieved by the ITG;
- dismissal of uncommitted IPS officers (estimated by the Basra Chief of Police to number around 6,000 in a total force of 30,000); and
- "redoubling efforts on training the remaining police, so that eventually the 'good' outweighs the 'bad'".

982. On 25 October, Mr Tansley submitted recommendations along similar lines to the FCO, also proposing the three-point plan.[914] He wrote that a "key part" of the plan would be for "joint teams" from PATs and MND(SE) conducting "surges" on police districts and stations that were "exposed as the weakest or of most importance".

[914] Telegram 16521/05 Basra to FCO London, 25 October 2005, 'Reform of the Iraq Police Service in South-East'.

983. Although the two papers were broadly the same, Mr Tansley suggested that the dismissal of IPS officers would require the implementation of a planned MOI redundancy package whereas Maj Gen Dutton saw that as desirable but not essential. Mr Tansley also suggested that a suitably qualified senior civil servant should be deployed to assist MOI reform.

984. Both papers suggested that the numbers of military personnel dedicated to support police reform should be increased (to include an extra two infantry companies, RMP personnel and administrative staff) and that restrictions on movement of police officers and contractors should be eased to allow them to move with the military.

985. Mr Tansley suggested that there should be joint responsibility for delivery between the Senior Police Adviser and the Task Force Commander in each province, with ArmorGroup personnel directly managed by the Senior Police Adviser. Maj Gen Dutton's paper did not suggest a formal command structure but did cite "lack of unity of command" as a major part of the problem.

986. Lt Gen Dutton told the Inquiry that there was "nothing particularly magical" about the three-point plan:

> "It was a very simple plan, but it was designed in some ways to counter what I thought was a feeling from elsewhere, that the only answer to the Basra police force was to disband it completely and start again from scratch."[915]

987. On 27 October, Dr Reid reported to Cabinet that the build-up of Iraqi security forces was "going well" but that they "were generally not yet capable of operating on their own".[916] He stated that he and Mr Straw were looking at ways of addressing militia infiltration in the Iraqi police.

988. On 31 October, the MOD produced a paper about the UK's policy on the IPS to be considered at the next DOP(I).[917] The paper outlined the approach advocated by Mr Tansley and Maj Gen Dutton but proposed that all police reform in MND(SE) should be consolidated "under unified military direction … enabling the GOC to deploy additional (civil and military) resources as necessary". The MOD stated:

> "… the utility of the civil police contingent … is limited by their contractual terms of service and civilian working practices … If they were brought under military direction (the command and control issues would need to be finessed) the policing component would be employed to meet the priorities of operational transition, with its output reported through the established military chain."

989. The minutes of the DOP(I) meeting on 3 November recorded:

> "… there was considerable concern … among British police at the prospect of police advisers in Iraq being placed under military command …"[918]

990. Ministers agreed:

> "Departments, notably the FCO, MOD and Home Office, should work together to agree a way forward on command and control of the policing effort … Paul Kernaghan should also be consulted."

991. The DOP(I) minutes did not record any discussion of increasing military resource or lifting movement restrictions. See the Box earlier in this Section, 'Security restrictions on UK police officers', for more detail on civilian security restrictions.

992. On 9 November, Maj Gen Dutton reported that a new Police Strategic Steering Group had met for the first time that week.[919] That brought together the Consul General, GOC MND(SE), the Senior Police Adviser and members of the GOC's staff. Maj Gen Dutton wrote:

> "I am confident that we are now approaching a situation where we can make best use of the different capabilities which the civil police, contractors and my own soldiers, including Royal Military Police, can provide. The Consul General and I expect to set out our proposed solution to London shortly."

993. The first meeting of a new cross-Whitehall SSR Group[920] was held on 17 November.[921] It was chaired by Mr Howard, reflecting the transfer of responsibility for policing to MOD. The meeting addressed what that transfer meant and the command and control issues in MND(SE). In an email to DCC Smith, CC Kernaghan summarised:

> "Lead status remains to be defined but no one argued that you were in a line of command relationship with the GOC or that your professional judgement could be over-ruled by anyone else in theatre."

994. In a report dated 20 November, DCC Smith was critical of military co-ordination with police in MND(SE):

> "Despite reassurances from London it is quite clear, to myself and senior CivPol officers on the ground in Basra, that the military are initiating changes in their relationship with CivPol. This is unfortunate as it is increasingly becoming obvious that 'partnership' is a one-sided (CivPol) concept. Clarification from London would be welcome."[922]

Strategic considerations in late 2005

995. The MOD produced a paper entitled 'Strategy for the UK's contribution to Iraq Security' for DOP(I) on 15 November.[923] It described three key outcomes:

- security up to the December elections;
- activity up to the handover of security responsibility; and
- achievement and maintenance of ISF self-reliance.

996. Four supporting objectives were detailed:

- establishment of a secure environment;
- transition to tactical, operational and strategic overwatch;
- development of an effective, self-sufficient IPS: "Although wholesale national reform of the IPS is beyond the scope of UK influence, the provision of a technically competent IPS at a local level within MND(SE) is possible with the appropriate resource and is fundamental to an enduring handover. Mindful of the endemic nature of divided loyalty and militia involvement, the UK must continue to pursue IPS reform within MND(SE) to a level that will support handover – nothing more/nothing less"; and
- governance and capacity-building in key Ministries (MOI and the IMOD) within the security sector.

997. Security was discussed at the meeting but the minutes do not refer to the MOD's paper.[924]

998. The report produced by DCC Smith on 20 November was an update of his May 'Next Steps on Policing' review, assessing progress in both Baghdad and Basra.[925] In the South, he judged that the "key area to address was militia influence in the Basra IPS and the lack of real MOI authority into the province". To achieve that, he identified four elements that would need to be addressed:

- a strong Chief of Police;
- clear direction and support from the Deputy Minister for Police;
- good support infrastructure; and
- the removal of the unacceptable "bad eggs" in Basra.

999. On 12 December, Maj Gen Dutton submitted his Hauldown Report to AM Torpy.[926] He wrote that the threat from IEDs had "radically affected our freedom of manoeuvre and consequently inhibited" SSR work (see Section 14.1 for detail on the IED threat).

1000. On the Iraqi Army, Maj Gen Dutton reported:

> "The development of the Iraqi Army is the 'jewel in the crown' of our SSR effort and we must not let up now. The MiTT [Military Transition Team] system has been a great success … their contribution to the 'conceptual' and 'moral' development of 10th Division has been enormous … I acknowledge the desire to shift responsibility to the Iraqis themselves to prevent over-dependence, but the structure is built on 'foundations of sand' and will require support for some time yet."

1001. On the IPS, Maj Gen Dutton wrote:

> "I have written more than enough on this. I believe that, over time, the IPS can be reformed to an acceptable level, but there is no simple quick solution, which is, I sense, what London wants. In fact, it will be a long hard slog and will need unwavering commitment. The one critical point I must stress is that the UK should never again expect to be able to undertake police restructuring and reform in this sort of environment using UK police: they do not have the institutional structure or expertise to cope, nor can they be compulsorily deployed."

1002. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lt Gen Dutton said:

> "We had some excellent policemen but simply not sufficient to take on the role of police training, which is why it had to be done in … a very poor way, but as best we could, by the military."[927]

1003. Lt Gen Dutton said that there was "nothing wrong" with the policemen, "there just weren't enough of them".[928] He continued:

> "My criticism of the UK's policing – expeditionary policing effort has never been aimed at the individual policemen who do it, simply the fact that I don't believe we, in the UK, have a system for expeditionary policing that will work in the sort of environment of Iraq or Afghanistan."

1004. On 21 December, AM Torpy wrote to Lt Gen Fry to highlight the key issues for 2006.[929] On the police he reiterated the need to "maintain momentum and our commitment, pushing ahead quickly with any new work recommended by Ronnie Flanagan". He then drew attention to Maj Gen Dutton's Hauldown Report and stated: "Jim [Maj Gen Dutton] has hit the nail on the head and we must not repeat this painful mistake in Afghanistan."

SIR RONNIE FLANAGAN'S REVIEW

1005. On 18 October, a meeting was held at the Home Office to discuss the terms of reference for Sir Ronnie Flanagan's visit to Iraq, attended by Sir Ronnie, CC Kernaghan and senior representatives from the FCO, the MOD and the Home Office.[930] Some of the points made included:

- the FCO wanted to understand the progress in MND(SE) and how that could be improved upon, considering how this fitted with work in Baghdad and London;
- the MOD felt that current IPS training could be more efficient; and
- "much of Whitehall [was] not aware of elements that are beyond UK control. It would be helpful if Sir Ronnie could highlight these as part of his report".

1006. CC Kernaghan circulated the terms of reference on 10 November and summarised Sir Ronnie's task as to "concentrate on assessing the resourcing and effectiveness of the UK's IPS Security Sector Reform (SSR) programme in MND(SE) and its linkage to the shape and effectiveness of MNF-I national policing policy in Baghdad".[931] There were 12 areas specifically highlighted, including the effectiveness of IPS training, police officer and ArmorGroup contract management, IPAs and the relationship between UK structures and those of the US and Iraq.

1007. Sir Ronnie Flanagan visited Iraq between 20 and 24 November 2005 to conduct an initial review of the UK policing effort in Iraq.[932] He submitted an interim report to Dr Reid on 13 December, who briefed the DOP(I) on 15 December.

1008. Sir Ronnie's interim report identified:

- There was no single strategy for SSR at a national level – he had uncovered "references to at least four", and "many of these" existed in isolation of one another.
- There was "a loss of corporacy and a disconnect with MNSTC-I and CPATT in Baghdad".
- There had been insufficient counter-insurgency preparation.
- There was an inadequate focus on intelligence – he referred to US$1m worth of computers for the National Information and Investigation Agency (NIIA) being held at Basra Airport because of "apparently insufficient funds to transport and then assemble it".
- Only 5 percent of military activity was currently focused on SSR.
- "Within MND(SE), the biggest issue remain[ed] militia (and criminal) infiltration of security forces".

[932] Minutes, 16 December 2005, DOP(I) meeting.

- The "biggest source of friction" between the military and UK police officers had been the inconsistent restrictions on movements but "significant progress" had been made during his visit to harmonise these, both operating on the basis of military risk assessments (subject to FCO and ACPO confirmation).[933]

1009. Sir Ronnie visited Iraq again from 3 to 8 January 2006 and submitted his final report on 31 January.[934]

1010. Sir Ronnie wrote that the original terms of reference had evolved into three overarching issues:

- The strategic direction and integration of the SSR (policing) effort;
- The efficiency and effectiveness of the SSR (policing) effort, including the Carabinieri, in MND(SE);
- The effectiveness of the existing training arrangements."

1011. Sir Ronnie was "encouraged" to learn that since his previous visit "a broad strategic plan" was now being prepared and that the "disconnect" he had identified was "already becoming a thing of the past". In MND(SE), he noted "a high level of co-operation" between UK police officers and that SSR now accounted for 47 percent of the military's work. He added:

> "Nevertheless tensions, both in theatre and within Whitehall, still exist over where primacy for SSR (policing) effort rests. Put simply, the shift in thinking that should have followed the assumption by MOD of primacy for SSR in Iraq has not permeated all activity."

1012. Sir Ronnie made 17 recommendations, including:

- The Iraqis should be encouraged to develop a robust vetting system for IPS recruits as soon as possible and to take immediate action to "root out" corrupt and sub-standard elements within the IPS. In progressing this the UK will need to provide support and expert guidance.
- The UK should encourage MNF-I to transfer responsibility for criminal and counter-insurgency intelligence to CPATT.
- For Iraq and future deployments, a senior police officer of Chief Superintendent rank should be embedded within PJHQ.
- The US and UK should use whatever influence is available to them to ensure that the next Minister of the Interior has a sound appreciation of the scale of the challenges and, moreover, is willing to take decisive action to address them.

---

[933] Report Flanagan, 13 December 2005, 'Interim Report on Policing in Iraq'.
[934] Report Flanagan, 31 January 2006, 'An Assessment of the UK's Contribution to Security Sector Reform (Policing) in Iraq'.

- The US should be encouraged to allow the Iraqi Government lead responsibility for the National Policing Plan. That should be led by the new Minister of Interior in consultation with the 18 provincial Chiefs of Police. In progressing that, the coalition must of course provide expert advice and guidance and perhaps the suggested draft.
- The CPA-I's successor should be re-deployed and should function within the MND(SE) command structure where he or she will be able to direct the SSR (policing) effort.
- The judicial dimension should be fully integrated within the SSR effort.
- The Strategic Taskforce should be re-convened with the goal of creating a genuine police expeditionary capability operating within a framework that provides maximum support to overseas SSR (policing) deployments.
- The UK should exert its influence to further embed and encourage the concept of joint operating between the IPS and the Iraqi Army in areas where the security situation makes this appropriate.

1013. Sir Ronnie Flanagan stated:

> "In many respects the challenge facing us in Iraq appears more daunting from London than it does in theatre. This I attribute to the inevitable difficulty that exists in grasping some of the key contextual factors."

1014. Sir Ronnie wrote that his recent visit had given him "a greater appreciation" of the significant threat from "rogue elements" in the Basra intelligence agencies and "pop up battalions" that could jeopardise SSR if not addressed. He stated that "the ultimate solution" rested with the MOI and that "the key to success" would be "the creation of effective governance structures".

1015. Sir Ronnie concluded:

> "Notwithstanding the reservations I have expressed about the quality of training, intelligence and other factors that inhibit the SSR (policing) effort, Iraq is on the right path and there is a good news story to be told. From an admittedly low base, Iraq's security forces are now recognisable as such and early signs of self-sufficiency are becoming apparent … The UK can take pride in its contribution."

1016. A junior FCO official sent Dr Howells a copy of Sir Ronnie's report on 17 February.[935] The note also enclosed a matrix listing each recommendation and the department responsible for its progress alongside it, including an additional 16 "other recommendations" from the report. Out of the total 33 recommendations, five were complete and 11 others were in progress or being considered.

[935] Minute FCO [junior official] to Howells, 17 February 2006, 'Review of UK Policing Reform Work in Iraq by Sir Ronnie Flanagan'.

1017. The Baghdad SSR Working Group met on 19 February to discuss Sir Ronnie's report.[936] The Group commented or identified action against all of recommendations, including:

- how critical the MOI and its Minister would be in delivering change;
- the practical difficulties encountered while trying to establish effective vetting procedures which were constrained by a lack of resources;
- that the National Policing Plan needed to be written by the Iraqi Government and not by the coalition; and
- that there were cost and duty of care issues in implementing Sir Ronnie's recommendation that recruits visited theatre.

1018. A summary of the Baghdad SSR Committee on 27 April listed progress against the six "Baghdad-related recommendations" from Sir Ronnie's report.[937] Discussions were ongoing with CPATT on how to implement those; those had been some difficulties engaging "the right people at the right levels" and the National Policing Plan was "still too military-dominated". It was recorded that there were insufficient resources to undertake an audit of training at that time.

1019. On 16 May, Mr Patey wrote to Mr Stephen Pattison, FCO Director International Security, with recommendations on how to ensure the staffing of the UK's police effort was right.[938]

1020. In his response on 24 May, Mr Pattison said that the FCO was taking forward recommendations from Sir Ronnie's review, but did not provide further details.[939] The letter focused on attracting more UK police officers to postings in Iraq, and enabling those postings.

Reforming the Iraqi Police Service: Operation CORRODE

1021. On 30 November 2005, Maj Gen Dutton reported that the Iraqi authorities had taken the first step towards reforming the IPS by disbanding the Department of Internal Affairs (DIA).[940]

1022. On 25 January 2006, Major General John Cooper, GOC MND(SE) from December 2005 until July 2006, reported that two former members of the DIA who were implicated in "numerous allegations of corrupt and criminal activity including attacks against MNF and involvement in the events of Sep 19" had been arrested by UK and Danish troops.[941]

1023. On 8 March, Maj Gen Cooper reported:

> "We have intelligence that the recidivists within the IPS have resumed their criminal activity, and the population at large is beginning to question our commitment. Absent buy-in from the MOI, I am clear about the need for us to press ahead unilaterally with [Operation] CORRODE, before the IPS regress to a position from which they cannot be redeemed."[942]

1024. The following week, Maj Gen Cooper reported that Mr Jabr had given the "green light" for MNF to continue with arrest operations under Op CORRODE.[943] He said that the next target was a "relatively junior player". Mr Jabr was also reported to have endorsed plans to establish a new DIA based at Basra Air Station.

1025. On 15 May, a junior official from PJHQ provided briefing to Mr Ingram about IPS members detained by MND(SE) as part of Op CORRODE.[944] He stated that Op CORRODE was established in conjunction with the MOI after the Jameat incident on 19 September and aimed to:

- remove corrupt individuals in key positions of responsibility;
- replace those individuals with suitable personnel from outside Basra province; and
- reform the remaining officers.

1026. The official wrote that the operation had been constrained because of "problems with political disengagement in Basra" and "nervousness amongst senior political figures in Baghdad". PJHQ assessed that there were currently ten policemen detained in Shaibah, a military airfield seven miles southwest of Basra. They were likely to remain at the facility "for the foreseeable future", because the intelligence against detainees was not admissible as evidence. Also, the detainees had connections which meant that Basra judges would be reluctant to try them, or be susceptible to intimidation if they did try them.

1027. In his weekly report on 24 May, Maj Gen Cooper described two enemies in Basra: rogue JAM and – "most dangerous" – the "corrupt IPS elements … which have murdered so many Basrawis".[945] He wrote that he needed political cover from the Iraqi Government to tackle IPS reform and would be grateful for UK political pressure.

1028. Maj Gen Cooper's report on 8 June stated that Op CORRODE had re-started and, on 4 June, there had been the first successful targeting and detention of a serving Basra police officer for more than three months.[946] There would now be "a succession of detention ops targeting IPS and N Basra leadership". Maj Gen Cooper reported that a total of three IPS officers had been detained within Op CORRODE since 17 May 2006.

1029. The JIC's Assessment of 9 June described the disbanding of the DIA as "remedial action" resulting from "MNF pressure".[947] However, the JIC stated that "the personnel have been reassigned rather than sacked".

1030. This JIC Assessment considered whether the ISF was "fit for duty". It reported:

> "The ISF in the South reflect the deep-rooted local tribal and political influences. The Army's 10th Division in MND(SE) is rated by the MNF as increasingly effective. It has performed basic tasks such as patrols and static guard duties successfully, but remains untested in counter-insurgency operations without MNF support. The Police in the South are a cause for much greater concern. Many local Police officers, in Basra and Maysan in particular, remain loyal to their political faction or militia rather than to formal command structures. Both Badr and JAM retain support among the ISF in different parts of the South. We judge that these divided loyalties would affect the ability and willingness of the Police to cope in the event of an intensified campaign of violence by Shia militias against the MNF, or fighting between Shia factions … Baghdad's central institutions have been unable to exert any control over the police in Basra."

Iraqi Navy progress

On 9 June 2006, a JIC Assessment stated that, by 1 May, 800 Navy personnel had been "trained and equipped", increasing from 750 on 4 October 2005.[948]

In September, the Iraqi Navy transferred to Iraqi control, under the command and control of the Joint Headquarters.[949]

In November, the Private Secretary to Mr Des Browne, Defence Secretary from May 2006, briefed No.10 officials that progress on the Iraqi Navy had "lost early momentum due to failure of the Iraqi procurement process" but stated that contracts had recently been awarded and that the Iraqi Navy had plans to fund and build critical infrastructure during 2007.[950] He concluded: "this momentum must be sustained".

On 6 September, an Independent Commission reported to Congress its conclusion that:

> "The Iraqi Navy is small and its current fleet is insufficient to execute its mission. However, it is making substantive progress in this early stage of development: it has a well-thought-out growth plan, which it is successfully executing. Its maturation is hampered by the [Iraqi] Ministry of Defence's understandable focus on ground forces and counterinsurgency operations, as well as by bureaucratic inefficiency. The Iraqi

> At that time, there were around 35 UK naval personnel working in Naval Assistance Training Teams.[952]

1031. Mr Des Browne became Defence Secretary in May 2006. He visited Iraq from 18 to 22 June.[953] His Assistant Private Secretary recorded that Mr Jawad Boulani, the new Minister of the Interior, told Mr Browne he was very clear about the need to reform the police, particularly in Basra.

1032. Major General Muhammed Latif, the Commander of the 10th Division, had told Mr Browne that there were 15,000 police in Basra, but you could never find them on the streets. If necessary, he was prepared to put a soldier in every police car to force them to do their jobs. They failed to carry out even the most perfunctory investigations into murders. Maj Gen Latif had started to use his own intelligence officers to follow up cases and monitor police progress. When his staff asked questions about inaction, the police would say that murders were "big boys' issues", usually a reference to the specialist police organisations that Mr Boulani sought to disband.

1033. During a meeting with UK representatives, Mr Browne was told by the police advisor that "we [the UK] had originally set our sights too high; teaching forensics instead of the basics". Adjustments had now been made and the programme seemed to be working well. The police advisor rejected the outright criticism from Maj Gen Latif and said that there were "areas that had the start of an effective policing service".

1034. Air Chief Marshal Jock Stirrup, CDS, briefed DOP(I) in July:

> "… the main issue affecting the population was sectarian murders. To see progress on that we needed to take action against corrupt police officers and militia groups."[954]

1035. ACM Stirrup described progress with the Iraqi Army as "on track" but stated that "the situation of the police was more difficult".

Further reduction in troops

1036. During early 2006, substantial effort was dedicated to preparation for the transfer of lead responsibility for security in Muthanna and Maysan provinces. That effort is detailed in Section 9.4.

1037. In a meeting of DOP(I) on 15 February, Mr Blair made clear that the UK should be able clearly to demonstrate that the conditions for transition had been met, and that this was as a result of the increasing capacity of the ISF.[955] The UK should not be handing over for solely political reasons.

1038. During a video conference between Mr Blair and President Bush on 22 February, Lt Gen Houghton assessed that there had been good progress with the ISF in the South which should allow security transfer in Maysan and Muthanna provinces by late spring.[956] He assessed that Basra was "less promising, given the collusion between police and militia, aided by local politicians" and that arrests of police "rapidly became confrontations over political and sovereignty issues".

1039. On 9 March, Dr Reid wrote to Mr Blair explaining that, as a result of the latest Force Level Review, troop levels would be reduced in May 2006, from approximately 8,000 to around 7,200 (see Section 9.4).[957] That reduction was made possible because of the "completion of various Security Sector Reform tasks, a reduction in the support levels for those tasks, and recent efficiency measures in theatre".

1040. In his statement to the House of Commons on 13 March, Dr Reid stated that the completed tasks included training of trainers and Iraqi troops being capable of guarding their own establishments.[958]

1041. On 15 March, a JIC Assessment stated:

> "The Iraqi security forces [in Southern Iraq] can cope with the low level of threat posed by the Sunni Arab nationalist insurgents and jihadists. Their readiness to deal with the activities of Shia extremists or intra-Shia violence is more uncertain. Army command, control and logistics capabilities are all still developing, making major operations without MNF support difficult. The police are a greater concern: they have multiple loyalties and have taken sides in intra-Shia clashes. A minority of police, particularly in Basra, is involved in attacks on the MNF, the assassination of Sunnis and organised crime."[959]

1042. On 20 April, Mr Robin Lamb, Consul General in Basra, provided an assessment of the security situation in Basra and its impact on the ability for UK civilian staff to operate effectively (see Section 15.1).[960] He stated:

> "Our LE [locally employed] staff regard the Iraqi Police Service as at best ineffective, and at worst complicit in the assassinations. We would support that assessment."

Policing reviews: ACC Barton and a Strategic Task Force

1043. Acting ACC Dick Barton took over from DCC Smith as Chief Police Adviser-Iraq on 27 March 2006 and was based in Basra (as opposed to Baghdad) in line with Sir Ronnie's recommendation described earlier in this Section.[961]

1044. For his first task, ACC Barton was commissioned by the FCO to conduct a review of the UK police mission in Iraq, focusing on three main areas: strategic priorities, personnel structure of UK police in Iraq and "other work required (in support of Strategic Priorities)".[962]

1045. ACC Barton's review was completed on 20 April and sought "to avoid replicating areas already covered" by Sir Ronnie's review four months earlier. He wrote that his "review theme" was to "keep it basic", stating that basic principles sat under many complex policing issues. He highlighted three strategic priorities:

- The mission must focus on building links with the criminal justice system.
- The mission must be engaged in developing the new Internal Affairs, Major Crime [Unit] and National Information and Investigation Agency (NIIA).
- The mission must identify a realistic working model which facilitates draw-down and eventual complete handover to the Iraqi Police Service."

1046. ACC Barton made 12 recommendations for change in the way the UK police mission was staffed including:

- creating an Assistant Chief Police Adviser post with a focus on major crime and criminal justice;
- creating a post to focus on developing an effective Internal Affairs capability, warning that overt corruption in the police was "crippling";
- reducing the number of contracted police officers; and
- designating a Senior Police Adviser at Chief Superintendent level to be territorial lead for Baghdad now that the CPA-I role had relocated.

1047. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Charles Clarke, Home Secretary, on 17 October 2005 about findings from a Strategic Task Force established to "take a fresh look" at how the UK contributed to international operations.[963] Mr Straw wrote that assisting in international missions was "vital" for the UK's foreign policy priorities and also created "direct operational benefits" for the UK when officers returned with experience of "working in the field".

1048. The Strategic Task Force assessed that there was no need to increase the overall numbers provided by the UK, but suggested increasing the proportion of senior officers and those with specialist skills. It proposed that "more use" was made of police staff. The Task Force also advised ensuring that the spread of officers was more evenly distributed across the forces (meaning a reduction in PSNI officers), and that the transition should be made easier for returning officers by guaranteeing interviews for posts for which they are qualified.

1049. On 4 May 2006, Mr Howard submitted a draft response for Dr John Reid, who became the Home Secretary on 5 May 2006, to send to Mr Straw.[964] Mr Howard said the draft emphasised that "recent operational experience ha[d] demonstrated the need for a robust expeditionary policing capability, ideally acting as part of an international force" but also made clear that the matter was "constrained by issues that can only be resolved by the police itself."

1050. Mr Patey wrote to Mr Pattison on 16 May, highlighting concerns that "our effort on SSR and the Rule of Law in Iraq will suffer if we do not get staffing of our policing effort right".[965] Mr Patey noted that there was a risk the UK would "continue to lose credibility in the eyes of the US as a key partner" if that issue could not be addressed, citing the frequent turnover of staff (recommending tours of more than one year) and gaps between posting of senior staff as contributing to problems. He acknowledged that those were manifestations of a wider problem in recruiting, and that there was "little benefit to the police service for their good police officers to deploy to Iraq" requiring "more radical solutions … In the short and longer term". The letter concluded by recommending that the FCO "should engage with the new Home Secretary, about the need for appropriate career and reward packages to be in place for deployed officers and the need for all police services to contribute to the effort".

1051. Mr Pattison's reply agreed with the premise that "good quality police staffing is central to delivery of the UK's objectives in Iraq" but noted that that needed to be seen in the wider context, in particular that all UK police secondees were volunteers.[966]

SSR across Iraq: summer 2006 to summer 2009

Formation of the Iraqi Government

1052. On 1 April, Mr Blair wrote to President Bush outlining his views on the steps required to achieve success in Iraq.[967] He suggested a strategy that involved pressing hard for a unity government and stated:

> "This must include a top quality, neutral figure in the Ministry of Interior. It is perfectly obvious to me that a lot of the Shia violence is now being organised out of there and there has to be a definite statement going throughout the police, it won't be tolerated."

1053. Mr Nuri al-Maliki was nominated as Prime Minister on 21 April 2006.[968] Reporting the news, an eGram from the British Embassy Baghdad stated that Prime Minister Maliki had been a "driving force" as Deputy Chair of the de-Ba'athification Committee and had "a strong anti-militia stance". He favoured "the dissolution of all militias and [did not] believe in their reintegration into Iraqi security forces".

1054. Sir Nigel Sheinwald and Mr Nick Banner, a Private Secretary to Mr Blair, visited Iraq shortly after Prime Minister Maliki's nomination.[969] In a report of the visit, Sir Nigel told Mr Blair:

> "The two litmus tests ahead are:
> (i) Choice of Interior and Defence Ministers and willingness/ability to clean out their ministries and make them work;
> (ii) Disbanding the militias … some can be integrated in the ISF, but others will need to be demobilised and retrained.
> There will need to be a major DDR and jobs package which we should try to get the international community involved in. Even if we do, this is a massive task. Militias abound – from personal protection, to Badr and JAM, through to the Facilities Protection Service."

1055. Mr Blair spoke to Prime Minister Maliki on 28 April.[970] Prime Minister Maliki stressed his commitment to "remove weapons from all the militias" and requested UK support to accelerate the training of the ISF.

Iraqi appointments

On 8 June 2006, the Iraqi security ministers were appointed:

- Minister of the Interior: Mr Jawad Boulani (Shia Independent);
- Minister of Defence: Lieutenant General Abdel Qadir (Sunni); and
- Minister for National Security: Mr Sherwan al Wa'ali (Shia Da'wa Tanzeem).[971]

Improving Iraqi Security Force build-up

1056. Mr Blair met Prime Minister Maliki on 22 May during his visit to Iraq.[972] A minute from Mr Banner about the meeting reported that Prime Minister Maliki "expressed concern about the readiness of the Iraqi Security Forces, in terms of numbers, training levels and, in particular, equipment". Prime Minister Maliki had said that "the ISF were outgunned", citing an example in Najaf where he had been told by the Chief of Police that his 13,000 officers "had only 5,000 rifles between them".

1057. Following his visit, Mr Blair wrote to President Bush stating that ISF build-up "must be improved".[973] He continued:

> "… the basic point is: we need better, stronger ISF build-up. A strong centre will be a big help. But they also need equipment and intensive support. Therefore we need to do this even better and more strongly and test the robustness of the build-up. Iraqi MOI and MOD need real capability to make it happen. If we don't do this, we can't defeat the terrorists."

1058. Sir Nigel Sheinwald wrote to Mr Hayes on 23 May reporting Mr Blair's conclusions as a result of his visit.[974] On SSR, Mr Blair wanted action including:

- Drawing up a timetable with conditions setting out the potential path to MNF withdrawal. This should address the desire of Iraqis for clarity over two issues: that the MNF will stay until Iraqi security forces are capable of acting independently; and that the MNF will go once that has been achieved. Any timetable should include dates, but each one should be conditional on ISF build-up of capability and overall violence levels …
- We need to make sure that Iraqi forces really are capable of dealing with the threat, including from AQ … The Prime Minister heard a number of disquieting comments on this score from Iraqis and others. We therefore need a candid analysis of the gap between current capabilities and future requirements … and a plan for closing the gap …
- Turning around the situation in Basra … This will require … a larger role and presence for the Iraqi forces, working alongside UK forces … The Prime Minister hopes that the Defence Secretary will personally supervise the military aspects of this.
- Capacity-building for Iraqi Ministries. We need a paper setting out our and the US's current assistance to them, in terms both of advisers and equipment, and a plan for addressing additional gaps."

1059. DOP(I) met on 25 May.[975] Mr Blair said that the UK should focus on the development of the ISF, seeing progress in Basra, and support to the Iraqi Government on security and electricity provision in Baghdad. On the development of the ISF, he stated:

> "… the Ministry of Defence needed to look closely at the level of capability of the Iraqi forces. This should also look at the quality of training and provision of equipment … ensuring the ISF did have sufficient capability could make a very big difference to our strategic progress in Iraq."

1060. The MOD was asked to provide a paper on the capability and requirements of the ISF.

1061. On 25 May, during a working dinner with Dr Rice and Mr Steve Hadley, US National Security Advisor, Sir Nigel Sheinwald said that urgent action was needed on ISF capacity:

> "The numbers used by the MNF were suspect as they did not take account of substantial desertions. It was disappointing that there were still problems over equipment, as well as the known gaps in terms of command and control and running their own operations."[976]

1062. On 2 June, Sir Nigel chaired a meeting of the Iraq Strategy Group.[977] The Group had reviewed progress against the tasks commissioned by Mr Blair:

- Gen Casey was "preparing an Iraqi-fronted security statement in mid/late June" that "would announce the first wave of provinces to transition". The UK "favoured" an indication of what could be expected "over the next 18-24 months, but the US was cautious".
- The MOD was working on a "robust assessment of where things stood" with the ISF.
- Gen Casey was preparing a Security Plan for Basra (described later in this Section).
- GOC MND(SE) "intended to start detention operations in the next few days, and was working to increase the Iraqi face on security using the Iraqi Army". The Iraqis were currently participating in 40 percent of all patrols in Basra.
- The "FCO was pursuing a US analysis of the gaps in their support to the key ministries and DFID was pulling together an overview of UK support".

1063. On 7 June, the MOD submitted its assessment of the ISF's progress to the Cabinet Office.[978] Some of the key points were:

- The programme was on target to complete by December 2006 with 80 percent of the ISF trained and equipped (less the forces in Anbar province and the Air Force and Navy capability).
- Higher-level command and control, logistics, equipment husbandry and intelligence remained immature, but "significant improvement" was expected during 2006. MND(SE) had "some of the same issues" but they were "less acute" with 10th Division having received 97 percent of its "critical items".
- Of the Iraqi Army battalions and brigade/divisional headquarters, 50 percent were capable of planning, executing and sustaining counter-insurgency operations. The Iraqi people held the Iraqi Army "generally in high regard".
- The police were "some way behind" but "significant progress" was expected by the end of the year. Their effectiveness rested on their credibility with the Iraqi people, which was "increasing but remain[ed] an issue".
- Equipment shortfalls in the police were attributed to MOI "over-recruiting" police forces, by "possibly 9,000 to 10,000 … in the South alone". That was "reportedly to combat unemployment".
- "The ISF in MND(SE) should be capable of managing the threat that they will face but could be quickly undermined by poor leadership." The UK had trained 22,000 IPS officers out of an agreed number of 29,000.

1064. On the Basra Security Plan, the MOD wrote that "in seeking efficiencies to resource the new initiatives proposed in the Basra paper, it would be counter-productive to disrupt established projects in MND(SE) … to then re-invest in the same sectors". The FCO was exploring options to reduce the UK's commitment to the Jordan International Police Training College, which had the potential to save £3.5m "with minimal impact upon ISF capacity-building" although it "may meet with opposition in US quarters".

1065. Writing about the way ahead, the MOD report stated:

> "As the Iraqi security forces mature, Iraq's partners will need to put additional resources into areas such as the judiciary and courts which have been relatively neglected but which are critical to enforcing law and order as security forces. We need to caution against further growth in the size of the ISF whose size/shape has been designed to be affordable in the long run …
> "On the whole, the advice of the UK personnel is appreciated by not only the US, but more importantly the Iraqis. We must build on this influence, without negating the current good work that is being planned and will soon be implemented in Iraq. Additional resources (civilian official and extra CivPol) to aid Ministerial capacity-building, particularly in the Ministry of Interior, would be a key place to add value."

Iraqi Air Force progress

A Report by the Independent Commission on the Security Forces in Iraq published on 6 September 2007 stated that the Iraqi Air Force had a "meagre beginning and late start" compared with the Iraqi Army.[979] Development of the Iraqi Air Force was led by the Coalition Air Force Transition Team (CAFTT) which was part of MNSTC-I.

In June 2004, Maj Gen Houghton recorded that 148 air force personnel were in training.[980] Initially, the force would be 500 strong. An agreement had been established for the transfer of air transport and helicopters from Jordan.

In July 2005, Lt Gen Brims reported that it was "a long term project" and that there were "insufficient funds to even forecast when a plan might be considered".[981]

On 7 June 2006, the MOD produced an update on ISF progress.[982] On the Iraqi Air Force, progress had been made in the adoption of new structures and procedures. However, operational tasks were limited to reconnaissance and air transport, and equipment procurement had proved a challenge.

Initial recruits to the Iraqi Air Force were people who had served in the Air Force prior to the invasion.[983]

The main objectives of the Iraqi Air Force were:

- to organise, train and equip air operations;
- to conduct day/night/all-weather counter-insurgency operations; and
- to provide homeland capabilities to the Government of Iraq.

The Iraqi Air Force operated out of four bases:

- Al Muthanna Air Base which operated the Air Force's fixed wing capability;
- Taji Air Base which housed an interim Air Force Academy as well as most of the rotary wing assets; and
- Basra and Kirkuk Air Bases which focused on intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance capabilities.

The Iraqi Air Force transferred to Iraqi control in September 2006, under the command and control of the Joint Headquarters.[984]

[984] JIC Assessment, 17 January 2007, 'Iraqi Security Forces: Prospects in 2007'.

On 21 November, the Chiefs of Staff were briefed that the Iraqi Air Force would not be capable of external air defence until 2013.[985] Although funding was not an issue there were difficulties with poor quality personnel, anti-corruption mechanisms and bureaucracy in the IMOD. To increase the rate of development, the US was planning to double its CAFTT team to 232 personnel. The UK was contributing one Group Captain to the CAFTT and had provided some places on courses in the UK. An earlier request from MNSTC-I for the UK to provide flying instructors had been turned down as a result of airworthiness and safety concerns. The paper recommended increasing UK support to CAFTT and providing an RAF officer to the Iraqi JHQ.

1066. On 9 June, the JIC assessed:

> "The new government will take time to agree critical strategic security policy. Even if the Ministers of Defence and Interior prove capable and non-partisan, robust administrative capacity in these Ministries will take time to build. We judge there is likely to be only limited progress during the rest of this year in the face of a virulent insurgency and continuing sectarian violence. The need to absorb Shia militias will add to the challenges and could exacerbate sectarian tensions; but a failure to do so would undermine the authority of the government."[986]

An Iraqi security strategy

1067. Mr Browne visited Iraq from 18 to 22 June (as described earlier in this Section).[987] His Assistant Private Secretary recorded that "the main players from a security perspective (Maliki, Boulani (MOI) and Qader (MOD)) all seem determined to tackle problems previously skirted: corruption, militias, sectarianism".

1068. On 25 June, BBC News reported that Prime Minister Maliki had announced his plan for national reconciliation.[988] Some of the points dealing with SSR were:

- preventing human rights violations, reforming prisons and punishing those responsible for acts of torture;
- measures to strengthen Iraq's armed forces so they would be ready to take over responsibility for national security from the MNF;
- review of the armed forces to ensure they were being run on "professional and patriotic" principles;
- ensuring the political neutrality of Iraq's armed forces and tackling Iraq's militia groups; and
- review of the de-Ba'athification Committee to ensure it respected the law.

1069. On 17 July, Lt Gen Fry reported that MNSTC-I had made recommendations for changes to the ISF structures following concerns expressed by Prime Minister Maliki about the ISF's ability to tackle the current security situation.[989] Mr Maliki was reported to have:

> "… little confidence in the police and [he] thinks that the army should be greatly expanded. The view from MNF-I and MNSTC-I is that the currently planned ISF force structure is about the right size and properly balanced between the [Iraqi] MOD and the MOI."

1070. The main changes proposed were:

- The Iraqi Army should have a second Divisional HQ in Baghdad; one additional brigade in each of Diyala and Anbar; two additional battalions for 10th Division in Basra; an additional Special Operational battalion in Baghdad plus 400 armoured vehicles and a mobile armoured strike force.
- The National Police should have a "near-term reconstitution, to restore standards of training, discipline and leadership, and a two-year plan to reorganise and retrain them so that they evolve into a Carabinieri/gendarmerie force".
- To bring together existing units into a rapid response national counter-terror force overseen by the IMOD and a national strike force comprising a mechanised brigade, a Special Forces commando battalion and a National Police brigade.

1071. Lt Gen Fry reported that the key theme of the recommendations was "a better not bigger ISF, within budget" and that "we are close to an agreed ISF size and shape, revised in the light of experience to address the developing operational challenges".

1072. On 20 July, Mr Patey sent a valedictory prior to leaving Iraq.[990] He wrote:

> "Maliki knows he must reduce and eventually eliminate the power of the militias but does not feel he has sufficient forces at his disposal or cover within his political circles to do so whilst terrorism and the insurgency show no signs of abating. We are in a Catch 22; those insurgents who might consider joining the political process are unlikely to do so until the militias have been disbanded or disarmed. As long as AQ-I and other groups are bombing Shia markets and mosques the militias will continue to pose as a better security option than the ISF and to assuage the desire for revenge …
> "But the position is not hopeless … Our strategy must be to get the Iraqis to increasingly take the lead and responsibility. This will produce some uncomfortable > moments but in the long run is the only solution. Considerable progress has been made in building up Iraqi military capability and further significant milestones will be achieved by the end of the year. It should be possible to ensure that the Iraqi Government has a near monopoly of force by the time the coalition withdraws the bulk of our forces. Our ability to help them transform the National Police into a capable non sectarian force will be dependent on tackling the issue of militias. This in turn will be the key to bringing local police forces up to snuff although the civil institutions they report to will require considerably more work."

1073. On 27 July, the Iraq Strategy Group discussed whether there was "any better alternative to the current MNF-I strategy for building up the ISF and progressively transferring security to the Iraqis".[991] It agreed with the MNSTC-I view that they "should not give up on the Iraqi Police, notwithstanding the obvious problems"; that MOI reform remained a critical and urgent task; and that the Iraqi Army's ranks should be overfilled to bring them closer to 100 percent effective strength.

DEALING WITH THE MILITIAS

1074. Gen Jackson visited Iraq from 15 to 18 May 2006.[992] On the various unofficial and semi-official armed groups, he said:

> "Although not wholly in the purview of SSR, these armed groupings must either be disbanded or integrated into the national security structure. The militias pose by far the hardest challenge and before there is any chance of DDR or integration into the ISF, formal political engagement with the associated political leaders of these groups is required: a priority task for the new government."

1075. When they met on 22 May, Mr Blair asked Prime Minister Maliki how the issue of militias could be best addressed.[993] Mr Maliki "favoured extensive dialogue, including with extremists, so long as they had not shed Iraqi blood"; terrorists should "be dealt with forcefully". There was "a consensus on militias, which all parties had now agreed to disband" but it would be necessary to find alternative employment for current militia members.

1076. Mr Maliki also said that he recognised the importance of the Ministries of Interior and Defence being seen to be independent and non-sectarian. He hoped to have soon appointed independent Ministers "without militia links".

1077. During a wider discussion on ISF at DOP(I) on 6 July, the following point was raised:

> "While the numbers of ISF looked good on paper, anecdotal reports suggested that absenteeism and desertion brought those numbers down considerably. The Prime Minister had some sympathy with the view of Maliki and the US that we should consider increasing the size of the Iraqi Army. The countervailing argument was that it was the ability to use troops available effectively that was the real constraint on the ISF's effectiveness. In either case, there was a political argument for absorbing some of the militia forces into the ISF. The US was exploring the options but the potential costs had yet to be established."[994]

1078. No.10 wrote to the MOD on 10 July to report that Mr Blair was "very concerned at the recent attack statistics" from Iraq, particularly the "widely reported sectarian killings" in Baghdad.[995] Mr Blair judged that "overcoming the evident lack of engagement against the militias by the Iraqi Government and security forces is a major strategic task". As well as continuing to press the Iraqi Government to take action, it was important for the UK to "have a clearer view of what action is required, to complement and make up for the shortcomings of the current Baghdad and Basra security plans". In addition, he was concerned that the evidence demonstrated that the ISF were not as capable as had previously been assessed. No.10 asked for advice on addressing both of those issues.

1079. Mr Browne's Private Secretary replied to No.10 suggesting that the UK should press Prime Minister Maliki to:

- "re-emphasise publicly the theme of national unity";
- conduct a vigorous internal reform of the MOI;
- agree a four-step "militia engagement plan" comprising political engagement of figures with militia links, public engagement to establish popular support, military engagement to neutralise militia presence on the streets and a DDR process to absorb ex-militia members";
- overhaul the Baghdad Security Plan; and
- work with Muqtada al-Sadr to make him choose between politics and "populist adventurism".[996]

1080. On 16 July, Lt Gen Fry reported continuing concerns that in the MOI "the insidious effects of political and militia affiliations are beginning to compromise any claim it might have for institutional integrity".[997]

1081. Lt Gen Fry thought that Mr Boulani would need help to address those issues and reported that Gen Casey had commissioned the development of an internal reform programme for the Ministry.

1082. On 23 August, a JIC Assessment of the militias stated:

"Violence in Iraq is part of a vicious circle: deteriorating security has led to a proliferation of militias, in turn fuelling further violence. Prime Minister Maliki is […] unable to confront the militias, fearing a violent backlash that would threaten the break-up of the Shia political coalition (the UIA). Without significant progress on the National Reconciliation Plan and a sustained improvement in the security situation there will continue to be little appetite for the MNF plan for the Disarmament, Demobilisation and Reintegration of the Iraqi militias.

"Many militias are sectarian based and competing with the Iraqi state's security forces to provide security and protection for their own communities. They are undermining government authority. Some elements are engaged in violent attacks against their political and sectarian opponents and coalition forces. In some cases, the distinction between the armed gangs and the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) is blurred."[998]

1083. A US Report to Congress on 30 November stated that, in early October, Prime Minister Maliki had said that political parties should eliminate their militias or leave the government.[1001] It added:

> "However, personnel with sectarian agendas remain within key ministries, especially the Ministry of Interior. In addition, rivalries for the control of key resources and the central government's limited influence outside Baghdad undermine the Government of Iraq's ability to disband the militias …
> "Despite these legal and political prohibitions, militias and other small armed groups operate openly, often with popular support, but outside formal public security structures. These militias provide an element of protection for the populace, generally on a sectarian or political basis. This is especially true in areas where there is a perception that the Government of Iraq is unwilling or unable to provide effective security for the population. Some militias also act as the security arm of an organisation devoted to social relief and welfare, lending these armed groups further legitimacy. Their continued existence challenges the legitimacy of the constitutional government and provides a conduit for foreign interference. Controlling and eventually eliminating militias is essential to meeting Iraq's near- and long-term security requirements."

Transition to Iraqi control of security begins

1084. On 1 September, an eGram from the British Embassy Baghdad reported an "important step psychologically" for the Iraqi military: the Iraqi Ground Forces Command and IMOD would commence "a staggered handover" of command and control functions from MNF-I on 3 September.[1002] It would begin with the 8th Division and other divisions would follow at a rate of one every two weeks until the end of the year. The transfer of 10th Division was planned for January 2007and the final transfer, of the Ramadi Division, was planned for April. MNF-I forces were expected to retain responsibility for logistical support and development.

1085. The British Embassy Baghdad reported that "while the assumption of responsibility looks gradual and sensibly phased, in reality the pace will be demanding to both MNF-I and the IGFC [Iraqi Ground Forces Command]". As "life support and logistics capabilities" were "developing at their own, much slower, pace", it predicted that "IA Divisions will remain dependent on MNF-I for some time to come".

Ethno-sectarian diversity in the Iraqi Ministry of Defence

In its Reports to Congress, the US DoD monitored ethno-sectarian diversity in the IMOD.[1003] On 26 May 2006, it stated that the leadership of the IMOD, selected with MNSTC-I co-ordination, was majority Sunni.

On 29 August, Sunnis and Kurds were over-represented, in relation to the population, at higher command levels, though Shia commanders held the majority of command positions.[1004] That was reported to reflect the requirement for military experience, which Sunnis had obtained in the Iraqi Army before the invasion and Kurds had obtained through years of experience in the Peshmerga.

The composition of Iraqi Army divisions could be divided into two groups. The nationally recruited divisions (those with an odd number) were roughly representative of the country.[1005] The even numbered divisions, which had been recruited locally, initially as ICDC personnel then ING, were more homogenous.

Describing the composition of Iraqi Army divisions, the JIC recorded that "of the 10 Army divisions, three are heavily Shia (over 90 percent), a further three are Shia-dominated, two are mostly Kurdish and one is relatively mixed, which is unsurprising given that five are based on National Guard divisions recruited locally in 2003. Among the top three senior Army officer grades, representation broadly reflects the national confessional breakdown: Sunnis 20 percent; Shia about 50-60 percent; the Kurds 20-30 percent."[1006]

To increase diversity in the odd numbered divisions, the intent was for replacements from a national recruiting pool to join these units.[1007] Further army recruitment was done at the national level with IMOD policy strictly prohibiting unit commanders from hiring their own personnel and clearly requiring enlisted and commissioned personnel to attend national training schools to receive certification of their rank and duty speciality.[1008]

1086. On 3 November, the British Embassy Baghdad reported that a video conference between President Bush and Prime Minister Maliki had resulted in agreement to accelerate the pace of training the ISF, their assuming command and control and the transfer of security responsibility to the Iraqi Government.[1009]

1087. A High Level Working Group with three sub-committees was established to report on whether and how acceleration could take place in each area. The Working Group consisted of Gen Casey and Ambassador Khalilzad, along with the Iraqi National Security Adviser, Minister of the Interior and Minister of Defence.

1088. The Embassy reported that "Maliki is frustrated at what he feels is his lack of control over Iraqi security" but also that Gen Casey feared that "forcing the pace risks putting too much pressure on immature Iraqi systems and capabilities".

Iraqi Security Force assessments in late 2006

1089. Lt Gen Fry submitted his End of Tour Report on 28 August.[1010] He wrote:

> "The key indices of the development of the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) are regularly reported and show steady progress. There are some structural problems which, in the IA, will require an additional 52,000 soldiers to be trained, and in the IPS, will require the process of internal reform to be seen through. But these are regarded as running repairs to structures which are fundamentally sound in design and institutionally well-conceived. Given this positive background, the successive IA battalions which have disintegrated when placed under orders or actually deployed to operations outside their divisional area is disappointing. Disappointing, but probably not surprising. The month on month increase of numbers trained conceals organisations which remain very immature … Seen from MNSTC-I, this is entirely predictable at the 18 month point of a three year process and [Lieutenant General] Dempsey [Commander MNSTC-I] would assert that the ISF project is on track, so long as too much is not asked of it too soon …"

1090. Lt Gen Fry thought that the ISF would be tested over the next month. If they were successful he judged:

> "… the campaign will have negotiated a tricky period … But the stakes are high and failure would have implications for campaign progress, the place of the ISF in Iraqi society and the authority of the Maliki government. It is difficult to predict the outcome …"

1091. On 15 November, the JIC assessed:

> "MNF operations under the Baghdad security plan have had only temporary and local impacts: violence has been displaced and has increased overall. The ISF have been unable to sustain any improvements. Operations have exposed the patchy nature of Iraqi Army capability and the ineffectiveness of the Iraqi police. Prime Minister Maliki is attempting to address some of the problems: diplomatic reporting indicates he has ordered a purge of officers within the security Ministries involved in sectarian violence. The MOI claims that 3,000 police have been relieved of duty – although most are likely to be re-deployed elsewhere."[1011]

[1010] Minute Fry to PSO/CDS, 28 August 2006, 'SBMR-I End of Tour Report'.
[1011] JIC Assessment, 15 November 2006, 'Iraq: Risk of Deepening Sectarian Division'.

1092. A further JIC Assessment on 24 November stated:

"The UIA [United Iraqi Alliance] recognises the need to build ISF capabilities, but ISF credibility as impartial, national forces is being damaged by the main Shia factions entrenching their influence – and in some cases control – over state security structures. […] SCIRI's Badr Organisation is the most organised, placing its members in important positions within the Ministries […]. The Jaysh al Mahdi (JAM), largely under the control of Sadr, has been less systematic, but controls the police in many Shia areas through infiltration and intimidation. The relative influence of SCIRI/Badr and JAM in the ISF varies across the Shia areas of central and southern Iraq; their rivalry has led to serious violence in places, most recently in al-Amara.

"Shia militias provide protection and leverage to Shia political parties. In a climate of poor security and political uncertainty, we see no prospect that SCIRI/Badr, Sadr/JAM and others will willingly give up their power. Maliki has made some attempts to get rid of sectarian elements within the ISF […]. He says he is pursuing a strategy with the Sadrists to bind them more tightly into the political process while gathering the necessary political backing to take tough action against renegade JAM elements. […] By aligning himself with the Sadrists, Maliki risks alienating SCIRI/Badr."[1012]

Enabling the police to tackle crime

A Report to Congress on 30 November 2006 stated that the MOI's emphasis on tactical skills meant that little resource was left for training for or conducting criminal investigations.[1013] As a result, corruption and smuggling were becoming more organised and entrenched. The CPATT was seeking to address that by strengthening the Iraqi Major Crimes Task Force and the Major Crimes Unit. In addition, there were discussions between the MOI and MNSTC-I about improving Iraq's forensic investigative capabilities by adding several thousand forensic specialists to the police forces.

In November 2006, the British Embassy Baghdad produced a 'Police Forward Look' that suggested the UK's aim was to move its "assistance increasingly to higher-level mentoring and support".[1014] It identified seven work strands in Baghdad, a number of which were expected to transfer to an Iraqi lead during 2007:

- TIPS – CPATT was likely to move the hotline to the MOI "in the next few months". Without a significant increase in resources, the UK contribution (ArmorGroup) was judged to be unsustainable and it was recommended that it be drawn down by March 2007 "at the latest". Despite being "the UK's biggest success story", it "was not part of our original remit". TIPS is described earlier in this Section in the Box, 'TIPS hotline'.
- Forensics – the Baghdad laboratory and training academy were open with "significant" support from UK police officers and ArmorGroup. They aimed to be completely Iraqi-led by the end of 2007; the Basra equivalent was "now the priority".

[1013] Report to Congress, 30 November 2006, Measuring Stability and Security in Iraq.
[1014] Paper BE Baghdad, November 2006, 'Police Forward Look'.

- Intelligence – the NIIA should be "running successfully" by early 2009. It was currently "still in its infancy and was heavily dependent on British assistance". One UK police officer oversaw the entire programme.
- Capacity-building at the MOI – the UK would continue to provide Rule of Law and policing advice at a strategic level to the MOI through one or more high-level advisors.
- CPATT slots – to continue "for as long as is required". British officers held two positions in CPATT and a further two were desired over the next year.
- Hostage affairs – one officer whose role was to provide links into the Hostage Working Group and other US and MNF-I hostage recovery groups. It was a post that the UK could not "manage without" and any departing officer should be replaced "as rapidly as possible with another police officer from the UK with the relevant skill set". The role was described as "not a heavily loaded slot until hostage issues arise (as at present),[1015] when it involves long hours and a heavy workload".
- Chief Police Adviser – recommended that that role be returned to Baghdad following the transition to Provincial Iraqi Control in Basra "to oversee what should be a smaller and more strategic policing team". His role could double up with a senior role in CPATT.

Developing the Ministry of Interior and Iraqi Ministry of Defence

1093. Lt Gen Houghton described the focus on IMOD development (compared with the focus on the Ministry of Oil) in his 8 January 2006 weekly report to Gen Walker:

> "A coalition engagement plan that has 103 advisers in the MOD yet only six in the Ministry of Oil is not properly balanced."[1016]

1094. Mr Straw asked FCO officials for advice on Lt Gen Houghton's comments on the imbalance between coalition support for the Ministries of Defence and Oil.[1017]

1095. Mr Asquith replied to Mr Straw on 18 January.[1018] He advised that the IMOD had indeed received a "disproportionately" larger number of advisers than other ministries, for three reasons:

- unlike other ministries, the IMOD had been torn apart by the coalition and needed rebuilding from scratch;
- the importance of security issues; and
- its location in the Green Zone, which meant that advisers could work there relatively uninterrupted.

[1018] Minute Asquith to Foreign Secretary, 18 January 2006, 'Iraq: Capacity-building in Ministries'.

1096. A Cabinet Office paper on 13 June reported that the UK contribution to the Ministerial Transition Teams was:

- MOI: five international consultants (working in rotation) and two military officers. The focus was on management and administrative capacity-building, including strategic planning, improving administrative controls and accountability, clarifying the legal and constitutional framework and human resource management.
- IMOD: seven full-time advisers (MOD), including the Team Leader/Senior Advisor who was responsible for directly advising the Minister. The team focused on establishing a functional Secretariat, strengthening contracting procedures and developing the Inspector General Group.[1019]

1097. A Report to Congress on 30 November stated that the MOI "was currently assessed as being partly effective overall".[1020] The MOI Transition Team had "just over 100 advisers":

- Seven were from the US State Department.
- Three were from the US Department of Justice.
- 45 were from the US military.
- "just over a third" were contractors (Military Professional Resources Inc).
- The rest were non-US military and civilian personnel.

1098. The IMOD Transition Team contained "just under 50 advisers":

- The majority were contractors (Military Professional Resources Inc).
- Six were US military personnel.
- 12 were civilian advisers.

1099. A "similarly scaled effort" was provided at Joint Headquarters, with US military personnel making up roughly half and the rest split between US contractors and personnel from coalition countries.

1100. On 17 January 2007, the JIC repeated its concerns about the IMOD and the MOI but did note some small signs of improvement in the Ministries, stating:

> "The Ministerial Committee for National Security – chaired by [Prime Minister] Maliki – is taking on more strategic planning. The MOD has benefited from MNF engagement, performing better than the MOI. We judge that both ministries are better able to direct their forces, albeit inconsistently. Some efforts have been made to correct deep-seated problems. But the lack of united national political direction is reflected in Iraq's security machinery which remains largely un-coordinated and, we judge, only partially effective: undermined by personal and party rivalries, endemic corruption and the absence of a capable bureaucracy. This is unlikely to change significantly in the foreseeable future. […]

"Both the MOI and MOD still face significant difficulties in effectively administering their rapidly expanding forces … Corruption and sectarianism still permeate the MOI."[1021]

1101. Reports to Congress between November 2006 and March 2007 highlighted the work being undertaken to tackle corruption in the MOI:

- Internal Affairs: By the end of September 2006, 650 out of a total of around 1,000 MOI Internal Affairs officers had received specialised training. Training for all personnel was expected to be completed by March 2007.[1022]
- "Quicklook": A coalition-initiated, MOI-led police reform programme called "Quicklook" was launched in December 2006.[1023] It aimed to review all aspects of the performance and effectiveness of Iraqi police stations, beginning in Baghdad. It comprised visits by representatives from Police Affairs, Internal Affairs, Human Resources, Training and Administrative Directorates and was complemented by the PTTs.
- Dismissals: By August 2006, over 230,000 MOI employees had been screened by the Iraqi Police Screening Service, against Ba'ath Party records and Saddam Hussein-era criminal records.[1024] Possible positive hits numbered 5,300, leading to the dismissal of 74 personnel. By March 2007, there had been 1,228 dismissals with a further 2,143 dismissals pending.[1025] The screening process was severely hampered by its inability to check for militia links; to counter that, IPS recruits were required to take an oath of office denouncing militia influence and pledging allegiance to Iraq's Constitution.[1026]

The National Police

The DoD reported to Congress on 26 May 2006 that the Iraqi National Police had been created on 1 April 2006.[1027] The Minister of Interior signed an order to reorganise and merge the Police Commandos, the Public Order and Mechanised Police and the Emergency Response Unit to form a single force under a single headquarters.

An eGram from Mr Asquith on 7 December explained that the intention behind the National Police was to create a mixed ethno-sectarian force, filling the gap between the "provincial" IPS and the Iraqi Army in dealing with serious civil disorder and internal emergencies.[1028] The planned number of officers was 25,000 but it was currently staffed to "around 19,000". Almost all National Police personnel were deployed in Baghdad.

Mr Asquith reported that the National Police's first major deployment in June had been "disappointing" and the second "somewhat better" but capability concerns remained. In response, MNF-I and the MOI had initiated a comprehensive retraining and leadership programme, resulting in a reshuffle that attracted local and international press coverage. It was now in the second phase of retraining which was scheduled to run until September 2007. Officers would be retrained in police (as opposed to military) skills and "not released for duties until they are able to meet the required standard".

The MNF-I hoped that the retraining would also make "the NP [National Police] less susceptible to the influence and infiltration of the militias" but Mr Asquith noted: "Indeed, as so often with the ISF as a whole, leadership will be the key."

While the National Police's future role was undecided, the aim was to turn it into a "more aggressive, responsive, paramilitary-style force over the next five years", similar to the Italian Carabinieri (National Military Police). Plans for regionalising the force were dependent on the security situation in Baghdad, where the National Police would be crucial in maintaining public order once the US drawdown began.

A JIC Assessment issued on 9 June 2006 reported:

> "The more capable National Police, largely confined to the Baghdad region, have provided effective support to MNF counter-insurgency operations. But we judge that there are serious problems of corruption, criminality, and divided loyalties; elements have taken part in sectarian attacks and are prone to Shia militia influence."[1029]

A Report to Congress on 30 November 2006 stated that while the National Police had "proven useful in fighting the insurgency", frequent allegations of abuse and other illegal activities affected their credibility.[1030] A report in June 2007 stated that a four-phase transformation programme began in October 2006 to reorient the National Police towards police (as opposed to paramilitary) functions:

- Phase I: "Quicklook" inspections to improve overall readiness.
- Phase II: Standardised collective training, including added emphasis on human rights, Rule of Law and police ethics. Extensive re-vetting of currently serving officers, including ID checks, fingerprints, biometrics, a literacy test, and criminal intelligence background checks. There was no specific screening for militia affiliation.
- Phase III: An Italian led training plan based on the tactics, techniques and procedures of the Carabinieri.
- Phase IV: Forward positioning to train on contingencies such as security for pilgrimages, natural disasters and national emergencies.[1031]

By September 2007, the National Police Commander had relieved commanders of both of the divisions, all nine brigades and 17 of 27 battalions.[1032] The Report to Congress stated that despite those changes, sectarianism remained a significant problem within the National Police.

Reform of the Facilities Protection Service

1102. Facilities Protection Service (FPS) personnel were also implicated in violent crimes and other illegal activity.[1033] On 24 August 2006, Prime Minister Maliki announced that the majority of the FPS would be consolidated into a unified organisation accountable to the MOI.[1034] An early test case review of the Central Bank of Iraq's Protection Service suggested that 800 of the 1,800 employees on the payroll were either ghost employees or otherwise unfit for such employment.

1103. On 27 December, Prime Minister Maliki signed a consolidation directive that provided instructions to place all FPS personnel under the MOI, with the exception of the Ministry of Oil, the Ministry of Electricity and the Higher Juridical Council forces.[1035]

1104. Many Ministries resisted central control over their guard forces and continued to use the FPS as an employment opportunity for militia and sectarian interests.[1036]

1105. The draft Facility Protection Service Reform Act was still in limbo between the Council of Ministers and the Committee of Representatives at the point of UK military withdrawal more than two years later.[1037]

Creation of the Iraqi national counter-terrorism capability

On 10 October 2006, Prime Minister Maliki approved the establishment of an Iraqi national counter-terrorism capability, comprising:

- The development of a National Counter-Terrorism Bureau separate from the ministries, to act as the principal adviser to the Prime Minister on counter-terrorism matters.
- The establishment of a separate major command equivalent to the Iraqi Ground Forces Command to provide support to the National Counter-Terrorism Bureau in intelligence and targeting areas.

- The expansion of the Iraqi Special Operations Forces that would be commanded by the new counter-terrorism command. That expansion would include an additional commando battalion with forward-based commando companies in Basra, Mosul and al-Asad.[1038]

Iraq Forward Plan

1106. Following a discussion in the Iraq Strategy Group,[1039] a draft of a Forward Plan was sent to Mr Blair's Private Secretary by Mr Simon McDonald, FCO Director Iraq, on 24 November 2006.[1040] It was also sent in parallel to the FCO, the MOD and to SIS. The Forward Plan considered what more needed to be done to improve the chances of successful transition (there is more detail on the Forward Plan in Section 9.5).

1107. The Forward Plan assessed the key weaknesses of the ISF as:

- A lack of capacity and ineffective command and control arrangements, particularly at strategic and operational levels.
- Militia infiltration of the Iraqi Security Forces, in particular the Iraqi police force and other Ministry of Interior forces.
- The inability of Iraqi Ministry of Defence to apportion and release funding.
- Strategic and tactical level intelligence capabilities.
- Lack of Iraqi Security Forces logistic capacity and protected mobility.
- Lack of some heavier weapons such as machine guns."

1108. To address those concerns over three, six and 12 months, at both the national and the MND(SE) level, the proposals included:

- providing subject matter experts to the security Ministries;
- encouraging the Iraqi Government to address issues such as sectarianism;
- reforming corrupt elements of the police;
- enhancing the UK commitment to monitoring and mentoring 10th Division; and
- providing niche equipment.

1109. Responding to Mr McDonald, Mr Blair's Private Secretary reported that he had described the Forward Plan as "an excellent piece of work".[1041] The Private Secretary asked for it to be finalised and implemented.

1111. At DOP(I) on 7 December, Mr Browne reported that the security aspects of the Forward Plan were being implemented and that weaknesses in ISF capacity and in the Basra police were being addressed.[1043]

1112. The Inquiry has seen no other record of implementation against the Forward Plan's proposals.

Iraqi Air Force progress

In September 2007, the US Independent Commission on the Security Forces in Iraq (led by General James L. Jones and described later in this Section) concluded:

> "The Iraqi Air Force's relatively late establishment hampers its ability to provide much-needed air support to ground operations. It is well designed as the air component to the existing counterinsurgency effort, but not for the future needs of a fully capable air force. Though limited by the availability of properly skilled personnel, and by an inclination to value force size and acquisition over operational effectiveness, it is nonetheless progressing at a promising rate during this formative period."[1044]

In September 2007, the Iraqi Air Force numbered 1,100 personnel with 45 aircraft.[1045] There were plans to increase personnel to 3,000 and for the number of aircraft to increase to 80 by the end of 2007. Although the target of 3,000 personnel by the end of 2007 was not met (there were only 1,200), long-term ambitions grew and plans were developed to create an Iraqi Air Force of 12,000 personnel operating from 10 main bases and five secondary bases.

By 31 May 2010, there were 5,600 personnel with 106 aircraft.[1046] The US assessed that the "Minimum Essential Capability" required when US forces left in December 2011 was "to establish the capability to support COIN operations and put in place the building blocks necessary for the achievement of air sovereignty".[1047] The US assessed in August 2010 that the Iraqi Air Force was on track to meet this capability in all areas with the exception of airspace control and fixed wing airlift.[1048]

Focus on the Iraqi Army

1113. On 29 October 2006, Mr Blair wrote a minute to staff in No.10 entitled 'Iraq Plan'.[1049] On ISF development he suggested:

> "Rectify any weaknesses in training, equipment, pay and capacity of the Iraqi Army. This should be built up as a major force which everyone knows is superior to any other force. If we need to embed more of our officers to help, we should do it. We need to make the Iraqi MOD effective in paying soldiers.
> "A plan to pay off the worst aspects of the police, slim them down and change the command and control. All this is easier to do in the context of the growing Army power."

1114. In a Note to President Bush on 20 December, Mr Blair suggested three ways in which to support Prime Minister Maliki, the first of which was to:

> "… increase the speed of Iraqi Army command and control; training and equipment. They are the one reasonably solid force structure the Iraqi Government has. All our effort must be directed to building its capability."[1050]

1115. On 6 January 2007, Prime Minister Maliki delivered what Mr Asquith described as a "robust" speech at Iraq's Army Day event.[1051] Mr Maliki called for armed forces that were without political bias, cohesive in the national interest and protected from political interference and militia. Mr Maliki said:

> "We will not allow anybody to be an alternative to the state, whether the militias or anybody else, regardless of their affiliations … We will confront them firmly."

1116. On 14 January 2007, Mr Blair met Mr Robert Gates, US Secretary of Defence.[1052] Mr Blair was recorded as stating that the Iraqis needed "at least one institution of power which worked and supported the government". His advice to the US was to place a high value on building up Iraqi military capability.

Expansion of the Iraqi Security Forces

1117. On 10 January 2007, President Bush announced a change of strategy for Iraq, often referred to as "the Surge".[1053] This is explained in more detail in Section 9.5.

[1049] Note Blair, 29 October 2006, 'Iraq Plan'.
[1050] Note Blair to Bush, 20 December 2006, 'Note'.

[1053] The White House archive, 10 January 2007, President's Address to the Nation.

As well as increasing the number of US and Iraqi troops in Baghdad, President Bush announced a further focus on SSR:

> "In keeping with the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group [described in Section 9.5], we will increase the embedding of American Advisors in Iraqi Army units, and partner a coalition brigade with every Iraqi Army division. We will help the Iraqis build a larger and better-equipped army, and we will accelerate the training of Iraqi forces, which remains the essential US security mission in Iraq."

1118. On 17 January, the JIC produced an Assessment commissioned by the Iraq Senior Officials Group.[1054] It stated:

> "The success of new US plans will depend in part on the willingness of the Iraqi Government to take on sectarian and political militias. Maliki will not take action which risks breaking the Shia United Iraqi Alliance (UIA) and bringing down his government. Only a small proportion of the ISF are currently both willing and able to take on the Shia militias. In Baghdad the ISF will need support from MNF combat units beyond 2007. Similar support will be required in the Sunni Arab heartlands if de facto control of large areas is not to pass to the insurgents."

1119. The US view of what was necessary to stabilise the situation in Iraq was reflected in an assessment produced and published in January 2007 by the US National Intelligence Council.[1055] On the ISF it stated:

> "Despite real improvements, the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) – particularly the Iraqi police – will be hard pressed in the next 12-18 months to execute significantly increased security responsibilities, and particularly to operate independently against Shia militias with success. Sectarian divisions erode the dependability of many units, many are hampered by personnel and equipment shortfalls, and a number of Iraqi units have refused to serve outside of the areas where they were recruited."

1120. It also judged that if a rapid drawdown of coalition forces were to occur, the ISF "would be unlikely to survive as a non-sectarian national institution".

1121. Mr Blair met General David Petraeus, the new Commander MNF-I on 6 February.[1056] They discussed Iraq's security institutions and agreed that there were still problems with funding, equipment and key enablers such as intelligence. They also discussed the loyalty of the ISF and agreed that it was vital that the Iraqi Government was able to impose its authority. Gen Petraeus agreed to lobby the Government on matters such as a replacement commander for 10th Division if a solution was not forthcoming. Mr Blair said that the UK would stay in Basra Palace and do more training and mentoring.

[1056] Letter Banner to McNeil, 6 February 2007, 'Prime Minister's Meeting with David Petraeus'.

1122. The DoD reported to Congress on 2 March that over 40 Joint Security Stations in Baghdad would be established to "facilitate co-operation between coalition and Iraqi Forces and to build trust and confidence with the local population".[1057]

1123. The Report to Congress stated that the generation of MNSTC-I-agreed force levels as mandated under the Petraeus Plan was considered complete. Both the IMOD and the MOI had assumed control of most force generation tasks.

1124. A letter from Mr Browne, circulated to DOP(I) members ahead of a meeting on 10 May, commented that "we must build on examples like Anbar, once considered all but lost, where tribal leaders are now working with the coalition to drive out Al Qaida".[1058]

1125. Mr Browne said in discussion at the DOP(I) meeting that, in Anbar: "young Sunnis were queuing up to join the Iraqi Security Forces".[1059]

Machinery of Government under Mr Brown

Mr Gordon Brown took office as Prime Minister of the UK on 27 June 2007. In his initial Cabinet reshuffle, he appointed Mr David Miliband as Foreign Secretary and Mr Douglas Alexander as Development Secretary. Mr Des Browne remained as Defence Secretary until 3 October 2008.

Mr Brown reorganised the structure of Cabinet Committees. As well as discussions in Cabinet, Iraq business was formally addressed in the Overseas and Defence Sub-Committee of the Committee on National Security, International Relations and Defence (NSID(OD)). An additional sub-committee specifically on Iraq (NSID(IR)) was also established, but never met.

1126. In June, a proposal agreed by Prime Minister Maliki established an additional light infantry division, bringing the total planned force structure to 13[1060] divisions.[1061] That expansion was funded by the Iraqi Government, bringing the total IMOD expansion budget to US$950m. The development of the 14th Division which was to be raised in Basra is described further in Box, 'A new Iraqi Army division for Basra', later in this Section.

1127. Commenting in his valedictory on 16 August 2007, Mr Asquith said:

> "The surge has failed to create the space for politics to work because the military (tactical) successes (local security structures loyal to the MNF) conflict directly with the political objective (inclusive and integrated national Iraqi authority)."[1062]

[1062] Letter Asquith to Miliband, 16 August 2007, 'Iraq: Valedictory'.

1128. Mr Asquith told the Inquiry:

> "Personally, I was sceptical that the surge would be effective and was unsure whether the real objective of agreeing the local cease-fires with some of the Sunni Arab areas' tribal leaders was designed to minimise the casualties of US forces or was really designed to build them into the political process. My suspicions were that the first objective … was probably a more important one in the minds of the military planners, and I was sceptical that they would be successful in persuading, particularly the Sunni Arab tribal leaders, to be loyal to a Shia-led government in Baghdad.
> "I think in retrospect I was wrong and I think the surge did produce what General Petraeus was seeking to achieve by it, not just to create the sort of breathing space for some politics to work, but that it did, more sustainably than I assumed, quieten those areas which were extremely violent."[1063]

Iraqi border police progress

The DoD reported on 2 March 2007 that MNSTC-I had trained 28,400 Department of Border Enforcement (DBE) and Port of Entry (POE) personnel and that the DBE was supported by 28 Coalition Border Transition Teams.[1064]

Later in the year a joint DBE and MNSTC-I five-year plan was developed to bring the total number of constructed border forts and annexes to 723[1065] and to increase the personnel requirement to 46,000.[1066]

On 6 September, the Independent Commission on the Security Forces in Iraq reported to Congress its conclusion that:

> "Iraq's border security forces are generally ineffective and need more equipment, training, and infrastructure before they can play a significant role in securing Iraq's borders. The Department of Border Enforcement suffers from poor support from the Ministry of Interior. Overall border security is undermined by the division of responsibilities between the Ministry of Interior and the Ministry of Transportation. Corruption and external infiltration of the border security forces are widespread, and the borders are porous."[1067]

On 18 December 2008, the JIC assessed that the DBE "suffer from departmental underinvestment and corruption" and "are unable to protect Iraq's borders".[1068]

By August 2010, the DBE had 40,000 personnel and operated out of 657 forts and annexes.[1069] It was estimated that over 60,000 personnel would be required to staff the planned number of forts.

The justice sector

1129. The minutes of DOP(I) on 30 March 2006 recorded that in discussion it was stated:

> "Work was needed to identify what was required to build Iraqi judicial capacity … Building up the Iraqi judicial system would take significant commitment and resources. Was it currently assigned a high enough priority in HMG's [Her Majesty's Government's] long term plans?"[1070]

1130. On 23 May, a junior official in IPU emailed the British Embassy Baghdad to ask if there were any "gaps" that could be addressed in the justice sector through the 2007/08 GCPP bid.[1071] The official wrote that the FCO, the MOD and DFID agreed it could become "the weak link in the Rule of Law chain" and undermine the SSR effort.

1131. A junior official in Baghdad replied on 25 May, agreeing that "the justice sector has been and continues to be 'the missing link'".[1072] He wrote that the US was "looking to spending hundreds of millions of dollars in the justice sector", covering judicial personal security, courthouse security and administration, expanding Central Criminal Court of Iraq capacity and forensic training for judges. The EU JustLex programme (see Box, 'EU integrated police and Rule of Law mission for Iraq', earlier in this Section) had been extended recently and the EU Commission had €40m for "Governance" programmes.

1132. Looking at what the UK could provide, the official wrote that a Rule of Law Sectoral Working Group, chaired by the Chief Justice, had produced a "unified" strategy. The Chief Justice had advised that the Iraqi system did not want:

- more "short training courses in generic human rights issues in foreign locations" – those took judges "away from their day jobs" for too long and further training for existing judges should be considered;
- "more Western advisers" – due to language and access barriers; or
- more "soft" assistance – the UK had "published at great expense a number of pamphlets, CDs, training packages and other materials. Often these have not been used effectively, if … at all".

1133. The official added:

> "In essence, the Iraqis don't want to be told what they should do, or what their rights are: they want concrete assistance to help them do what they know they should do, or help make those paper rights a reality."

[1070] Minutes, 30 March 2006, DOP(I) meeting.

[1072] Email FCO [junior official] to IPU [junior official], 25 May 2006, 'Rule of Law – The Justice Sector'.

1134. The official's view was that nothing "meaningful" had been done since the 2004 International Legal Assistance Consortium (ILAC) project (described in Box, 'International Legal Assistance Consortium', earlier in this Section). The official recommended funding an expansion of the Judicial Training Institute to improve the capacity and quality of training for new judges. Current facilities were too small to accommodate enough students, textbooks were "insufficient", there were no computers and most lecturers did not receive payment.

1135. A junior official in DFID reported to Mr Benn on 30 June that the success of the Rule of Law Sectoral Working Group had been "limited":

> "The Working Group struggles to function effectively under a weak chair (the Chief Justice). He lacks the resources to manage the administrative workload and has requested support from donors."[1073]

1136. To help overcome that, the official wrote that DFID was providing £93,000 for an experienced Iraqi lawyer to support the Chief Justice, as recommended by the FCO in Baghdad, believing that that "modest investment" could "have a significant impact across the sector".

1137. On 8 January 2007, Mr Banner wrote to Mr Irfan Siddiq, Private Secretary to Mr David Miliband, the Foreign Secretary, to commission advice on the current state of the Iraqi justice system, including the degree of governmental interference and how that might realistically be addressed.[1074]

1138. Mr Siddiq replied with a paper produced by the IPU and the British Embassy Baghdad on 16 February.[1075]

1139. The paper reported that there were 850 judges in Iraq; 150 of those were in Baghdad. There was "widespread recognition" that that number needed to increase by between 500 and 600 to "alleviate the backlog of cases". There were 178 judges expected to graduate from the Judicial Training Institute in June 2007 and another 58 in June 2008.

1140. Governmental interference with the judiciary remained a concern. Citing recent examples of that, it was recommended that the UK and the US should "protest vigorously" in such circumstances. The UK had part-funded two upcoming conferences in Iraq that would promote the principles of the Rule of Law and the importance of judicial independence.

[1075] Letter Siddiq to Banner, 16 February 2007 attaching Paper British Embassy Baghdad/Iraq Policy Unit, 'Iraqi Justice System'.

1141. Militia influence and intimidation remained "a grave threat"; 23 judges had been killed in the past three years and "many more" had been kidnapped or threatened. Security measures were being provided to the judiciary and other measures were being installed at courthouses. FPS had proved "ineffective", having been infiltrated by militias.

1142. The FCO paper sent by Mr Siddiq was provided to members of DOP(I) for their meeting on 8 March.[1076] It stated that there were issues related to judicial capacity, security, a backlog of cases (with between 7,500 and 12,500 detainees being held pre-trial by the Iraqi authorities) and governmental interference. It made a series of recommendations, including those mentioned in the Better Basra Mark III plan (described later in this Section). Other recommendations included:

- making it clear that governmental interference was not acceptable (when there is evidence of it having occurred);
- a visit to Baghdad by Lord Goldsmith to emphasise the importance of the Rule of Law;
- EU and UN action to support the principles of the Rule of Law and judicial independence; and
- the provision of security to judicial officials and witnesses.

1143. In discussion at DOP(I) it was suggested that the UK should:

- find ways to address as a matter of urgency the large numbers of detainees;
- take advantage of being able to act under the UNSCR mandate while it was still in place;
- consider what assistance the UK could give to the Rule of Law Green Zone[1077] initiative; and
- increase efforts on the Rule of Law and police reform in Basra.[1078]

1144. A Report to Congress on 2 March referred to the US-funded "criminal justice complexes" which comprised a courthouse, detention facilities, forensic labs and judicial housing within the same secure perimeter.[1079] The first complex was to be developed at Rusafa in Baghdad.

1145. The following day, Mr Asquith recorded a request from Gen Petraeus for a UK military/government lawyer and a criminal investigator to assist in the Rule of Law Green Zone.[1080]

1146. The establishment of the Rule of Law Green Zone was discussed at a meeting between Mr Miliband, Lord Goldsmith and Mr Browne on 7 March and was described as "promising".[1081]

1147. Baroness Scotland, Lord Goldsmith's successor, visited Iraq from 19 to 21 November.[1082] The purpose of her visit was to "emphasise the importance of the Rule of Law and the independence of the judiciary". She summarised that there was "a long way to go to establish the Rule of Law in Iraq" and although her message was well received there was a need to "ensure that those words are met with action". She stated:

> "I was very much struck that there was a genuine lack of leadership and understanding of where the responsibility for driving forward the Rule of Law agenda lies within the Government of Iraq. It seemed to be the responsibility of everyone and the responsibility of no-one!"

1148. A Report to Congress on 14 December 2007 stated that the previous September, Prime Minister Maliki had signed an executive order requiring humane treatment of detainees and more expeditious processing of their cases.[1083] The order directed a Ministerial Committee for Rule of Law and Detention, consisting of senior representatives from the relevant ministries, to meet weekly and address issues.

1149. On 20 December, a junior FCO official submitted advice to Mr Miliband about working more closely with the US to reduce the number of their Iraqi detainees.[1084] The official wrote that the Ministerial Committee had "been taking steps to improve Iraqi procedures for detainee handling, but progress [was] slow".

1150. The official stated that detainees were "frequently subject to abuse", mainly in MOI facilities, "often to obtain confessions". The Ministry of Justice's prisons suffered from "severe overcrowding". The official wrote:

> "Through a combination of negligence, incompetence, poor co-ordination and lack of adequate facilities it can take a long time to process detainees through the investigative, judicial and correctional systems."

1151. The Stabilisation Fund was introduced in July 2007, effectively replacing the GCPP for the funding of SSR projects in Iraq (see Section 13.1).[1085] The Stabilisation Fund was owned by the MOD but was jointly managed with the FCO and DFID.

1152. In a bid prepared for the Iraq Stabilisation Programme Board in February 2008, £3.18m was proposed for the justice sector:

- £1.65m assisting the US-led Rule of Law complex – a senior political adviser, a court administrator and a defence counsel;
- £1.04m supporting the Ministerial Committee – one senior adviser and a support officer; and
- £0.49m for a Basra justice adviser.[1086]

Mid-2007 assessments of the Iraqi Security Forces

1153. On 27 June 2007, the JIC provided an update on the ISF.[1087] It recorded little change from the January paper described earlier in this Section. Development of the Iraqi Army was still described as "slow" and the IPS remained "ineffective". The security Ministries were also judged to be "underperforming". The assessment recorded:

> "Work is under way by Prime Minister Maliki's government to develop a national security strategy, but it is unlikely to make a difference to Iraq's security as long as the government remains factionalised and fails to make progress on national reconciliation […]"

1154. On 4 July, a DIS paper looked at future Iraqi security structures.[1088] It said:

- The plethora of security groupings with unique command and control mechanisms will continue to expand, and could destabilise the complex national security environment. This expansion provides an opportunity for furthering sectarian agendas and potential higher levels of intra-ISF conflict.
- Duplication of responsibilities and expanding remits of strategic authorities will continue as incumbent Prime Ministers seek practical solutions to national security threats. Sectarian bias will shape these bodies and they will circumvent the chain of command.
- The amalgamation of Shia militias into national security structures ensures that future Iraqi security strategy will be overwhelmingly Shia-based. This will lead to continued Sunni marginalisation, a justification for Sunni nationalist insurgents and a spur for AQ-I intent."

[1088] Paper DIS, [undated, stamped 4 July 2007], 'Future Iraqi Security Structures and Environment'.

1155. The JIC Assessment of 6 September included an update on ISF performance.[1089] It reported that:

> "We judge Iraqi confidence, both among Ministers and more generally, has been damaged by the popular perception that security has not significantly improved.
> "… The government has taken some steps to address human rights abuses: sacking 23 senior National Police Commanders and disbanding an entire battalion accused of complicity in sectarian acts. But other individuals accused of sectarian abuses remain in positions of responsibility."

Counting the police

With the passage of time it was becoming increasingly difficult to know how many police officers trained by CPATT were still employed by the MOI, or what percentage of police on the MOI payroll were trained and equipped by CPATT.[1090] That was caused by a number of factors:

- the lack of an effective personnel management system in the MOI;
- a high attrition rate (about 20 percent per year, with the MOI reporting paying death benefits for more than 6,000 police officers since May 2003); and
- burgeoning local recruitment.

Provincial Governors had authority to hire more IPS officers than MNSTC-I had agreed to train and equip. In those areas, the MOI and the Provincial Governors were responsible for the extra training and equipment requirements. As police were generally unwilling to move areas, it was not possible for extra officers to be moved to areas where there was a deficit.[1091]

Many of the additional police had received little or no training.[1092]

US views on the progress of Iraqi Security Forces

1156. In May 2007, the Independent Commission on the Security Forces in Iraq was established in the US. It was led by General James L. Jones, a retired US Marine, who had previously served as the Supreme Allied Commander Europe and subsequently held the post of US National Security Advisor from 2009 to 2010. Included in the team of 20 was ACC Duncan McCausland, a serving PSNI officer.[1093] The Commission was tasked with assessing the capability of the ISF; their ability to maintain Iraq's territorial integrity, deny international terrorists safe haven, reduce sectarianism and bring greater security in the next 12 to 18 months.

[1089] JIC Assessment, 6 September 2007, 'Baghdad Security Plan: Impact and Prognosis'.
[1090] Report to Congress, 29 August 2006, Measuring Stability and Security in Iraq.

[1092] Report to Congress, 2 March 2007, Measuring Stability and Security in Iraq.
[1093] Report, 6 September 2007, 'The Report of the Independent Commission on the Security Forces of Iraq'.

1157. On 6 September, the Commission reported that the ISF's progress was "uneven" but "that there should be increasing improvement in both their readiness and their capability for the internal security of Iraq". The ISF "would not be able to secure Iraqi borders against conventional military threats in the near term". Whilst assessed as "severely deficient" in combat support, there was "clear evidence of developing the baseline infrastructure that leads to the successful formation of a national defense capability".

1158. The Commission judged that the Iraqi Army was capable of taking over an increasing amount of combat responsibilities from coalition forces, but the ISF would be "unable to fulfil their essential security responsibilities independently over the next 12-18 months".

1159. The Commission's conclusions on the MOI and its forces were less positive:

> "The Ministry of Interior is a ministry in name only. It is widely regarded as being dysfunctional and sectarian, and suffers from ineffective leadership. Such fundamental flaws present a serious obstacle to achieving the levels of readiness, capability, and effectiveness in police and border security forces that are essential for internal security and stability in Iraq."

1160. The Report went on describe the IPS as "fragile", "underequipped" and "compromised by militia and insurgent infiltration", although it assessed that the IPS could improve rapidly should the MOI become more functional. Of the National Police, the Report stated that it was "not viable in its current form".

1161. On 10 and 11 September, Gen Petraeus testified to Congress, warning of the dangers of handing over to ISF too early.[1094] He did note that "despite their shortages, many Iraqi [Army] units across Iraq now operate with minimal coalition assistance".[1095]

1162. A Report to Congress on 14 September stated that, by July 2007, Iraqi Army divisions had been at about 103 percent of authorised strength, but that masked the extremely low proportion that were present for duty.[1096] Officer ranks were a particular concern, with manning levels of only 69 percent.

1163. A Report to Congress on 14 December 2007 stated that authorised ISF personnel numbers were increasing as a result of three factors:

- successful offensive operations and local awakenings providing a new pool of recruits in a wider range of communities;
- the incorporation of around 100,000 FPS personnel; and [1094] Testimony to Congress Petraeus, 10-11 September 2007, 'Report to Congress on the Situation in Iraq'.

[1096] Report to Congress, 14 September 2007, Measuring Stability and Security in Iraq.

- the number of required forces assessed to match Iraq's security problems increasing.[1097]

1164. The Report said that nearly 500 officers and 2,000 non-commissioned officers from the former regime had been vetted successfully and had rejoined the Iraqi Army. Those personnel had to undergo a three-week "rejoining" course. Up to 1,500 former officers and 13,000 former non-commissioned officers were expected to re-enter the force.

1165. Those additions brought the total ISF planned strength to over 550,000.

1166. The DoD stated that analysis of future force structure requirement projects at the end of 2007 suggested the following force sizes in 2010:

- Iraqi Army – 261,000 to 268,000;
- Iraqi Air Force – 5,000;
- Iraqi Navy – 1,500;
- Iraqi Special Forces – 4,000;
- MOI Forces – 307,000 to 347,000;
- Total: 601,000 to 646,000.

Multi-National Security Transition Command – Iraq reorganisation

On 1 January 2008, MNSTC-I reorganised into the following directorates and teams:

- Directorate of Defence Affairs, led by a US Air Force Brigadier. It incorporated the IMOD and JHQ Transition Teams, CMATT (renamed as CArmyATT), the Coalition Air Force Transition Team (CAFTT), and the Maritime Strategic Transition Team (MaSTT).
- Directorate of Internal Affairs, led by a US Army Major General.
- Intelligence Transition Team, led by a DoD civilian intelligence professional.
- Iraqi National Counter-Terrorism Transition Team, led by a US Navy Rear Admiral.
- Functional Capabilities Directorate focusing on developing Iraqi capacity and providing subject matter experts on force management, personnel acquisition and management, material acquisition, resource management, sustainment, training and development.[1098]

The UK continued to provide two one-star military officers to MNSTC-I, in addition to the civilian team in the IMOD and the contractors in the MOI.

Improvements in Iraqi Security Force capability during 2007 and 2008

1167. From late 2007 onwards the security situation across Iraq improved, as detailed in Section 9.6. Alongside that reduction in threat, ISF capability began to grow, as judged by the JIC in its 20 December Assessment.[1099] Although it reiterated previous concerns about the MOI and the ISF, it judged:

> "… the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) are in a much better position than six months ago, partly because of an overall improvement in capability and partly because of a reduction in threat. The prospects for them being able to successfully manage security outside Baghdad, without MNF ground support, by the end of 2008 will continue to be patchy across Iraq and depend heavily on progress being made on national reconciliation and the maintenance of MNF-led security gains. Neither is guaranteed."

1168. On 5 June 2008, the JIC judged that the ISF were "much better placed to manage security through 2008".[1100] On Prime Minister Maliki's influence on the ISF, the JIC wrote:

> "In the last year he has been increasingly dictating where, when and how Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) are deployed. Security policy decisions more widely are increasingly being taken without reference to the coalition …
> "We assess that Maliki maintains a firm grip on decision making within Iraq's security Ministries. He has further increased his personal control of ISF …
> "We judge that in most cases this greater autocracy has increased overall ISF cohesiveness and responsiveness."

1169. On 10 September, the JIC assessed the future of JAM:

> "… military pressure and Sadr's order for his followers to avoid further conflict with Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) in March forced JAM to surrender its control of the streets in large parts of Basra, Baghdad and Al Amara. ISF now dominate the vast majority of these areas, in many cases for the first time in years."[1101]

1170. On 18 December, the JIC described the Iraqi Army as "an increasingly effective force at all levels", with the National Police approaching a similar capability.[1102] However, despite general improvements, the JIC judged:

> "… local police remain ineffective, due to a lack of resources, militia infiltration and corruption. Law enforcement is also undermined by an overstretched and under performing judiciary. These weaknesses will inhibit the normalisation of Iraqi society and real stability for years to come."

1099 JIC Assessment, 20 December 2007, 'Iraqi Security Forces: Two Steps Forward'.

1101 JIC Assessment, 10 September 2008, 'Iraq: the Future of Jaysh al-Mahdi'.
1102 JIC Assessment, 18 December 2008, 'Iraqi Security Forces: Mixed Abilities'.

1171. On the balance of power between the police and the army, the JIC stated:

> "The army cannot provide local security or enforce the law while it remains focused on COINOPS [counter-insurgency operations], and its method of operation – checkpoints, barriers, destruction of property – are unsuited to the task. Until the IPS and the justice system are improved and purged of militia influence and corruption, Iraq will need to choose between army methods and a police force that is incapable."

The Sons of Iraq

1172. From 2006, a number of local militias and neighbourhood watches began co-operating with the MNF in Baghdad and Anbar province, acting as additional security forces in the fight against AQ-I. They were known originally as "Concerned Local Citizens" and subsequently as the "Sons of Iraq" (described in more detail in Section 9.6). In a report to Congress, the DoD stated:

> "The Sons of Iraq are a key component of the counterinsurgency fight due to their knowledge of the local populace and their ability to report activity that might otherwise escape the attention of coalition and Iraqi forces."[1103]

1173. On 25 April 2007, an eGram from Mr Asquith reported that AQ was "determined to prove that they can still operate (against Shia and Sunni targets) and to exacerbate sectarian violence" in Baghdad.[1104] They were yet to feel the "full effect" of the Baghdad Security Plan;[1105] that was expected by the end of June.

1174. Outside Baghdad, Mr Asquith said, the success of turning the Sunni resistance and tribal groups against AQ had been "more rapid than expected". He reported that the groups were confronting AQ with increasing aggression, and "whereas previously the whole eastern aspect of [Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province] was AQ controlled, this is now reduced to a few blocks".

1175. Mr Asquith wrote that Emergency Response Units had been established to help maintain security, with three units in Ramadi so far and a further 14 planned later in the year. There was also local appetite for the creation of similar resistance groups in other regions; the Baghdad district of Abu Ghraib had seen around 1,200 individuals reporting for recruitment in a single weekend.

1176. On 22 April, it was agreed at the MCNS that Prime Minister Maliki would chair a group (to include MNF-I) to determine what the Iraqi Government would be prepared to offer to opposition and resistance groups in exchange for renouncing violence.[1106]

1177. Acting Assistant Chief Constable Michael Colbourne became the Chief Police Adviser in autumn 2006. In his bi-weekly report on 31 May 2007, he wrote that Prime Minister Maliki had passed an order permitting the creation of Police Support Units, attempting to win the allegiance of "middle of the road militias".[1107] Members of a Police Support Unit were paid 75 percent of a policeman's wage and were provided with uniforms. They were not armed as Mr Maliki reportedly believed that they had "enough weapons of their own". The new units did not receive the full basic recruit training and were expected to be in place for a maximum of 18 months.

1178. In his bi-weekly report on 18 June, ACC Colbourne wrote that Police Support Units had been created "in the usual rushed and hurried way".[1108] He commented:

> "The Iraqis are not on board with this and our MOI counterparts are opposed to it.
> "The reputation of the police as a whole may be badly damaged by the arming of the militia and calling them policemen. The MOI are not equipped to undertake yet another 'good idea' that the coalition is trying to push through."

1179. ACC Colbourne suggested that the Police Support Units could be moved under the IMOD's control and trained as a "National Guard": "There are many positives to separating this from the MOI and putting it under the [Iraqi] MOD."

1180. On 14 June, Mr Banner reported to Mr Blair:

> "The US are … focused on the Anbar model, but this is creating real tension with Maliki. Violence continues to be down in Anbar, but the motivations of the tribes remain unclear, and they continue to express their opposition to the Government of Iraq. Nor do they tie in to any convincing, wider, Sunni leadership … Maliki is … coming under pressure from other Shia over the creation of a well-armed Sunni militia, particularly as the US now propose to extend the model to areas of Baghdad …
> "The Pentagon this week also released its now regular quarterly report on progress in Iraq. This noted that overall levels of violence in the country had not decreased since the start of the surge, noted that the GoI's delivery had been 'uneven', and that it had made 'little progress' on the political front – reconciliation was described as a 'serious unfulfilled objective'."[1109]

1181. In an interview with Newsweek on 15 June, Prime Minister Maliki said:

> "Now, some field commanders make mistakes since they do not know the facts about people they deal with. They make mistakes by arming tribes sometimes, and this is dangerous because this will create new militias … I believe that the coalition forces do not know the backgrounds of the tribes. It is a job of the [Iraqi] government."[1110]

1182. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Mr Asquith recalled:

"From the second half of 2006 and certainly through 2007, the American attitude moved … to engage some Sunni Arab tribes in the Sunni Arab provinces to throw off the militias and Al Qaida groups that were positioned there, and to engage in local cease-fires, with the aim, in time, of those local cease-fires spreading more broadly across the country."[1111]

1183. In an email to the FCO on 14 June 2007, Mr Asquith wrote that Mr Blair and ACM Stirrup had requested further advice from Baghdad on coalition support for the Anbar tribes.[1112] He wrote:

"… I do not doubt the tactical benefit of engaging those in Anbar and other Sunni areas in which AQ operate with the purpose of persuading them to turn against AQ. Nor do I have any reason to doubt MNF-I assessments that this engagement has delivered significant results in terms of identifying AQ operatives and caches, restricting AQ operating capabilities and reducing attacks … against coalition forces. Engaging with local armed, militant, insurgency or opposition groups was of course what I and others were engaged in throughout 2005. I am not opposed to the principle."

1184. Nevertheless, Mr Asquith questioned whether those groups had turned against AQ for wholly ideological reasons. He thought the groups were more strongly motivated by a power struggle with AQ, which was encroaching on the tribes' territory, by money or by a desire – under the protection of US forces – to rearm and prepare for a future campaign against Iran and/or the "Shia government".

1185. Mr Asquith considered that that had had an adverse effect on the Coalition's broader reconciliation strategy. It increased Prime Minister Maliki's concerns and put him "under severe pressure from his Shia constituency who pose the question: why is he tolerating the creation of what effectively are Sunni militias who pose a threat (now or later) to Shia communities, while at the same time tolerating regular coalition attacks on Shia militias?"

1186. Mr Asquith acknowledged:

"Given the imperative for [Gen] Petraeus to deliver something by 13 September … we can't halt the engagement process. We should instead seek to shape it in a way that reduces the risk."

[1112] Email Asquith to Casey, 14 June 2007, 'Anbar Engagement'.

1187. Mr Asquith suggested a number of approaches to reduce the risk of Anbar tribes derailing reconciliation efforts. They included support for an Executive Council (through which the integration of militia groups should be managed), establishing political tests for the militia to demonstrate support for the Iraqi Government, and enforcing clear time limits for their existence before being disbanded or incorporated into the IPS.

1188. On 16 June, Mr Asquith reported that he had discussed those proposals with Dr Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraqi National Security Adviser, at a meeting that day and that Dr al-Rubaie had agreed with the approach.[1113]

1189. On 21 June, Mr Asquith reported that the concept of an Executive Committee was "beginning to take on substance with Maliki in receipt of a Presidency paper setting out how they propose it should work to which he will respond".[1114]

1190. In his weekly report on 24 June, Lieutenant General Graeme Lamb, SBMR-I from September 2006 to July 2007, wrote:

> "An increasing number of tribes, neighbourhoods, Sunni insurgents and just local people are choosing to reject, occasionally terminally, AQ-I. This is seen particularly in the Southern Baghdad belts where, for example in one area there has been an 80 percent reduction in IEDs … This 'people power' is extending to Salah ad Din, Diyala, Ninawa and of course is already in full effect in Al Anbar. In smaller, but notable cases, we are seeing the same effect in Baghdad itself, so the broader 'awakening' continues to make ground."[1115]

1191. On 4 July, a DIS report stated:

> "Central government will remain extremely sceptical of Sunni tribal initiatives in provinces with mixed sectarian demographics. The Shia-dominated government fears these could lead to the return of Sunni rule, and will ensure there are mechanisms to minimise this risk."[1116]

1192. In his weekly report on 6 August, Lieutenant General William Rollo, SBMR-I from July 2007 to March 2009, wrote that the Government of Iraq had accepted 1,700 former Sunni fighters in Abu Ghraib into the IPS.[1117] That was the first time that the government had taken steps to incorporate the Sunni militia from areas outside the Sunni tribal regions into the MOI. Lt Gen Rollo described that as a "significant concession by the GOI [Government of Iraq] … [and] potentially a major win that will reassure other Sunnis who have come into the fold that the GOI genuinely intends to 'see them right'".

1193. On 20 December, the JIC assessed:

> "77,000 Concerned Local Citizens (CLCs) and other tribal 'awakenings', drawn from the Sunni insurgency and, to a much lesser extent, from Shia militias, are now acting as force multipliers for MNF and ISF in Baghdad and along the Euphrates and Tigris valleys north of Baghdad. The MOI continue to resist assuming formal responsibility for these volunteers (including paying them). If their payments stopped we judge that many would resume attacks on the MNF and ISF. Their loyalty to central government is likely to remain patchy in the absence of broader national reconciliation; we judge they are likely to become an increasingly attractive target for infiltration by both Sunni and Shia extremists."[1118]

1194. On 8 January 2008, Air Marshal Stuart Peach, Chief of Defence Intelligence, briefed the Chiefs of Staff that there were plans to integrate 20 percent of the Concerned Local Citizens into the ISF, with the remainder being available for hire by other ministries for public works programmes.[1119] US funding was due to expire in January 2008 and future funding arrangements were unclear. He noted that failure to address the issue could lead to resentment and a return to violence among former Sunni fighters but that provision for Concerned Local Citizen salaries would probably be opposed by a number of Shia groups.

1195. On 5 June, the JIC assessed that, of the approximately 106,000 (mainly Sunni) Sons of Iraq, around 16,300 had been recruited into the ISF, mainly in Anbar province.[1120] Elsewhere, relations between ISF and the Sons of Iraq were described as "tense". The creation of a Sons of Iraq programme in Basra in 2008 is described later in this Section. Considering the future, the JIC assessed:

> "MNF reporting suggests that at least a quarter of SoI [Sons of Iraq] members expect jobs in the ISF: for others, some form of continued stipend or civil service job would probably suffice. The GoI is unlikely to be willing or able to meet either expectation; or assume responsibility for commanding and paying the SoI this year. So long as it does not, we judge that SoI rejection of AQ-I, tolerance of MNF and willingness to refrain from anti-government violence will be fragile. […]"

1196. An eGram from Baghdad on 7 October reported that the Iraqi Government had taken responsibility for paying the Sons of Iraq located in Baghdad, (50 percent of the 103,000 total) from 1 October.[1121] Responsibility for the other half would follow later that month. The Iraqi Government and the Sons of Iraq did, however, remain suspicious of one another: the Iraqi Government believing that the number of the Sons of Iraq had been "inflated by the various leaders in order to line their own pockets", and the Sons of Iraq seeing the Iraqi Government "as a sectarian government determined to persecute them when the protective US hand [was] removed".

1197. After "detailed examination of the lists", the IMOD had accepted that "most of the SOI" existed and was putting procedures in place to enable payment to foot soldiers directly (reducing group leaders' income). Standardising pay was still a problem and recruitment of the Sons of Iraq into the ISF was slow; only 12,000 members had been recruited so far.

1198. The British Embassy Baghdad reported that AQ had sought to "exploit the situation by increasing pressure in Baghdad and Anbar through violent activity". There was "some evidence" that AQ was trying to lure back some Sons of Iraq by attempting to outbid the Iraqi Government. The US and the Iraqi Government recognised their continued financial support would be necessary to keep the Sons of Iraq "on side".

1199. The JIC assessed that standardising and distributing pay was still an issue in their report on 18 December.[1122] The Iraqi Government had agreed to recruit 20 percent of the Sons of Iraq into the ISF, with the remainder to be employed in other ministries.

1200. The JIC stated that some Sons of Iraq groups had been infiltrated by extremists and media reporting indicated that some Sunni Sons of Iraq commanders saw "Shia militias as a target second only to Al Qaida".

The UK's future bilateral relationship with Iraq

1201. On 27 May 2008, Lieutenant General John Cooper, the then SBMR-I, raised the matter of the UK's longer-term relationship with Iraq with AM Stirrup.[1123] He stated:

> "I am aware of current staffing on how a future training mission might be funded and manned (including the involvement of NATO) and the relative importance of this against other operational priorities. I would simply observe that we have a real opportunity here – both in terms of the UK long-term relationship with Iraq and how we 'sell' our post-TELIC posture to the US."

1202. Commenting on that paragraph in Lt Gen Cooper's report, Mr Edward Ferguson, Mr Browne's Private Secretary, wrote:

> "This is a bit of a concern. Although your intent on this is clear it seems that this hasn't yet got out of the starting blocks … I gather that the main issues are a view that the Army can't afford the manpower (because of other priorities) and that Defence cannot afford it (since it may not be funded by the Reserve)."[1124]

1203. The details of negotiating the UK's continued presence in Iraq following the expiry of resolution 1790 on 31 December 2008 is dealt with in Section 9.7. Ahead of a visit to Iraq in late October, Mr John Hutton, the Defence Secretary from October 2008, was advised by the British Embassy Baghdad:

> "The UK's wish to develop a broader based bilateral relationship, but with a continued defence element focused on training, fits with [Prime Minister] Maliki's own professed aims. But he remains deeply suspicious of us and feels politically besieged … The US/coalition are still needed to support, train and mentor Iraqi Security Forces as they take on more responsibility. Failure to deliver a legal base for this to continue beyond the end of 2008 would be destabilising."[1125]

1204. A key issue with respect to SSR was the provision of a combat role for UK forces; the MOD judged that to be essential to mentor 14th Division but Prime Minister Maliki was reported to be reluctant to authorise it.[1126]

1205. In his end of tour report, Lt Gen Cooper wrote about the UK's future strategic defence relationship with Iraq:

> "As I depart I confess to a sense of frustration that we have yet to confirm the nature, scale and resource of our long-term military relationship with Iraq, particularly with the Iraqi Armed Forces. The Gledhill Report[1127] on officer training reported a year ago, as I arrived, yet we have yet to confirm what we are offering. The Iraqi MOD is very keen, desperate almost, to establish links with its former mentoring nation. Thus far, we have promised something but not yet delivered it. I acknowledge the financial pressure which the UK Defence budget faces, but we have an opportunity to cement a strategic relationship with a major regional power which sits astride the second or third largest oil reserves in the world."[1128]

The strategy for 2009

1206. The National Security, International Relations and Defence Committee (NSID(OD) – the creation of which is described in the Box, 'Machinery of Government under Mr Brown', earlier in this Section) met on 9 December 2008, and agreed that the FCO should seek agreement on a new long-term strategy for Iraq out-of-committee.[1129] The strategy was circulated on 13 January 2009 and subsequently agreed. One of the key elements of the desired the bilateral relationship was "security":

> "We should contribute to Iraq's stability and security by helping it to develop professional, accountable, non-sectarian security forces which can deal effectively with both external and internal threats. This will involve MOD support to the Iraqi military through officer training and capacity-building support to IMOD and its JHQ, and a continuation of training, mentoring and capacity-building support to the Iraqi Police Service, Ministry of Interior and criminal justice system through SAF [Stabilisation Aid Fund][1130] projects and the civilian police mission."

1207. During the financial year 2008/09, both the Stabilisation Aid Fund and the Peacekeeping Budget[1131] were used to fund the UK's non-military contribution to SSR (including the UK police mission, support to the MOI and the UK contribution to EU JustLex). In the following financial year it was likely that the Peacekeeping Budget funding would be withdrawn so the MOD, the FCO and DFID were "agreeing a reprioritised programme" from the Stabilisation Aid Fund allocation of £15m focusing on:

- initiatives which would support key Prime Ministerial deliverables and provide conditions for a successful transition from Basra;
- Rule of Law initiatives which would form a central pillar of the UK's strategy in Iraq; and
- international support to the United Nations Development Programme and EU JustLex as key partners in security and economic reforms in Iraq which would support a transition of the UK's programme work in future.

1208. Overall SSR activities for 2009 would be:

- leading the Coalition Naval Training Team, to help develop the capacity of the Iraqi Navy until it became fully operational and able to ensure the security of its territorial waters and two oil platforms, expected to be around 2012 – that would comprise around 60 personnel;
- leading a NATO-badged Iraqi Army officer training and education programme with the intent to create a self-sustaining Iraqi training capacity by 2014 – that would require 50 NATO personnel of which around 30 would be from the UK;
- providing training places for around six Iraqi officers per year at UK training establishments;
- capacity-building in the IMOD and JHQ – precise numbers were unknown;
- training and mentoring for the IPS in targeted areas such as senior leadership and forensics (no figures were provided);
- capacity-building support for the MOI in planning and management; and
- training and advice to other elements of the Iraqi criminal justice system (no figures were provided).

[1130] The Stabilisation Aid Fund was jointly owned by the MOD, the FCO and DFID.
[1131] The Peacekeeping Budget was formally part of the Global Conflict Prevention Pools, and was jointly owned by the MOD, the FCO and DFID. It was managed by the FCO.

1209. General Richard Dannatt, Chief of the General Staff, visited Iraq from 23 to 25 March 2009.[1132] In his visit report he said:

> "… we must decide and then act with regard to our training support to the Iraqis … I know that work is ongoing to determine the nature of this support but my short visit gave me the impression that both the Officer Academy and the Staff College appear to be standing still, caught in a mire of NATO indecision, and we may have become too focused on the narrow issue of force protection rather than the wider point of why we are there. We need to generate momentum and ensure that the manpower we commit is of appropriate quality, quantity and has a degree of coherence. If we get this right we will deliver strategic effect – I consider it important that we do so."

1210. The UK remained in protracted negotiations with the Iraqi Government until early June over the size and role of the future UK military presence and the legal basis under which it would operate (see Section 9.7). On 6 June, a Government-to-Government agreement was signed and passed to the Iraqi Parliament for ratification.[1133]

1211. On 15 October, Mr Christopher Prentice, British Ambassador to Iraq, reported to the FCO in London that the UK/Iraq "training and maritime support agreement" had completed its third and final reading in the Council of Representatives.[1134] It passed with 99 votes in favour and 40 votes against or abstaining. Mr Prentice wrote:

> "All the elements of our broad-based relationship are now in place. Symbolically, the ratification by the Iraqi Parliament of this agreement confirms the will of a majority of Iraqi political groups to continue a special relationship with the UK, including in the security field."

SSR AFTER THE WITHDRAWAL OF UK TROOPS

1212. In Lt Gen Cooper's end of tour report dated March 2009, he commented on ISF progress:

> "Boulani has transformed the Ministry of Interior, although much remains to be done. The MOD deserves credit for its growth of the IA [Iraqi Army], and the possibility exists that a generation of bright Iraqi two star commanders may yet replace the old nepotistic and biased leadership with some degree of professionalism."[1135]

1213. On 31 March, the UK handed over division command of MND(SE) to the US.[1136] Mr Hutton reported to Mr Brown that "excellent progress by UK and Iraq forces means that 30 April will now … see the completion of our current military mission".[1137] That process is described in greater detail in Section 9.7.

1214. On 15 June, Mr Brown announced details of the UK's new bilateral relationship with Iraq, stating:

> "On the day of the last combat patrol in April, I welcomed Prime Minister Maliki and most of his Cabinet to London. We signed together a declaration of friendship, partnership and co-operation defining the new relationship between our two countries for the future. At the request of the Iraqi Government, a small number of British Navy personnel – no more than 100 – will remain in Iraq for long-term training of the Iraqi Army. Royal Navy ships will continue to protect the oil platforms on which Iraq's exports depend, and we will continue to offer training to the Iraqi Army as part of a wider NATO mission. We will also offer training opportunities at Sandhurst and elsewhere in the United Kingdom for Iraqi officers of high potential."[1138]

1215. In April 2009, the MOI capacity-building programme was transferred to the US.[1139] The UK continued work on policing under the Criminal Investigations and Policing project, funded by the Middle East and North Africa Conflict Fund. The programme in 2009 had a budget of £7.1m and comprised three elements:

- the civilian police mission in Baghdad with four officers, working with the Baghdad Police Academy to help the IPS develop investigative techniques;
- the civilian police mission in Basra with three officers; and
- the forensics element in Basra, Baghdad and Erbil with two officers.

SSR in the South: summer 2006 to summer 2009

State of emergency

1216. On 23 May 2006, Ms Aldred wrote to UK staff in Basra asking them for advice on how to improve the situation in Basra.[1140] Attached to the letter was "a strategic agenda for action". The paper gave a series of policy objectives (see Section 9.5) and stated that to achieve them there would need to be continuing UK Government engagement on SSR to ensure that the ISF were capable of:

- tackling criminality;
- bearing down on militias;

- purging malign elements in the ISF (both those that are corrupt and those which are aligned to political groupings); and
- working with MNF-I on higher end military tasks relating to the insurgency, and gradually taking over these tasks."

1217. The Iraqi Government would need to demonstrate its grip on Basra through:

- serious and visible engagement from Baghdad;
- if necessary, an appropriate show of strength by the ISF, reflecting their growing capabilities; and
- encouraging and co-operating in the process of security transition."

1218. On 31 May, Prime Minister Maliki visited Basra and declared a state of emergency, after which he placed a five-man Emergency Committee in charge of delivering a plan to address security in the city.[1141] That Committee then appointed Governor Mohammed Waili as responsible for the security plan.

1219. On 18 June, the MCNS endorsed the Basra Security Plan and recommended:

- expanding the Basra Security Committee to include a number of Basrawis;
- appointing a new overall security co-ordinator for Basra; and
- that the Iraqi Ministries of the Interior and Defence should increase the forces available for Basra, even if this was to the detriment of policing and military operations elsewhere.[1142]

1220. The Committee had also considered whether the Basra Chief of Police and the Commander of 10th Division should be removed from post but had concluded they should remain for the time being.

1221. Major General Richard Shirreff took over as GOC MND(SE) from mid-July. At this time there had not yet been agreement on the implementation arrangements of the Basra Security Plan.[1143] In particular, there was no overall Iraqi security co-ordinator. The Provincial Council, however, had voted to replace the Basra Chief of Police.

1222. Maj Gen Shirreff's first weekly report as GOC MND(SE) set out his initial reflections on the situation facing him.[1144] He wrote:

> "The issue in Basra is the lack of security and until we establish this there can be no PIC [Provincial Iraqi Control]. We can only generate freedom of movement by mounting specific operations, often up to company level, and we are effectively fixed by the lack of concentrated force. The lack of security means that we cannot conduct the SSR needed to transform the police, nor apply the economic inducements needed to isolate the militants from the majority of militiamen who are only there because the militia can pay them. Thus the enemy, militant JAM and the death squads linked to the Basra police … are able to operate with relative impunity …

"In my view, the only way we will achieve mission success is by winning the battle for Basra and defeating militant JAM and the death squads (whether by capturing, or, if necessary, by killing them in accordance with our ROE (Rules of Engagement)). But we must be clever about it. A blunt, solely kinetic approach risks getting sucked into a series of running tactical battles against JAM that will get us nowhere. We must isolate militant JAM from mainstream JAM and build the intelligence picture in order to target them and the death squads connected to the police in Basra. The key to this is energetic and sustained effort along the governance and economic lines of operation, both of which remain inadequate … (the comprehensive approach did not exist). Progress on these lines is essential to create and maintain tolerance for our operations in Basra. It will also underwrite success on the security line of operation. There has been plenty of planning but we need to make things happen."

1223. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lt Gen Sir Richard Shirreff described a "cycle of insecurity" as he further explained why achieving security was his first objective:

"No security meant no reconstruction and development, it meant a loss of consent, the militia filled the gap and, effectively, the militia controlled the city."[1145]

Provincial Iraqi Control

Transferring responsibility from the coalition to the Iraqi Government of each of the 18 Iraqi provinces was referred to as reaching Provincial Iraqi Control (PIC). PIC was granted following an assessment by the coalition and the Iraqi Government.

Transitional Readiness Assessment

A Transitional Readiness Assessment (TRA) level was used to rank Iraqi units in terms of their capability, from TRA level 1 (fully capable) to TRA level 4 (incapable).

The Joint Committee to Transfer Security Responsibility (see Box 'Assessing readiness for Provincial Iraqi Control') judged that at TRA level 2, the IPS could maintain domestic order and prevent the resurgence of terrorism.[1146]

1224. In his weekly report, Maj Gen Shirreff said that he had had some encouraging discussions about his proposed approach with Major General Muhammed Latif, the Commander of 10th Division, based in Basra.[1147] However, it would be fundamental to ensure that there was political will in Baghdad behind any operation. Maj Gen Shirreff undertook to work closely with Mr Patey and the MNF commanders in Baghdad "to ensure that we carry Maliki with us".

1225. By 27 July, Major General Ali Hamadi, brother of Brigadier Mohammed Hamadi the Provincial Director of Police, had been appointed as President of the three-person Basra Security Committee by Prime Minister Maliki.[1148]

Delivering a Better Basra

1226. For the meeting of DOP(I) on 15 June, Ministers were given an update paper from the Cabinet Office entitled 'Follow-up to the Prime Minister's Visit, Including Delivering a Step-Change in Basra' (see Section 9.5).[1149] The paper drew on recent assessments from the MOD and the JIC of the ISF:

> "The picture across Iraq is of growing, but variable, levels of capability … According to the US-led ISF development plan, all divisions of the Iraqi Army and MOI forces should be trained and equipped by the end of 2006 … The development of the police is significantly behind that of the Iraqi Army, with particular problems over militia-links, over-recruitment, corruption and criminality.
> "In the South, the 10th Division is judged to be increasingly effective … However, these forces are untested in undertaking counter-insurgency operations without MNF support. The police are a more significant cause for concern, with militia links and a lack of effective political control either locally or from the centre …
> "The overall MNF plan, which the MOD judge to be robust is predicated on the MNF retaining substantial forces in Iraq until 2007 to support the ISF … but even that timeline will be tested if the scale and sophistication of the insurgency does not diminish. The MOD supports this assessment highlighting a number of risks with the plan that fall outside its focus on training, mentoring and equipping:
> - the degree to which Iraqi leadership on security develops;
> - the precise nature of the security and political environment the ISF will face at the point of transition … In the South there is a particular concern over the level of violence between competing Shia factions;
> - human factors such as the experience of the ISF; and
> - the dangers of over-recruitment (often of militia-linked individuals into the police) resulting in an unmanageable, ineffective and extremely expensive ISF.
> "The MOD is continuing to monitor implementation of the ISF development plan and is undertaking work to consider a limited number of specific gaps they have identified, including Iraqi naval protection for oil platforms and the sustainment funding for MND(SE)."

1227. The paper provided a work plan entitled 'Activity to deliver a step-change in Basra'.

1228. In discussion, a member of DOP(I) suggested that the Cabinet Office paper risked being too optimistic on security prospects, in light of recent JIC Assessments.[1150] DOP(I) agreed that Mr Browne should take the lead in pulling together a strategy for Basra, with the support of the Cabinet Office and assistance from other departments.

1229. On 4 July, Mr Browne wrote to Mr Blair updating him on additional projects, costing £30.7m (but unfunded) over the financial year, to deliver a Better Basra plan (see Sections 9.5 and 10.2).[1151] Those included:

- a "new unit [a Department of Internal Affairs] to clean up the Basra police from within", costing around £4m and requiring eight UK police officers;
- on-the-spot mentoring of the Basra police and the regional prison managers, costing £10.3m and requiring an additional 20 police advisers;
- a new unit – the Prosecution Mentoring Unit – to fast-track corruption, organised and major crime cases through Basra's courts;
- more training for judges; and
- witness protection arrangements.

1230. The overall aim of the projects was to increase the capacity of the Iraqis to deal with those they detained and so avoid the consequences of detaining large numbers of people for long periods.

1231. Mr Browne's proposals were approved by DOP(I) on 6 July.[1152]

1232. Prime Minister Maliki met Mr Browne in London on 25 July.[1153] The meeting was described as "a relatively robust exchange of views" with Prime Minister Maliki stating that there was little discipline in the ISF in Basra, a lack of co-ordination between MNF-I and the IPS and that problems with the IPS were attributable to coalition failures to deliver equipment.

1233. Prime Minister Maliki also stated that arrests by MNF-I in MND(SE) were harming national reconciliation and should be halted. Mr Browne countered that "the real lesson from Northern Ireland was that the terrorists only came to the table once they had realised they could not win. It was only then that the combination of early releases and reconciliation became viable tools in the reconciliation process."

1234. In August 2006, ACC Barton produced an assessment of the situation in MND(SE).[1154] He highlighted that:

- Although the UK had "trained and trained the lower echelons of the IPS and … equipped them to a reasonable standard", they had not created a police force.
- Training should have been top down rather than bottom up.
- The equipment supplied by the UK "provided technological solutions way above the local need – smartboards and complex computer systems which get stolen (by the police) or can't be used due to lack of power. What they need (and like) is desks, pens, ledgers and stationery".
- A basic level of corruption was endemic to Iraqi society but the current level wasn't "'hand in the till' activity"; the SCU was "synonymous with killings, torture and abuse".

1235. ACC Barton advocated further UK pressure to encourage the MOI to purge employees, mentioning a recent purge of MOI employees (including IPS) in which there were "86 convicted murderers, 345 with bribery convictions, rapists, kidnappers, and even two IPS who were supposed to have been executed in the 90s but were alive and working in Baghdad!"

1236. ACC Barton described the Tactical Support Unit (TSU) and the confidential TIPS hotline as successes but added that there was a "woeful lack of command and control skills by senior Iraqi Police Officers" and "little public confidence in the IPS as an entity".

Problems with the 10th Division – mutiny and looting

1237. Over the summer of 2006, problems began to surface with the largely untested 10th Division.

1238. On 10 August, Maj Gen Shirreff reported the murder of a colonel in 10th Division and suggested that the murder might have been motivated by his "resolute stand against militia influence in the IA".[1155] Maj Gen Shirreff described 10th Division as "not perfect but it is the best hope we have for now of an Iraqi solution to the security problems. Emerging signs of increasing politicisation and infiltration within the IA can only be bad news."

1239. The JIC considered the security situation in the South on 27 September:

> "We judge that the Iraq Army in the South can cope with the limited threat posed by Iraqi Sunni Arab nationalists and jihadists. But their willingness and ability to tackle Shia militias is doubtful. MNF describe the Iraqi Army's 10th Division in MND(SE) as "fragile". Its 10,000 personnel can perform basic tasks (patrols and static guard duties) independently, and it has provided limited support to MNF counter > insurgency operations, including during implementation of the state of emergency in Basra. But there have been recent instances of a breakdown of discipline. It failed to prevent the looting of MNF camps when they were handed over in Amarah and Samawah. And on 24 August over 100 men from the battalion based in Amarah refused an order to deploy to Baghdad. Intelligence shows that some army personnel retain loyalties to JAM and Badr militias. We do not know the scale of this problem, and we judge that it is less severe than in the police. But the loyalty of the army in the South has not been seriously tested."[1156]

1240. On 31 August, Maj Gen Shirreff wrote that members of 10th Division had refused orders to deploy to Baghdad.[1157] He viewed that event and the looting of MNF camps described by the JIC as indicating "that the IA is built on shakier foundations than we might wish and is a real concern".

Operations SALAMANCA and SINBAD

1241. Operation SALAMANCA was a plan conceived in the summer of 2006 to address the security situation in the South and move Basra towards PIC. It is described in detail in Section 9.5.

1242. Lieutenant General Sir Richard Shirreff explained to the Inquiry that the Basra Security Plan announced by Prime Minister Maliki had "amounted really to nothing more than the establishment of a Basra security committee" and Op SALAMANCA was therefore "the operationalising of the Iraqi Basra security plan".[1158] He told the Inquiry that its concept was:

> "… to achieve security, to excise the death squads, to defeat JAM, through the synchronised application of what we call kinetic, ie force, and non-kinetic, ie reconstruction and development."

1243. In his weekly report on 31 August, Maj Gen Shirreff said that he aimed to prepare 10th Division for operations in Basra during Op SALAMANCA.[1159] He remarked that that could provide "potentially more of an Iraqi face on Op SALAMANCA".

1244. On 1 September, Mr Browne's Private Secretary wrote to Mr Blair's Private Secretary that Mr Browne had approved the additional troops requested for Op SALAMANCA because he had "judged that the likely impact of a short term extension of an increased troop presence is offset by the need for momentum for the projects that will make a visible impact in the city".[1160]

[1160] Letter Beadle to Banner, 1 September 2006, 'Iraq: troop levels in support of Op.SALAMANCA'.

1245. Mr Browne told the House of Commons on 11 September that 360 additional personnel would be deployed to reinforce the effort in Basra.[1161] That comprised an extended deployment of the Theatre Reserve Battalion and an uplift in Royal Engineers, Royal Marines (one boat troop) and Royal Military Police (one troop) to augment training of the IPS.

1246. At the DOP(I) meeting on 14 September, the objectives of Op SALAMANCA were described to Ministers as being to:

- increase Iraqi political grip on the issue, by having a visible Iraqi face on the plan and active involvement in the operation; and
- increase the confidence and competence of the ISF.[1162]

1247. On 15 September, Maj Gen Shirreff reported that the police were "still incapable of providing even the most basic level of security; rather they are a major cause of insecurity".[1163] He anticipated that during Op SALAMANCA there would be "a concerted and sustained effort by Police Training Teams" to "turn those police stations capable of improvement into police stations that are capable of providing basic security in their local areas". His aim was "to cull the unredeemable and rehabilitate the 'just about' salvageable".

1248. In a meeting with Gen Casey, Prime Minister Maliki was reported as saying that "the security situation in Basra was not bad enough to warrant an operation that would upset the political balance".[1164]

1249. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lt Gen Shirreff described gaining approval from the Iraqi Government as an "absolutely non-stop grind":

> "Maliki said he didn't want this operation to proceed, despite … declaring a state of emergency. So I then went up to Baghdad … got to see Maliki and eventually briefed him and persuaded him that this operation should continue."[1165]

1250. Lt Gen Shirreff told the Inquiry that even travelling to meet Prime Minister Maliki was difficult, with Gen Hamadi refusing to fly for two hours because he had received a call from a Sadrist Minister who said, "This operation isn't to continue".

1251. In response to the difficulties in securing approval, Op SALAMANCA was refined and repackaged as "a reconstruction and development operation enabled by MNF and MNF-led security".

1252. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Major General Jonathan Shaw, GOC MND(SE) from January to August 2007, said that Op SALAMANCA was altered "because of resistance within the Shia polity".[1166] In practice, that meant:

> "… a lot of the kinetic element that had been intended in SALAMANCA was taken out. It continued under another guise, if you like, and that just showed an early sign that … you had to work within the tolerances of the Shia polity, and that became particularly apparent where anyone in MNF tackled a Shia problem."

1253. Following a meeting of the Security Committee in mid-September, the name of the operation was changed to Operation SINBAD.[1167]

1254. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lt Gen Shirreff described how Op SINBAD was undertaken.[1168] "Relatively soft areas" were selected, a surge of force was used to secure the area, and teams were then put into police stations. Those teams went "through the police stations with a fine-toothed comb" to establish their state. The UK had not visited many of the stations for six months, following the Jameat incident described earlier in this Section.

> "We surged police training teams in, Royal Military Police and contract policemen from elsewhere."

1257. Maj Gen Shirreff reported on 28 September that Op SINBAD had begun, and that initial operations had gone exceptionally well:

> "What made a particular impact was the very evident Iraqi face on the operation, both in the form of Iraqi sappers[1170] working alongside British sappers and Iraqi Army security patrols on the streets alongside MNF."[1171]

[1171] Minute Shirreff, 28 September 2006, 'GOC MND(SE) – Southern Iraq Update – 28 September 2006'.

1258. General Sir Nicholas Houghton described Op SINBAD to the Inquiry as the "last best operation" to provide:

> "… sort of exemplar modelling to the Iraqi Army but trying to put them in the lead of it. In the latter stages of SINBAD, it became important that they were seen to be in the lead …"[1172]

1259. Gen Houghton described the "instantaneous" follow-up "of police reform, with police reform teams going into areas of Basra as they were cleared and made more stable by Iraqi Army back-filling".

1260. On 27 October, Mr Banner wrote to Mr Siddiq, summarising a briefing that Mr Asquith had given Mr Blair the previous day.[1173] Mr Blair had been told:

> "The Iraqi Army had performed well in some areas (e.g. 10th Division in Basra). But it lacked maturity, had poor mechanism for civilian control and direction, and equipment was unevenly distributed and sometimes inadequate to task."

1261. Mr Blair requested further advice on how to strengthen the Iraqi Army and Prime Minister Maliki's control of it. A copy of the note was sent to the MOD for action.

1262. The MOD replied on 9 November.[1174] With respect to MND(SE), the MOD stated that 10th Division's planned development was "on track" but that it was:

> "… consistently placed at the bottom of the prioritisation list by Baghdad due to the perceived low threat in Southern Iraq. As a result, they are potentially outgunned by insurgents and remain vulnerable when moving by vehicle."

1263. The MOD wrote that it was "scoping the possibility of gifting 250 armoured protection vehicles" to "enhance" 10th Division's capacity. It stated that Enhanced Military Training Teams (Super MiTTs) would "evolve" to "protect and enhance the progress already made" when units were transferred to Iraqi control. Those Super MiTTs were not described in any further detail.

1264. Reflecting on the Iraqi Army's performance in his evidence to the Inquiry, Lt Gen Shirreff said:

> "[The Iraqi Army] improved in terms of confidence, in terms of training, immeasurably, I think, during the period of SINBAD, but they were not up to holding in security terms, because, ultimately, however confident they got, you have to remember that the Iraqi Army in south-east Iraq were Shia-recruited, locally recruited, they lived on the ground amongst the militia and they were not prepared to fight the militia, because they knew that, if they did, they would come off worse."[1175]

1265. On 16 November at DOP(I), VAdm Style stated that ISF would be in the lead of Op SINBAD pulses from the end of the month and that they would be fully in charge of the operation, including planning, by the end of February.[1176] He described Op SINBAD as a "considerable success" but stated that progress on reforming the police remained weak.

1266. In his evidence to the Inquiry, VAdm Style described some of the achievements of Op SINBAD:

"… a new level of co-operation between our own forces and the Iraqi Army, better Iraqi Army and police co-operation … extra equipment was brought in … By the end … the Iraqis were in the lead to an extent they had not been before."[1177]

1267. On 30 November, Maj Gen Shirreff reported that Op SINBAD was progressing well and considered future plans:

"Op SINBAD has led to improvements both in the general security situation (as evidenced by the declining murder rate) and the confidence and capability of the ISF. Mentoring of the Provincial Joint Coordination Centre by MND(SE) has led to noticeable improvements in its ability to plan and coordinate operations. Similarly the mentoring and training conducted by the police transition teams have led to an improvement in the average transition readiness assessment … I assess that as SINBAD culminates we will be able to say, quite reasonably, that the security framework we have established in Basra will set the conditions for PIC.

"With regards to corrupt IPS, the DIA have already started tackling corrupt policemen but they are a small team and it will take time before they have a significant effect. In the meantime I have had my staff refine our plans to deal with the Serious Crimes Unit (SCU), the largest and most dangerous of the corrupt IPS units, with support from elements of the ISF. My intention is to replace the SCU with a new unit – the MCU (Major Crimes Unit). The first phase will be to secure the new location (the Warren) and to screen those already at the site. The Jameat police station (the present site of the SCU) will be cleared once the Warren is secure and those present will be assessed, the ineffective will be removed/transferred and the known criminal element will be arrested. Finally those selected for the MCU will be carefully screened and those that pass will be closely monitored, mentored and trained."[1178]

The Warren

The Warren site in Basra City housed the Provincial Joint Co-ordination Centre (PJCC) command and control centre.[1179] The PJCC was a provincial security committee to discuss "security issues in the broadest sense".[1180] The Warren also housed a number of IPS specialist units including the TIPS line (see Box earlier in this Section, 'TIPS hotline'), the Major Crimes Unit (MCU), and the National Information and Investigation Agency (NIIA).

The PJCC building was located around 5km from Basra Palace and 15km from Basra Airport (see Map 6, Annex 4).

1268. The following week, on 7 December, Maj Gen Shirreff reported:

> "I have come to the conclusion that the best we can achieve through SINBAD are those surface level improvements required to get police stations to TRA level 2, the critical level for PIC. Culling militia infiltrators from the police is a non-starter without a national anti-militia plan including DDR [Disarmament, Demobilisation and Reintegration]."[1181]

1269. CC Kernaghan visited Iraq from 4 to 6 October 2006.[1182] His stay was hampered by problems with transport and he was unable to go to Baghdad. The main focus of his visit report was the lack of support coming from the MOI and he cited cases of corrupt officers being sacked in MND(SE) only to be reinstated "often in a higher rank" by the MOI.

1270. CC Kernaghan recommended:

> "We should now be planning for a new era in which there is a reduced overt British military presence in southern Iraq. If we move to a security infrastructure delivered primarily by the Iraqis then we should remodel our support to reflect that new reality. In such an era I would suggest station visits and routine training delivery are irrelevant. We need to ask the MOI what support they would value over the medium term and then decide how best we could provide that support, assuming political support. I believe our focus should move from the tactical to the strategic … Crucially it is hard to justify investing in tactical achievements and gains when it appears the wider strategic context is undermining our overall goals. The Iraqi MOI must set out their visions and we should seek to support it where we can and feel it is appropriate."

[1182] Report, 6 October 2006, '5th Visit to Iraq by Chief Constable Kernaghan 4-6 October 2006'.

1271. CC Kernaghan was accompanied on the visit by the Police and Justice Team Leader from the FCO's Conflict Issues Group, who reported:

> "The IPS is widely recognised as an integral part of the security problem, exhibiting a serious propensity to undermine, rather than enforce, law and order. It barely functions in Basra, suffering from a paralysing combination of deeply embedded corruption (including involvement in extra-judicial killings), militia infiltration, poor leadership (the recently confirmed Chief of Police, Al Hamadi, appears to inspire little loyalty), and weak command and control structures. The dearth of local IPS officers willing to staff the nascent Internal Affairs Department illustrates the depth of the problem; recruits have finally been found, following MOI intervention, in a nearby province.
> "The early stages of SINBAD have confirmed the extremely poor state of the IPS. From an over-complex and over-staffed organisational structure lacking basic administrative capacity, to the decaying police stations with no mains electricity and inadequate sewerage, the conditions on the ground are grim."[1183]

1272. The Police and Justice Team Leader recommended to Mr Pattison and Ms Joan Link, Head of the Conflict Issues Group, that the UK should:

- Extend the window of opportunity offered by Operation SINBAD by re-deploying a number of UK police officers more directly in support of efforts to tackle gross IPS corruption, the key obstacle to longer-term improvement of the IPS;
- Increase UK strategic policing input at the MOI in Baghdad, to support the development of national, and by extension provincial, capacity (including increased financial and logistical expertise) and thereby improve the chances of sustainability;
- Encourage greater Rule of Law co-ordination between ministries in Baghdad and between the capital and provinces, again to improve sustainability. Leverage EU financing and expert support as far as possible."

1273. The British Embassy Baghdad produced a 'Police Forward Look' in November 2006 which assessed priorities in Basra (described in Box, 'Enabling the police to tackle crime', earlier in this Section).[1184] It stated:

> "Key target – getting to PIC. Assumption: policing work will be more difficult in Basra city post-PIC. Will not be possible to fully tackle police corruption pre-PIC. Police to concentrate on required level – not set sights higher."

CIVILIAN DRAWDOWN

1274. Mrs Beckett decided in October that the majority of civilian staff should be withdrawn from Basra Palace and relocated to Basra Air Station.[1185]

1275. In an IPU paper considering the impact of that drawdown it was assessed that:

- ACC Barton and a small number of police advisers already based at Basra Air Station would be unaffected.
- The key current task for the remaining police advisers in Basra was work to support Op SINBAD for which they needed to be based in Basra Palace or another MND(SE) site in the city. The TIPS programme, run out of the PJCC (co-located with the Basra Police Headquarters) would also be affected.
- Prisons work would be affected as Iraqi Corrections Service staff preferred to visit Basra Palace than from Basra Air Station, and unannounced prison visits were also more easily made from Basra Palace than Basra Air Station.
- There would be a negative impact on the Rule of Law work being carried out by the Provincial Reconstruction Team (PRT).[1186]

1276. The IPU recommended that the police team at Basra Palace should be reduced by 14 officers, three of whom would relocate to the Air Station. The remainder would leave Iraq. That would "retain just enough officers in the city to provide essential support to Op SINBAD". The prisons team would leave theatre "pending progress on the Basra Central Prison project" and "we would need to think hard about whether the PRT could have enough real impact to justify the costs and risks of maintaining it at its current size."

1278. Brig Everard also reported the murder of 17 Iraqi interpreters and locally employed contractors employed at the Basra Police Academy. He advised:

> "How the ISF (particularly the police) deal with this incident should be an important test. Unsurprisingly, they may disappoint. There is a lack of IPS will to prosecute a JAM-linked case with much vigour, let alone conduct any arrests."

1279. A paper drafted on 30 December by the Deputy Chief Police Adviser proposed that there would be 31 International Police Advisors, nine police officers (not including ACC Barton and his staff officer) and two military officers operating from Basra in 2007.[1188] It was thought that the PTT numbers would reduce further in April and, depending on progress, might not be required at all.

1280. The MOD and the FCO produced separate papers on future plans for Basra for DOP(I) on 7 December.[1189] Both papers envisaged military and civilian personnel relocating to Basra Air Station with an undefined "residual presence" possibly remaining at the PJCC. The MOD stated that there would be a number of post-handover tasks including:

- continued training and mentoring of the Iraqi Army, IPS and the Department of Border Enforcement (DBE);
- support to other government departments' efforts on Iraqi police training, including co-ordinating the disbandment of the Serious Crimes Unit (SCU); and
- retaining the capacity to intervene if security were to deteriorate beyond the capabilities of the ISF.

1281. The FCO listed a number of police training tasks for 2007 including:

- clearing out the SCU (dealing with 300-400 staff and transferring detainees out of SCU custody);
- specialist support to Basra Police Headquarters at the Warren site, including the National Information and Investigation Agency (NIIA), the TIPS hotline and forensics training;
- mentoring the Chief of Police; and
- developing leadership training.

1282. DOP(I) discussed and "took note" of both papers.[1190]

TACKLING THE SERIOUS CRIMES UNIT: OPERATION THYME

1283. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lt Gen Shirreff described the specialist police units, in particular the SCU, as "a serious problem that needed to be resolved".[1191] He said that their activities included "intimidating, murdering, kidnapping ordinary Basrawis". He added that for the people of Basra, the SCU was a "bastion of tyranny right in their midst".

1284. The November 2006 'Police Forward Look' included the target of replacing "the corrupt and dangerous SCU".[1192] The plan was:

> "Two hundred people to be disciplined, removed or prosecuted, then seek PDoP's [Provincial Director of Police's] and Governor's agreement to close down and establish MCU [a Major Crimes Unit] in new location. Close down the Jameat (present site of the SCU). Realistically, only aim to get the MCU the best possible start, then hand over to Iraqi control immediately at PIC."

1285. That work would be undertaken by ArmorGroup contractors.

1286. On 15 December, a junior official at the PJHQ briefed Mr Browne on Op SINBAD and the plans to deal with the SCU based at Jameat Police Station.[1193] The briefing did not suggest a real improvement in the overall capability of Basra's IPS stations: while prior to Op SINBAD stations had an average of TRA level 3 or worse, the average was now assessed at between 2 and 3 with "some inconsistencies" between stations. It did, however, state that the PJCC's "command ability to plan and co-ordinate operations throughout the city" was "much improved" due to the permanent presence of the MNF at the centre.

1287. The PJHQ official assessed the SCU as "so thoroughly tainted by corrupt officers that it is effectively beyond gradual reform" and that orders had now been given by the MOI and Prime Minister Maliki for it to be disbanded. The new Operation THYME was being planned by Maj Gen Shirreff to disband the SCU, clear its headquarters and remove all prisoners at the Jameat. The existing 200 SCU personnel would either:

- be detained (only if "sufficient targetable intelligence" existed);
- have their case handed to the Department of Internal Affairs (DIA) (where no "targetable" evidence existed but there was information suggesting the individual had been involved in criminal activity); or
- moved to other parts of the IPS and given further training (if not suspected of any criminal activity).

1288. The PJHQ official said that where individuals were dismissed from the IPS, continued biometric testing from the IPS should prevent them from being re-employed, although that was only possible if the Iraqis continued "to implement a stringent and routine testing regime". The new MCU would be formed at the PJCC made up of 120 individuals selected by the PTT following "a rigorous screening process".

1289. Op THYME was carried out on 25 December.[1194] Briefing Mr Browne the following day, a PJHQ junior official reported that the operation had been successful but that MNF had been attacked a number of times, resulting in a "very minor" MNF casualty and "some vehicle damage". Seven attackers had been killed.

1290. The PJHQ official stated that 127 prisoners were found and that the Iraqi Army had transferred them to the Warren facility. "Some 80 percent" of the prisoners "showed signs of torture". A search of the Jameat site uncovered weapons, grenades, shells and bomb-making equipment. The MNF demolished part of the building to prevent it from being reoccupied.

1291. There had been a mixed reaction from the Iraqi Government to the operation. A spokesperson from the IMOD had reiterated that the Iraqi Army was involved; making clear that the MNF did not act alone. Governor Waili and tribal leaders had offered "very strong support" but some of those briefed on the operation beforehand had since said they were unaware of the MNF's intent. That was believed to be due to militia pressure.

1292. Reflecting on the Iraqi reaction to Op THYME, Lt Gen Shirreff told the Inquiry:

> "Maliki was generally supportive, Governor Waili was delighted, the tribal sheikhs within Basra were delighted, the principal cleric of the largest Shia mosque in Basra, with a congregation of 10,000 people on Friday prayers, thanked me for delivering the people of Basra from this nest of vipers."[1195]

1293. On 28 December, Mr Dominic Meiklejohn, Deputy Consul General in Basra, described the ISF's role in Op THYME as "significant".[1196] The performance of Brigadier Ibrahim, the only member of the Basra Security Committee in the country, had been "less encouraging", getting "cold feet at the last moment" and ordering a Commander of 10th Division not to participate. Consequently, the brigade failed to provide the outer cordon as planned.

1294. Mr Meiklejohn reported that Prime Minister Maliki had claimed not to know about the operation, despite it being raised with him on three separate occasions. Some members of the Provincial Council had criticised the operation publicly but those were the "usual suspects". At a local, tactical level reactions had been positive, and although local media had suggested the IPS would no longer be participating in Op SINBAD, the PTTs had been "welcomed warmly" at police stations. He wrote:

> "… excising the SCU has demonstrated that MNF and ISF have the will and capacity to root out militia influence over the IPS. The SCU were not the only offenders but had become a signal of what was wrong with the IPS. The operation … sent a powerful signal to Basra.
> "There is still much to do. MNF operations against the Shia militias remain outside [Prime Minister] Maliki's comfort zone. Local ISF commanders are scared of being > hung out to dry by Baghdad if they get too closely involved. We can avoid some of the pain by doing even more to keep Maliki … in the loop (and paying the price in operational security – the fact that no members of the SCU were caught in the Jameat suggests they were warned off). But we can't make Maliki more determined or happier to confront the Shia militias. And we can't get to PIC unless we can show that the ISF are ready and able to confront the militias."

1295. Maj Gen Shirreff, also reporting on Op THYME on 28 December, wrote that the operation "may mark a decisive moment, if not the decisive act in our efforts to reform the IPS in Basra".[1197] He thought it "brought to a head the hard choices that face the Provincial Council, the Basra Security Committee and the ISF: do they confront or continue to roll over in the face of the militia?"

1296. Maj Gen Shirreff criticised Maj Gen Latif for refusing to order a brigade to deploy into an area, because JAM was there with Rocket Propelled Grenades and small arms. Maj Gen Shirreff considered the Basra Security Committee "no longer fit for purpose" after two members deserted the Committee during the operation and Brig Ibrahim denied "any foreknowledge having previously been in full support".

1297. On 4 January 2007, Maj Gen Shirreff reported that the relationship with the Council remained tense, with all members refusing to meet the MNF face to face.[1198] He was concerned about the welfare of the prisoners after SCU members had arrived to work at the Warren facility. While prisoners had not been subject to further torture, they had not received access to medical care or legal advice. The Director of Police had assured he would keep SCU out of the Warren because it was not possible to be sure who had been involved in the torture of prisoners.

1298. The consequences of Op THYME continued as members of the Provincial Council refused to engage fully with the MNF.[1199] They rejected evidence that the MNF had authority for the operation and denied being briefed about it beforehand. Maj Gen Shirreff believed it was "absolutely clear" that that was due to fear of reprisals from JAM and SCU.

1299. Lt Gen Shirreff told the Inquiry about how Op THYME affected Op SINBAD:

> "… there was some delay … but … there was no significant impact on SINBAD at all. In fact, in a sense it allowed us to continue that process which had begun to develop, but putting the Iraqis more into the lead on SINBAD …"[1200]

EARLY ASSESSMENTS OF IRAQI SECURITY FORCE PERFORMANCE IN OP SINBAD

1300. On 4 January 2007, Maj Gen Shirreff reported that the Iraqi Ground Forces Command had declared operational control of 10th Division from MNF-I.[1201] Maj Gen Shirreff stated:

> "I am content, but on the condition that Latif is replaced and the Army does not accept orders from the Basra Security Committee."

1301. On the No.10 copy of Maj Gen Shirreff's report, Sir Nigel Sheinwald commented that, while there was some positive news in it, "the worst … is left to the end and is a big problem".[1202]

1302. Lt Gen Lamb produced an update on ISF capabilities on 5 January 2007.[1203] On equipment, he wrote that the Iraqi Government did not view 10th Division as "a relatively high priority for investment" because their ratings and manning levels were "significantly higher than other Divisions on a number of criteria". If the UK was to lobby the IMOD and MNSTC-I for equipment, Lt Gen Lamb advised:

> "… this needs to be done in the full knowledge that it distorts the prioritisation and investment system that we have encouraged the Iraqis to develop and meet their national needs as a whole; expect push back from US and ISF commanders."

1303. The manuscript comment on Lt Gen Lamb's assessment of the priorities for investment said: "We have to make this up then." The MOD has been unable to identify the author of the manuscript comments.

1304. On 8 January, the IPU produced an engagement strategy for the future UK presence in southern Iraq.[1204] On ISF capability in Basra, the paper stated: "We should be frank about the problems, for the sake of our own credibility." The IPU then suggested a series of positive messages:

- Both the Iraqi Army and the IPS are increasingly taking the lead following Op SINBAD.
- Cleaning up the police is "at the heart of our current work".
- The SCU is being disbanded and replaced by a Basra Crimes Unit at the PJCC site.
- A DIA and a Prosecution Mentoring Unit have been created.

- "We are confident that this mix of activity will get the Basra police to the required standard for transition, even if problems will remain. But we intend to retain a significant police training, support and mentoring presence to sustain forward momentum after transition, including at the PJCC in Basra city."

1305. On 10 January, the MOD produced an update on UK military plans for transition for DOP(I).[1205] An annex provided an interim assessment of Op SINBAD. It stated that a clearer review would be available in March but that there were a number of positive outcomes as well as some areas requiring more work.

1306. The annex noted that police effectiveness had increased; it was currently assessed as 69 percent capable and was on track for the 72 percent capability required for transition. But parts of the IPS remained "actively criminal" and harboured the "Death Squads responsible for a large proportion of the murder rate in Basra".

1307. The Iraqi Army had taken the lead through the latter stages of Op SINBAD and was able to respond to requests for assistance through MND(SE). It still lacked the "capability, structurally and conceptually" to deploy nationwide.

1308. Op SINBAD had also "confirmed suspicions that some leaders in parts of the Iraqi security sector in MND(SE) are not fit for task, including members of the Iraqi Army and the Basra Security Committee".

1309. DOP(I) considered the paper on 11 January.[1206]

1310. The minutes recorded that, although arrest warrants had been issued for members of the SCU, they had not been actioned and there were signs that those members were "continuing to operate". The UK would continue to press Mr Boulani, and the mentoring effort in the MOI should be increased.

1311. Cabinet discussed Op SINBAD and transition in Basra later that day.[1207] Mr Blair stated that during his visit at the end of 2006 "he had sensed, for the first time, that Iraqi generals felt that if they were given the right training and equipment they would be able to do the job".

1312. Mr Browne said that ISF "would only improve if they were given more responsibility". He reiterated the problems with the police, particularly the SCU, and stated that the UK was "determined" that rogue officers "would not be allowed to remain in the police".

1313. On 17 January, the JIC assessed:

> "In MND(SE) the predominantly Shia 10th Division is already operating independently in the provinces of Muthanna, Dhi Qar and much of Maysan …

despite reported comments by the former Commander of 4 Brigade that up to 50 percent of his unit was sympathetic to JAM, they successfully and impartially policed a cease-fire in Amara between JAM and Badr. In Operation SINBAD in Basra units conducted cordon and search operations independently and effectively and in one instance intervened in a public order disturbance. We judge 10th Division is slowly improving and gaining confidence, but it remains prone to interference from local government and militia pressure. It is likely to prove fragile if confronted by serious Shia militia violence."[1208]

1314. On 18 January, Dr Rosalind Marsden, Consul General in Basra, produced the first consolidated weekly report from MND(SE).[1209] She highlighted a number of difficulties including:

- the Provincial Council's disengagement with MNF;
- a requirement to replace or dissolve the Emergency Security Committee;
- a requirement to appoint a new Chief of Police; and
- a continued need to tackle death squads and high-level corruption in the police.

1315. In contrast to the MOD's assessment that 69 percent of police stations were at a level sufficient for transition, Dr Marsden assessed that 56 percent were ready and that police trainers had been able to operate normally in 80 percent of the stations visited – in others "they have been turned away politely". Dr Marsden also stated that the transfer of land to allow construction of a new Central Prison for Basra had finally been agreed in December 2006.

1316. In his end of tour report, dated 19 January, Maj Gen Shirreff stated:

"Mission success for Britain depends on a capable, confident IA and the last six months has witnessed both highs and lows. The mutiny of 2/4/10 [2nd Battalion, 4th Brigade, 10th Division] and the failure of 4 (IA) Bde [4th Brigade] to control the looting of Camp Abu Naji in August were the obvious lows and demonstrated that the 'hands off' approach to training the IA adopted by the UK was inadequate. Arguably, no other army in the world has greater depth of experience in training indigenous armies than the British and yet we have not been true to ourselves. We have not lived, trained and fought alongside them, preferring a centralised MiTT and a far more hands off approach, in contrast to our US allies. Effectively the stabilisers were removed from the bike too early. The result has been a lacklustre, inadequately trained and supported Division that failed the test when it came.

"Subsequent to these failures, SINBAD has, for the most part, done much to improve IA capability and confidence … We finish SINBAD with the IA in the lead. However, until the IA in Basra is prepared to fight JAM, the ISF will not be capable > of maintaining law and order … as with any organisation, it depends on the man at the top and it is the best possible news that Latif, CG 10 (IA) Div [Commander General 10th Division], who has proved to be worse than useless, is to be shifted … if we are to get the IA right, it means accepting the risk of much greater embedding within IA units. This, in turn, means not only living and training with them, but being prepared to fight with them too."[1210]

1317. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lt Gen Shirreff said that Op SINBAD:

> "… failed to achieve the security which was the original genesis of the plan, but it achieved other things. I think it achieved an increased confidence among the Iraqi Army. It certainly achieved a better standard, generally speaking, of Iraqi police, in terms of the mechanistic boxes that needed to be ticked before Provincial Iraqi Control should be established …"[1211]

1318. On 25 January, Mr Browne briefed Cabinet that, in Basra:

> "… the murder rate had reduced from over 100 to less than 30 a month, which compared favourably with a number of European States and American cities. The kidnap rate had been halved and polling suggested levels of confidence in security which would be welcome in the UK; 90 percent of those polled felt more secure than a year ago; only two percent had encountered intimidation in the last six months. The biggest challenge was improvement in policing, but the police forces were only a couple of percentage points below the benchmark set for transfer of security."[1212]

1319. On 26 January, Lt Gen Lamb produced a report on ISF capability for Mr Blair.[1213] He warned about the problems of gifting equipment in an attempt to fix capability gaps:

> "This will only provide, perhaps, a marginal short term difference (usually offset by IMOD to compensate against other national priorities) and is, in general, just as likely to exacerbate the systemic issues already present in terms of logistic support e.g. through multiple vehicle fleets or weapon systems. There are also other additional factors … such directed gifting is likely to received pushback from both the US and the Iraqis."

1320. In her weekly report dated 1 February, Dr Marsden warned that the formation of the new Basra Crimes Unit (BCU) had stalled and that 400 members of the former SCU were still turning up to claim wages and entering buildings designated for the new BCU.[1214] The MOI were yet to stop their wages and the Provincial Director of Police was not engaging on the matter. She stated that MNF protection for DIA officers travelling to the Warren was critical and that "DIA concerns … were not allayed when they made the trip with Iraqi Army backup and were confronted by SCU officers". She noted that the Basra Police Academy had gone into decline since it was transferred to Iraqi control in December 2006.

1321. On 9 February, Dr Marsden sought to explain the apparent difference between improving Transitional Readiness Assessments of the police and the more qualitative assessment by those on the ground that the police force had become less effective.[1215] She stated:

> "The measurement of transition readiness levels (defined by CPATT) is mainly based on quantitative indicators such as who has been given what training, whether or not police stations are producing the requisite reports, following the right procedures and performing basic police business and whether they are properly equipped. It does not include a moral component.
> "On the positive side, we have trained and trained the lower echelons of the Basra police (11,500 in the Shaibah college alone). They have all been equipped with guns, cars and uniforms. There are some good units in the Basra police and a number of good, professional middle-ranking police officers, trying to do a good job. But the Basra police also includes an influential minority of seriously criminal and corrupt individuals and a large number of officers (probably the majority) who are more or less adequate but stifled by weak leadership and intimidated by the seriously corrupt elements and militant militias.
> "The real problem is the high level of … serious police related crime … This is evidenced by the recent interviews carried out by the Department of Internal Affairs with tortured prisoners from the Jameat. There is evidence that some police officers are also directly involved in anti-MNF activity. These criminal elements are a big part of the problem on the streets, although the size of that problem is not massive compared to Baghdad."

1322. Gen Dannatt visited Iraq from 14 to 15 February.[1216] He reported:

> "For MND(SE), 10 IA Div clearly represent the exit strategy not only from Basra City but elsewhere across the region … the fear is that 10 IA Div may not be as good as we hoped it would be … But as GOC MND(SE) rightly observed, we have regularly changed the role for which these troops were designed; they have gone from local militia (ICDC), to regional defence force and now onto an expeditionary footing … over the past three and a half years. However, we are where we are; the trick now is to maintain sufficient SSR momentum to get 10 IA Div at the level of combat effectiveness appropriate to its future role against the predicted threat. And GOC MND(SE) is looking carefully at this. It is not simply a question of enhancing our MiTTs – many Iraqi soldiers fear the MiTTs simply draw the enemy's fire. 'Partnership' is key, as we saw on Op SINBAD …"

1323. In his statement to the Inquiry, Former Chief Superintendent Barton said that, by early 2007, "the security situation had worsened so much that it was impossible to move around the city in anything other than a Warrior".[1217] He wrote that due to the security risk, inspection visits "would often be as short as twenty minutes"; in comparison, an inspection at a UK station would take "at least one full day".

10th Division called to Baghdad

In his weekly report from 31 January, Major General Jonathan Shaw, GOC MND(SE) from January 2007 until August 2007, reported that elements of 10th Division were likely to be called to Baghdad in the near future for a combat role.[1218] He assessed: "while the 10th Division has proven itself capable of basic tasks … they are not yet combat proven. Asking them to deploy to Baghdad in this role at this stage risks asking too much of them."

Two battalions of 10th Division were expected to move north in support of the Baghdad Security Plan in late February.[1219] Each battalion was to be accompanied by a team of four "military observers"[1220] who would "co-locate with US forces".

On 12 February, MOD officials recommended that two four-man UK teams should embed alongside US MiTTs with the two 10th Division battalions being deployed to Baghdad.[1221] By 21 February, plans had expanded to include a UK team of 24 based at Besmaya (from where ISF were being forward deployed to Baghdad) to help the US prepare other ISF units for the Baghdad Security Plan.[1222]

In his evidence to the Inquiry, Major General Graham Binns, GOC MND(SE) from August 2007 until February 2008, recalled:

> "… when the unit that we had trained from 10 Division deployed to Baghdad, we mentored and we sent mentoring teams with them to Baghdad … this was something that had evolved in Basra but not Baghdad."[1223]

Planning to leave Basra City

1324. On 8 January, No.10 wrote to departments requesting a number of additional reports (as described earlier in this Section), including a weekly report on developments in ISF capability, stating that Mr Blair wished to know of problems, and how and by whom they would be tackled.[1224]

1325. At the Iraq Senior Officials Group on 12 January, Mr Howard pointed out that weekly reporting would be difficult as information was produced by the US on a monthly basis so little would change from week to week.[1225] Monthly reports would therefore be more sensible.

1326. On 22 January, Mr Banner wrote to departments thanking them for a series of papers and asked that the next report on ISF capabilities include more detailed recommendations on addressing shortfalls and bottlenecks.[1226]

1327. On 26 January, Mr Banner provided Mr Blair with a number of updates.[1227] He judged that the Basra update and the ISF capabilities update suggested that "all is not well with 10th Division, including on equipment (we need to work out how this squares with CDS's assurance that all they were lacking is a water truck)".

1328. On 24 January, Mr Browne wrote to Mr Blair to update him on the rationale behind a planned reduction in troops from 7,000 to 4,500-5,000 (this is also addressed in Section 9.5).[1228] He stated:

> "There is no question of us leaving a vacuum in the city, as the IA and IPS are already doing patrols and we will remain present in the Provincial Joint Co-ordination Centre and military transition teams. Early evidence from the final stages of Op SINBAD, where the IA are in some areas not just in the lead but doing it by themselves, is that inevitably they enjoy a greater level of consent than we do – but also that they are doing a decent job. They are far from the finished article but after re-posturing our shift towards mentoring and support will ensure they continue to develop.
> "The clear military advice … is that re-posturing and the associated drawdown will not adversely affect our capacity to provide support to the Iraqi Security Forces, including underwriting it by providing a battlegroup size reserve force. We must recognise that after re-posturing re-intervention would not be straightforward but this is a nettle that must be grasped at some stage.
> "We should explain what these 4,500-5,000 personnel will be doing … The answer is that as well as holding a battlegroup in reserve … Security Sector Reform will once again be the main focus – reflected in an increase in our commitment to military and police training teams. In relation to the Police in particular – an area where I know the Americans have concerns – we have … done a considerable amount to clean up the police in Basra, but making it stick now depends mainly on the Iraqi MOI and Emergency Security Committee acting on outstanding arrest warrants …

> "Finally, given the importance right now of the Iraqis being able to assume the lead, we should take the opportunity to deal with the public demands which PM Maliki made last week on equipment – repeating in public what he has said to us in private. In fact, the position in IA 10 Div is relatively good, but the Iraqis continue to look for symbols of force to over-face the militia. We have managed to bring forward the deployment of some 240 Humvee vehicles – 140 are now in place – and we are expecting some heavy calibre arms over the next month. On my visit I will again press Defence Minister Qadir to spend his capital budget wisely and quickly including for 10 Div."

1329. On 29 January, Mr Banner requested further details from the MOD on equipment issues and MiTTing (as support for police reform).[1229]

1330. On 30 January, Mr Banner briefed the Prime Minister that one of the two "key issues" for the US was that the UK should have "an embedding/MiTT programme similar to their own".[1230] The MOD was "working on this" but was, Mr Banner felt, "reluctant".

1331. Mr Blair met Lieutenant General Nicholas Houghton, Chief of Joint Operations, and senior officials from FCO and SIS to discuss the situation in Basra on 31 January.[1231] The issue of embedding mentors was raised. Lt Gen Houghton explained that the UK approach to mentoring in Basra was different to that being developed by the US, in part because of a differing context; the US were primarily embedding with Shia forces operating in hostile Sunni areas, whereas the UK was working with Shia forces in Shia areas. He stated: "We, not they, drew the fire of local militias", hence most UK mentoring would take place at headquarters level and at bases.

1332. Mr Blair also expressed concern about the Iraqi ability to ensure security after re-posturing. Lt Gen Houghton noted that the UK would retain a re-intervention capability, and that it was "important to allow 10 Division to act independently". He conceded that there was still considerable work to be done to improve leadership in 10th Division and fill equipment gaps "where it was difficult to take bilateral action specific to 10th Division, given the prioritisation system in place via MNSTC-I". Mr Blair stated that it was "essential that our plans resulted in a 10 Division that was able to defeat JAM whenever it encountered them in an open fight. This would be the only way to instil wider confidence in the security situation."

1333. The MOD responded to Mr Banner's request on 2 February.[1232] On equipment, the MOD denied that there were any shortages for 10th Division. It explained that relevant training must take place before equipping could be completed, and that that training had not yet happened. Set against IMOD critical equipment targets for each division, 10th Division were:

- 99 percent equipped in protected mobility;
- 100 percent equipped in light weapons;
- 86 percent equipped in body armour; and
- 84 percent equipped in helmets.

1334. The MOD did acknowledge that corruption led to issued equipment being lost but stated: "once equipment has been issued … there is little MND(SE) can do to oversee the loss or relocation of such assets".

1335. On MiTTing, the MOD stated that US MiTT plans elsewhere in Iraq saw US personnel directly embedded and serving alongside their Iraqi counterparts but the UK approach differed:

> "UK practice, and one we have adopted in numerous Military Assistance Missions around the world, is focused on leadership and embedding UK personnel at brigade and divisional level rather than in fighting units. It is possible that our slightly different approach will attract criticism from the US and we will need to be ready to explain our reasoning, which is, in large part, due to the different circumstances on the ground in southern Iraq. 10 Division is more advanced than some Iraqi Army divisions elsewhere and is already responsible for security in much of MND(SE) outside Basra City. Embedded MiTTs may not, therefore be required or wanted much by the Iraqi Army in Southern Iraq."

1336. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lieutenent General Barney White-Spunner, GOC MND(SE) from February 2008, described the US approach to MiTTing:

> "It is an embedded military training team. So what the Americans had done with the First Division, and indeed with most of their formations for which they were responsible in the Iraqi Army, was they had put dedicated teams into that formation who lived and worked with them. So when that formation deployed … it brought those teams with it."[1233]

1337. On 31 January, the Cabinet Office circulated a paper entitled 'Transition in Southern Iraq: Progress and Plans'.[1234] The paper set out assessments and plans on security transition for DOP on 1 February, and is described in more detail in Section 9.5. On the IPS, it stated:

> "Basic police capability has improved and the Basra IPS is on target to achieve the 72 percent Transitional Readiness Assessment (TRA) level 2 required for transfer to Provincial Iraqi Control (PIC) by April. Over 70 percent of Police Stations in Basra province have already reached this level. This is up markedly from a starting average TRA level of 3.3 (out of 4) in September 2006.

"However, for all the efforts made, levels of trust in the police force remain low, and some assessments indicate that the IPS continue to do more to undermine rather than guarantee security."

1338. On the Iraqi Army, the paper stated that the main issue was the "quality of its leadership, in addition to unwillingness to stand up to militia activity and a lack of equipment". To address concerns about 10th Division's capabilities and readiness, a "dedicated" SSR team of four MiTTs would be deployed, each comprising five or six people, to carry out training at divisional and brigade level.

1339. The paper noted that closing bases in the city would make any military re-intervention high-risk. In the event of re-intervention, all training of the ISF would have to cease until the operation was complete. Post-PIC plans for SSR depended on a degree of freedom of movement in and around Basra, including a military and civilian presence at the PJCC.

1340. Mr Browne visited Iraq from 28 to 31 January (described in Section 9.5).[1235] In a report of the visit, an Assistant Private Secretary reported that Mr Browne was told that:

- The leadership of Basra security structures was inadequate (a point which he in turn raised with Prime Minister Maliki and Mr Abdel Qadir, Iraqi Defence Minister).
- The US was not convinced about Basra being ready for transition or the capability of the 10th Division.
- The Police Adviser felt the police were less effective than six months before "principally because of intimidation rather than any lack of training or capability".

1341. Mr Browne's Assistant Private Secretary commented that those views seemed to contradict the messages that had previously been received on the success of Op SINBAD. There was "a lack of firm indicators to substantiate or refute" the different conclusions.

1342. In his update to DOP on 1 February, Mr Browne reported on his visit to Iraq.[1236] In Basra he had "seen first hand the positive effect that Operation SINBAD had had"; the reported murder rate had reduced and "sectarian violence had almost stopped". Continued violence was mainly directed against coalition forces.

[1235] Minute McNeil to MA1/DCDS(C), 1 February 2006 [sic], 'Defence Secretary's Visit to Iraq – 28-31 January 2007'.

Understanding the murder rate in Basra

On 1 February, Dr Marsden sought to provide context to the figures behind murder rates in Basra.[1237] She wrote:

> "Anecdotal evidence from Basrawi contacts and some other sources of information suggest that levels of intimidation of Basrawis by JAM and other militias remain high. Yet crime figures quoted in the 31 January DOP paper suggests that the reported murder rate fell sharply in the second half of 2006.
> "Confusingly there is no single collation point for recording crime in Basra. There are currently two sets of crime figures in use: those produced by the PJCC (jointly run by the IPS, IA and MNF) and those produced by the criminal statistics department of the IPS. The IPS figures are based on crimes reported weekly by police stations to the criminal statistics department in Police HQ. The PJCC figures are based on emergency calls received from members of the public and (sporadic) radio reports from individual police officers on the ground. They do not take account of police station reports. Both sets of figures are incomplete because they do not include tribal murders (in which the police do not get involved), many cases of family violence and crimes committed by police officers themselves (a significant omission as many of the murders in Basra are actually committed by the police themselves, notably the death squads in the Serious Crimes Unit and certain other units).
> "The reported murder and kidnapping rates quoted in the DOP paper are based on PJCC figures. These show that the murder rate rose from around 50 a month in early 2006 to over 100 a month in the second quarter … declining to 30 in December 2006. The IPS figures show a similar trend in the first half of the year, with the murder rate peaking at over 100 a month in April-June 2006, but with a much less marked decline in the second half of the year (to 80-90 murders a month in the last quarter of 2006)."

1343. On 13 February, MOD officials provided a paper to DOP on how best to balance military effort across Iraq and Afghanistan (see Section 9.5).[1238] The MOD said that current plans were that, following re-posturing up to six UK military sub units[1239] and three battlegroup headquarters would be available for ISF training. Specifically:

- one company devoted to training the Iraqi Army at the Divisional Training Centre;
- one company to provide a "flying" MiTT to monitor and mentor the 1st and 4th Brigades of 10th Division;
- one company to support FCO-led Police Training Teams, based at the PJCC;
- up to two companies to provide training and assistance to the DBE in border-related operations; and
- a company based at Basra Palace (until August) available to periodically conduct training of the Iraqi Army.

[1237] Letter Marsden to Aldred, 1 February 2007, 'Basra: Weekly Report'.
[1238] Paper MOD, 13 February 2007, 'Iraq and Afghanistan: Balancing Military Effort in 2007'.
[1239] The Inquiry estimates that those sub units would each contain around 100 people.

1344. In addition, smaller MiTTs would remain embedded with the Headquarters of 10th Division.

1345. The MOD said that central to their re-posturing plans would be the release of manpower to better focus on training for the IPS, Iraqi Army and DBE, concentrating on the weakest areas of leadership and collective training.

1346. To help Mr Blair draft a statement to Parliament on the latest military plans, the MOD provided an update on Op SINBAD on 16 February.[1240] The paper described a number of areas where progress had been achieved:

- Experience of operations for the PJCC had improved the ISF's ability to plan and co-ordinate operations in the city. The paper did say that "given its central importance PJCC mentoring will continue beyond SINBAD and PIC".
- A reduction in reported crime. There was no mention of concerns over the validity of those figures.
- An improvement in basic police capability, although problems with leadership and corruption were acknowledged and the paper later assessed that up to 75 percent of Basra IPS were members of a militia and "many" were linked to criminal activity.
- The Iraqi Army had reached the level required for PIC but "their ability to stand up to militias unaided by coalition remains questionable".

1347. On 21 February, Mr Blair delivered his statement in Parliament:

> "Since the outset, our plan, agreed by the United Nations, has been to build up Iraqi capability in order to let Iraqis take control of their own destiny, and that as they would step up, we would increasingly step back. For three years therefore, we have been working to create, train and equip Iraqi security forces capable of taking on the security of the country themselves.
> "In normal circumstances, the progress would be considered remarkable. There are now 10 Divisions of the new Iraqi Army and more than 130,000 soldiers, able in significant parts of the country to provide order. There are 135,000 personnel in the Iraqi Police Service. There, the progress has been more constrained, and frequently hampered by corruption and sectarianism, but none the less, again, in normal circumstances, it would be considered a remarkable effort. The plan of General Petraeus … which was conceived in 2004, has in its essential respects been put in place …
> "Over the past months, we have been conducting an operation in Basra with the 10th Division of the Iraqi Army, to reach the stage where Basra can be secured by the Iraqis themselves …

[1240] Letter Beadle to Banner, 16 February 2007, 'The Effects of Op SINBAD 20 September 2006 to 14 January 2007' attaching Paper 'The Effect of Operation SINBAD'.

"As a result of the operation in Basra, which is now complete, the Iraq forces now have the primary role for security in most parts of the city. It is still a difficult and sometimes dangerous place, but many extremists have been arrested or have left the city. The reported levels of murder and kidnapping are significantly down …

"What all this means is not that Basra is how we want it to be but that the next chapter in Basra's history can be written by the Iraqis …

"The British forces that remain in Iraq will have the following tasks:

- training and support to Iraqi forces;
- securing the Iraq-Iran border;
- securing supply routes;
- and, above all, the ability to conduct operations against extremist groups and be there in support of the Iraqi Army when called upon.

"Over time, and depending naturally on progress and the capability of the Iraq security forces, we will be able to draw down further, possibly to below 5,000 once the Basra Palace site has been transferred to the Iraqis in late summer."[1241]

CONTINUING CONCERNS WITH THE BASRA JUSTICE SYSTEM AND IRAQI POLICE SERVICE

1348. The paper produced by the IPU and British Embassy Baghdad on 16 February 2007 described problems with Basra's judicial system.[1242] There was "considerable evidence of the extra-legal influence of political/religious factions on the judicial process". Those judges involved in combating corruption had expressed concern for their personal safety and there was a lack of judicial control.

1349. The paper included a recommendation that attempts to bring prosecutions in IPS corruption cases should continue. A new Basra courthouse would be completed by November 2007 and a 1,500-capacity prison would be created in Basra. Those conclusions were reflected in the Better Basra Mark III plan (described later in this Section).

1350. On 26 February, in response to the latest weekly report from Dr Marsden, No.10 wrote to departments:

"The Prime Minister is seized of the need to replace [Brigadier] Hamadi as Director of Basra Police. We need to take urgent action with Maliki to underline the case for this, and to ensure the effective functioning of the Serious Crimes Unit. The Prime Minister thinks this may require a high level visit, from the Foreign or > Defence Secretary or a Special Envoy, in order to reinforce the point that this is of high importance to HMG [Her Majesty's Government] and the Prime Minister personally."[1243]

1351. In her report dated 28 February (dealt with in more detail in Section 9.5), Dr Marsden wrote:

> "While polling suggests that the IPS inspire confidence in about 65 percent of the population … those questioned by British representatives said that the police could not be trusted. Many told stories of intimidation and claimed knowledge of kidnappings and death squads. Others said they would not call the police emergency hotline to report criminal or terrorist activity for fear that policemen taking the calls were in cahoots with the militias. Basrawis are willing to call the police to report general crime but if criminals threatened them or their families, they are more likely to turn to their tribe for help."[1244]

UPDATED BETTER BASRA PLAN

1352. The third iteration of the Better Basra Plan, 'Better Basra Mark III', was sent by Dr Marsden to Ms Aldred on 2 March.[1245] It is described more fully in Section 9.5.

1353. It set out the combined military and civilian strategic priorities for Basra for the coming six months. One of the indicators of success would be "Iraqi Government control sustained after PIC with no breakdown of law and order". The plan had a number of subsections including "security" and "Rule of Law".

1354. The "security" aim was to "reduce the threat from illegal armed groups and Iranian proxies and build the capacity of the Iraqi Army to take on militant JAM and conduct their own Strike Operations". The plan noted that, although the Iraqi Army had grown in confidence during Op SINBAD, it would "certainly face stiffer tests in future". To enhance capability over the next six months the UK would:

- deploy MiTTs with 10th Division Iraqi Army units;
- provide further leadership training;
- conduct more joint operations;
- establish Iraqi ownership and a relationship of trust with the Basra Emergency Security Committee (assuming the Iraqi Government wished to maintain it); and
- press the IMOD and the US to provide more equipment (particularly heavy weapons) so that 10th Division felt sufficiently equipped to engage effectively.

[1243] Letter Fletcher to Siddiq, 26 February 2007, 'Iraq: Basra'.
[1244] Letter Marsden to McDonald, 28 February 2007, 'Basra: Everyday Life for Ordinary Iraqis'.
[1245] Letter Marsden to Aldred, 2 March 2007, 'Better Basra' attaching Paper, 1 March 2007, 'Better Basra Mark 3: The 2007 Plan'.

1355. The aim for "Rule of Law" was to:

> "… bring the Basra police to a 'good enough' standard to transition to PIC. Basra's population have the right to expect more of its police. The police should be able to carry out basic policing tasks; Basrawis should feel that if they report a crime, it will be acted on; the police should not be the home of organised death squads (although it is unrealistic to expect zero corruption); and militia influence should not be at levels where it is the dominant force in police stations."

1356. To achieve those aims, the UK would:

- support the DIA, based in a protected compound at Basra Air Station;
- encourage the "pursuit" of the 62 death squad leaders from the SCU and NIIA (of which three had already been arrested);
- press Baghdad to replace the weak Provincial Director of Police (PDoP);
- improve co-operation between the Basra police and the MOI in Baghdad;
- continue intensive mentoring of the PDoP and other senior IPS officers;
- continue monitoring and mentoring police stations to achieve 80 percent of police stations at the level required for PIC;
- encourage the removal of unqualified and poor performers;
- establish a properly vetted, fully professional Criminal Investigation Department;
- mentor the Basra branch of the NIIA to try and ensure that criminal elements of the CIU do not migrate into the unit; and
- provide forensic capability at Basra Police Headquarters.

1357. The plan described the judiciary as "weak and unable to prosecute serious crime". The aim was to "empower Basra's judges and prosecutors to tackle serious crime (particularly police corruption) in a more secure, less intimidating environment". Priorities for the next six months were to:

- build the capacity of judges and others involved in the judicial process through mentoring, specifically the Prosecution Mentoring Unit (staffed by two international prosecutors funded by the plan);
- establish regional training programmes;
- improve security measures at the main Basra courthouse;
- build an additional courthouse, using US Department of Justice funding, which would include witness protection facilities; and
- provide scene of crime and forensic training for investigative judges and judicial investigators.

1358. Basra's prisons were described as "old, overcrowded" and said to "not meet minimum international human rights standards". The aim was to "support the development of an Iraqi Corrections System that complies with Iraqi law and international standards regarding capacity, conditions of confinement and humane treatment of prisoners" by:

- increasing prison capacity by building and commissioning a new US-funded Basra Central Prison for 1,500 prisoners;
- continuing to strengthen the capacity of correctional services staff by implementing a UK training programme and further mentoring; and
- continuing to monitor management of the two existing prisons.

NATIONAL INFORMATION AND INVESTIGATION AGENCY RAID

1359. On 3 March, Iraqi Special Operations Forces (ISOF), supported by MNF troops, carried out a raid on the National Information and Investigation Agency (NIIA) in Basra.[1246]

1360. Mr Beadle wrote to No.10 about the raid in a letter dated 16 March.[1247] The pre-planned operation was to detain an NIIA officer associated with death squads who had been a "priority UK target for over two years". The target was not present and the raid resulted in the escape of around 30 prisoners (who had been tortured according to some reports).

1362. On the same day, Mr Maliki told Mr Asquith that he was disappointed at the "reprehensible" way in which the raid had been conducted and the violation of Iraqi sovereignty that it represented.[1248] He warned that the consequence of such operations might be severe restrictions on the ability to deploy ISOF.

1363. Three investigations resulted from the raid: one by the MOI, one led by Mr Safa al-Safi (Prime Minister Maliki's Ministerial Security Adviser on Basra) and one by the MNF.[1249] The MNF was reviewing mechanisms for informing the Iraqi Government of sensitive operations.

1364. Maj Shaw wrote in his weekly report on 8 March:

> "It is clear that the raid was both legal and, in tactical targeting terms, a good call … Within the context of the wider politics of Iraq and with the benefit of hindsight, > however, the operation was ill-judged. Local political reaction has been relatively muted … My sense though is that, locally, the desire for progress and transition remains and this should motivate them to treat this incident more as a speed bump than an obstacle …"[1250]

1365. Mr Bill Jeffrey, Permanent Under Secretary for the MOD from November 2005 to October 2010, met Maj Gen Shaw during a visit to Iraq from 12 to 13 March.[1251] Maj Gen Shaw reported that the raid on the NIIA offices could "have been handled better", with hindsight, but that "most reactions by local political figures were either somewhat synthetic or manageable".

1366. Maj Gen Shaw reflected on the raid in his evidence to the Inquiry.[1252] He said:

> "[It] was the one operation where they [the Iraqi Government] did object to it … that raid … exposed the difficulties within the Shia polity again … It was a raid carried out by the Iraqi special forces, so it was an Iraqi raid and it was trying very hard to abide by or comply with Iraqi sovereignty."

1367. On 15 March, Maj Gen Shaw highlighted the importance of tackling violence not directed at MNF and the difficulties of doing that, saying:

> "The fundamental assumption behind the NIIA raid was that it was consistent with, indeed in pursuit of, Iraqi sovereignty: that the nature of the target (known death squad leader against whom an Iraqi judge had issued an arrest warrant) and the method of arrest (ISOF, not MNF) would bring GoI buy-in, even though it was within a building owned by the IPS (which PM Maliki … acknowledged to be corrupt)."[1253]

1368. Maj Gen Shaw reflected on how the NIIA incident illustrated concerns about transition:

> "It is in this context … that the NIIA raid needs to be viewed. If we are to address the Iraqi end-state, our focus needs to be less on the 90 percent violence against us, more on the 10 percent reported inter-Shia/Iraqi violence which threatens stability when we are gone. Tackling death squad leaders … who pose the major threat to the political stability of Basra, is the most useful application of military force to support the political end-state …
> "My short-term concern is that the issue blights transition … A line needs to be drawn under this operation in the interest of achieving Iraqi self-reliance … My long-term concerns centre around the defining impact these investigations will > have for our future operations and indeed rationale. Firstly, the 'Untouchable' status of ISOF is already being attacked by the sectional interest within the GOI that (quite rightly) feel threatened by such a body. The fear is that their freedom of movement and action is curtailed, their operations politically constrained; this would be most damaging to ISOF itself and PM Maliki's ability to operate to the national interest. Secondly, the danger is that political constraints are so tightly drawn that MND(SE) cannot operate against the 10 percent threat to the Iraqi end state. If we ever reached the stage when MND(SE) were restricted to operations in pursuit of our own force protection, we would need seriously to question our rationale for being here."

1369. Maj Gen Shaw said in his evidence to the Inquiry that "all kinds of mistreatment of prisoners" were found during the raid, including the rape of a woman in front of her two children.[1254] However, the mistreatment was not the political headline, "the political headline was that we had broached Iraqi sovereignty". Maj Gen Shaw concluded:

> "So yes, that was a mistake, it was an unfortunate raid, we learned lessons from it, we played even more gingerly with Shia political sensitivities thereafter."

1370. On 20 March, ACM Stirrup told Mr Blair that "Petraeus had been helpful in handling the fallout from the raid on the NIIA headquarters, and that this was in any case having only a limited effect on operations in Basra itself."[1255]

1371. Maj Gen Shaw reported on 21 March: "The ripples of the raid on the NIIA are seemingly spreading the further we get from the operation itself."[1256]

1372. The IMOD had issued a letter stating that joint operations between the Iraqi Army in Basra and the MNF should cease temporarily. Although that had since been rescinded, Maj Gen Shaw commented that "this makes moving Basra forward towards PIC more difficult".

1373. On the same day, Mr Blair's Private Secretary updated Mr Blair on the continued fallout from the raid.[1257] The MNF-I investigation into the NIIA raid had concluded that the operation was conducted in good faith and in support of Iraqi law. But there had been no notification to either the Iraqi Government or Gen Petraeus because the operation had been deemed time sensitive. The raid was described as "aggressive but professional" and it was miscommunication that had led to the prisoners escaping.

1374. It took until late April for the police mission to regain access to the NIIA building.[1258]

ASSESSMENTS OF IRAQI SECURITY FORCE READINESS FOR PROVINCIAL IRAQI CONTROL

1375. In March and April, British forces withdrew from a number of bases in Basra City, handing them over to 10th Division:

- the Old State Building on 20 March;[1259]
- the Shatt al-Arab Hotel on 8 April; and[1260]
- Shaibah Logistics Base on 24 April.[1261]

1376. A JIC Assessment on 25 April considered the prospects for transition in the South.[1262] It assessed:

> "Increased security efforts in Basra between September 2006 and March 2007 (Operation SINBAD) had some local effect in disrupting militia activity and improving public confidence … Sectarian and other murders have fallen from some 100 a month in mid-2006 to 30 in March 2007 … Other forms of violence, criminality, and intimidation – much of which we judge goes unreported – remain widespread.
> "MND(SE) assess that ISF in Basra now meet the minimum criteria for transitional readiness. Slow improvement in the army continues: 1 Brigade in Basra took the lead in the latter stages of Operation SINBAD and performed well, within the limitations of their capability. Much more serious problems persist in the local police […] 61 arrest warrants against SCU officers remain outstanding, despite coalition pressure. A weight of reporting shows that police effectiveness in Basra is still severely compromised by corruption, poor leadership and the entrenched influence of Shia militias. Some policemen are actively assisting JAM attacks on MNF.
> "We judge that as the scale of MNF presence reduces, violence between rival Shia political parties, backed by their militias, is likely to intensify. Most see PIC as an opportunity to extend their own power base in political and security structures, and increase control over economic resources …
> "The nature and scale of any conflict will be determined partly by events in Baghdad and Najaf, particularly the ability of the United Iraqi Alliance to stick together and assert authority over its provincial supporters … In the absence of an effective political brake on serious intra-Shia fighting, we judge that the ISF would not be able to cope; the police would probably fragment and the army would try to avoid direct confrontation, while seeking to contain the situation."

1377. At Cabinet on 3 May, Mr Browne stated:

> "In Basra and the South-East, there were encouraging signs of progress. The Iraqi Army division … was becoming, by any measure, very effective. Its performance and training had impressed the Americans when it was operating in Baghdad … In Basra we had now handed over to the Iraqis two bases in the City and one outside without incident, a significant contrast with the disorder that had taken place over earlier base handovers … The Iraqi security infrastructure did not work well and its leadership, including the Provincial Chief of Police and Emergency Security Committee, was ineffective and incapable of providing the direction needed by those in the police forces capable of working effectively (estimated as some 80 percent) …"[1263]

1378. On 2 May, Sir Nigel Sheinwald met ACM Stirrup to discuss whether there was "continuing military utility" in the UK's mission in Iraq.[1264] ACM Stirrup said that he saw that resting on the continuing need to train the Iraqi 10th Division, anti-JAM operations and a capacity to re-intervene. Sir Nigel reported the meeting to Mr Blair and highlighted that ACM Stirrup had not mentioned the IPS, making the observation: "I think the MOD now regard them as a busted flush."

1379. On 25 May, a planned ISOF operation in Basra resulted in the death of the Basra JAM leader Mr Wissam Abu Qadir.[1265] Maj Gen Shaw described the operation as a success but reported:

> "The performance of the ISF was less convincing. Not surprisingly that the IPS failed to stand and defend the PJCC, but more disappointing that the Iraqi Army was returned to barracks (following another JAM capture and humiliating release of two IA vehicles and crew) whilst JAM was on the streets. The order to remain in barracks was given by Gen Ali Hamadi (Chair of the Emergency Security Committee). His reasons are not clear, although Gen Habib [the new commander of 10th Division] claims that it was a direct order from PM Maliki. It may well be true that last Friday night was not the right time for 10th Division to stand and fight JAM toe to toe and that the call was a good one. It may equally be true that Gen Ali ordered them back into barracks as a face saving measure, fearing that 1 Bde (who are Basrawis) would refuse to soldier, or that JAM had pressurised him into withdrawing them, to give them a clear shot at us. Gen Habib is, however, acutely aware of the issues within his own Division and the need to address them. He needs to be given the opportunity to solve the problems … in an Iraqi way … But as hinted at above, this 'Iraqi way' may prove in time to be a 'non-aggression' pact between the IA and JAM."

1380. On 13 June, Maj Gen Shaw concluded his weekly report to Lt Gen Houghton:

> "The thought I leave my staff to ponder is the credibility of our recommendation at month end if this remains, 'Basra ready for transition to PIC in Aug/Sep'. The pragmatic UK PIC judgements have always been based in large part on judgements about 'Iraqi good enough' in agreement with Iraqi judgements on risk. The recent focus of GoI interest in Basra security has seemingly reversed what was hitherto Iraqi enthusiasm for PIC. PM Maliki is concerned about early PIC, the Governor is against it, as is MG Habib: the IPS are recognised as incapable hence the future of Basra's security is being placed in a new … army division (as yet unformed and unprogrammed); and a new security supremo is promised but as yet unappointed (although rumours abound). Lack of Iraqi enthusiasm for PIC, and the lengthy period required to enact the Iraqi solutions, play to State's concerns about the PIC process and will make my and LTG Odierno's [Lieutenant General Raymond Odierno, US Commander Multi-National Corp - Iraq] desire for Basra PIC harder to justify."[1266]

1381. On 27 June, the JIC reiterated their judgement on the likelihood of violence after PIC and the ability of the Basra ISF to cope:

> "The desire for national Shia unity and the ability of local parties to broker deals may restrain but will not prevent political violence in the South. In the likely event of serious intra-Shia fighting the police would probably take sides according to their particular tribal and militia affiliations and the army would try to remain on the sidelines."[1267]

Iraqi appointments

Three key security personnel in Basra were replaced between March and June 2007:

- Major General Habib was appointed as the new Commander of 10th Division, replacing Maj Gen Latif.[1268]
- General Mohan became the head of newly established Basra Provincial Operational Command, effectively taking overall control of security from Maj Gen Ali Hamadi, who became his deputy.[1269]
- Major General Jalil was appointed as Provincial Director of Police, reporting to General Mohan. Maj Gen Jalil replaced Brig Mohammed Hamadi.

TRANSITION IN BASRA

1382. In July 2007, the UK presence at the PJCC comprised 100 military personnel and seven police advisers.[1270]

1383. On 7 June, Maj Gen Shaw reported:

> "The increased attacks on the PJCC have exposed a known vulnerability, and disproved the hope that co-location with IPS would provide some protection … [W]e are reinforcing its sustainment whilst we are there, and reviewing its viability in the longer term, particularly when Basra Palace is vacated."[1271]

1384. The minutes of the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 12 June recorded that a DOP paper on the timing of leaving Basra Palace was being delayed until 12 July to allow time for further advice on whether UK personnel could remain in the PJCC after it was vacated.[1272] The MOD assessment was that the advantages of remaining outweighed the disadvantages.

1385. On 13 June, Maj Gen Shaw reported that MND(SE) was keeping the PJCC issue under constant review: "The situation is fluid and I would wish to retain the freedom of decision for as long as possible. My intent remains to retain it for as long as practicable, and we are well aware of the message sent if/when we leave it."[1273]

1386. On 20 June, the PJCC was attacked by indirect fire (IDF), fatally wounding Major Paul Harding.[1274] The junior official briefing Mr Browne on the incident wrote that the PJCC had been subject to a number of attacks over the last month, including from Rocket Propelled Grenades and IDF. Although a number of personnel had been wounded in those attacks, this was the first UK fatality.

1387. The official wrote that, because of the attacks, the PJCC was subject to regular security reviews. A mortar locating radar had recently been installed as a result. The medical team in place (one Emergency Trauma Nurse and three combat medical technicians) was more than would ordinarily be allocated to a deployment of the PJCC's size, but had been deemed necessary because of the increased threat to the site.

1388. AM Stirrup visited Iraq from 1 to 3 July.[1275] His visit report stated that he had been advised by Maj Gen Shaw that there was "little military advantage" in retaining a presence at either the PJCC or Basra Palace, other than for "retaining a base for strike operations and some situational awareness". Maj Gen Shaw advocated relocating to Basra Air Station at the "earliest practicable point". Maj Gen Shaw was "confident" that the conditions set for PIC had been met.

1389. The minutes from the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 10 July stated that Lt Gen Odierno had disagreed with Maj Gen Shaw's assessment that Basra was ready for PIC.[1276] Lt Gen Odierno had said that the new ISF structures should be allowed time to "bed-in", with the possibility of PIC in October 2007.

1390. On 13 July, Maj Gen Shaw reported that Maj Gen Jalil was taking a "robust stance" towards the IPS in Basra, docking pay and sacking police officers.[1277] He had also begun his "purge" of militia elements within the IPS – removing vehicles and ending their employment. In response, he had been subject to an assassination attempt when he left the PJCC.

1391. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Maj Gen Shaw recalled that Maj Gen Jalil had come to "the very strong conclusion – very early" that "the issue here is not one of training, nor of equipment, it is one of loyalty", and that that was a statement that resonated very strongly with previously held views.[1278] Maj Gen Shaw said:

> "… why is it that police forces in Muthanna and Dhi Qar … operate so differently to the police in Basra when they both had the same equipment and the same training? The only difference was loyalty. It wasn't a question of whether they were members of militias or not, because … the police forces in Dhi Qar and Muthanna were actually Badr dominated, but … there was unity of command.
> "… if you, as a militia, decided to work with the Government of Iraq, then that was fine."

1392. Maj Gen Shaw said that Maj Gen Jalil recognised that the problem with the Basra police force was that it "reflected all the divisions within the Basra society". Maj Gen Shaw added that "Unfortunately, the same was true of the army as well and that was the problem with 10 Division."

1393. Gen Mohan shared Maj Gen Shaw's analysis "that the problem was loyalty". MNF received political advice from Gen Mohan "as to what he thought the impact of military strikes would be and whether they would be good or bad". That process generated optimism "with a very positive way forward … for a political resolution of the violence problem".

1394. On 15 July, Lt Gen Lamb reported that Gen Mohan and Maj Gen Jalil had given a "very stark" assessment of the situation in Basra to the Ministerial Committee for National Security (MCNS).[1279] He stated that Gen Mohan had "an 'outline' plan" to rectify "what he described as a city without law and order". He was already reviewing his initial assessment on the early move of British forces out of Basra City.

A new Iraqi Army division for Basra

On 12 June 2007, Maj Gen Wall briefed the Chiefs of Staff that the Iraqi Minister of Defence had recently called for MND(SE) to have two army divisions; one for Basra City and one for the rest of the South-East.[1280] Maj Gen Wall reported that there was no indication of how this new division would be raised, funded or equipped.

At the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 26 June, Lt Gen Houghton reported that "greater clarity" had been achieved.[1281] The 10th Division would be given an additional brigade; a new 14th Division which would assume responsibility for the rest of the South-East, with nine brigades across Muthanna, Dhi Qar and Maysan provinces.

Lt Gen Houghton stated that work would continue on training 1,000 personnel, primarily pre-2003 Iraqi Army personnel, to form the Presidential Guard Force who would take control of Basra Palace. The force was due to be ready by 14 August.

On 17 July, Maj Gen Wall briefed the Chiefs of Staff that a Ministerial Order had been issued for the creation of 14th Division, which would now have responsibility for Basra.[1282]

The 10th Division would "reposture" with its headquarters in either al-Amara or Nasiriyah.

1395. On 19 July, Major General Gerald Berragan, Deputy Commander (Operations) Multi-National Corps-Iraq, reported on a meeting of the Crisis Action Cell earlier that week.[1283] He wrote that Gen Mohan's description of Basra at the meeting was that:

- The police were infiltrated by militia and unreliable.
- The 1st Brigade of 10th Division were "defeated".
- The 5th Brigade was still in formation and lacking key capabilities.
- The ISF was set against a complex political environment with 24 militias all armed and competing for power.
- Iran was influencing and gathering intelligence.
- Organised crime was rife and weapons were being openly sold in the streets.

1396. In advance of a planned NSID(OD) meeting on 19 July, FCO and MOD officials produced a joint paper, setting out the latest assessment and plans for security transition and the associated re-posturing and drawdown of UK troops in Basra, to inform decisions by Ministers at that meeting (see Section 9.6).[1284] The paper described the strategic context across Iraq and then focused on what that meant for transition in Basra. The US, parts of the Iraqi Government and Gen Mohan, Maj Gen Jalil and Gen Habib had serious concerns over the ability of the ISF in Basra to cope with the security situation. On the other hand Gen Mohan's and Maj Gen Shaw's assessment was that the MNF presence was a distorting factor which caused the ISF to be seen as collaborators rather than nationalists.

1397. The officials suggested withdrawing the UK's presence from the PJCC at the same time as Basra Palace, given the threat to UK personnel. The paper stated:

> "When we leave the PJCC, our Security Sector Reform work there will cease … But in our judgement, these downsides are outweighed by the risks in remaining at the site. And the PJCC is no longer as crucial a centre for the Iraqi Security Forces, since Mohan moved the Basra Operations Centre to the Shatt Al-Arab Hotel. We therefore recommend that we plan to remove all UK personnel from the site in parallel with leaving Basra Palace."

1398. Recalling the looting that occurred when the UK vacated Camp Abu Naji in Maysan, the paper stated that it was "critical" that the UK did not leave until a "credible Iraqi Guard Force" was in place. That would be ready by the end of August.

1399. The paper described US concerns about transition:

> "They [the US] are intensely nervous about transition in Basra. They believe the local Iraqi Security Forces are not robust enough to handle security without our direct support."

1400. On the future for Basra, the paper stated that there might be "an initial period in which the Iraqi Security Forces faced challenges to their authority from militia groups" and that "There will be weaknesses at the leadership level in the Iraqi Security Forces."

1401. In an annex to the paper, there was an assessment of Basra province against the conditions for PIC, one of which was "the Iraqi Security Forces' capacity to maintain order and conduct counter insurgency operations". The paper reiterated concerns about the "vulnerability [of 10th Division] to political pressure when operating in Basra" and stated that it was likely that that would continue leading to them refusing to confront JAM independently. The Basra IPS was "on target" to meet the PIC criteria with 93 percent of stations assessed at TRA level 2 or higher. It then reiterated concerns about public confidence, militia infiltration and the requirement for institutional reform.

1402. Another annex addressed future UK ambitions in Basra. The military plan was that 950 troops would be assigned to SSR and "rear area tasks such as border patrols". The military would also assist in maintaining an acceptable security environment to enable SSR activities.

1403. On 6 August, the British Embassy Baghdad reported on the MCNS meeting held the previous day.[1285] Mr Qadar, the Minister of Defence, was impressed with the "positive impact" that Gen Mohan and Maj Gen Jalil had made on the security situation in Basra and he was trying to identify further reinforcements for 10th Division. Mr Boulani, the Minister of Interior, was looking to reinforce Basra's police force with better leaders, possibly with commanders outside the province.

1404. On 30 August, Major General Graham Binns, GOC MND(SE) from August 2007 until February 2008, reported that UK forces had handed over the PJCC four days previously, ahead of schedule and without incident.[1286]

1405. The same day, at the Iraq Strategy Group meeting, Lieutenant General Peter Wall, Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Commitments) from August 2007, reported that there had been some "limited militia infiltration and looting of the site" following the handover "with the possible collusion or acquiescence of the Iraqi Police Service".[1287]

1406. In a letter from Mr Browne to Mr Gordon Brown (who had become Prime Minister on 27 June) on 31 August, the looting was described as "unauthorised movement of equipment".[1288] In response, Gen Mohan deployed his entire reserve battalion to the site.

1407. On 3 September, UK forces withdrew from Basra Palace and relocated at Basra Air Station (as described in Section 9.6).[1289] As well as the Presidential Guard Force, elements from the 10th Division were stationed in Basra Palace.

1408. Maj Gen Binns described the withdrawal in his evidence to the Inquiry:

> "… we first had to fold in from the … PJCC, the Permanent Joint Co-ordination Centre. So we had to remove our presence there and come into the Palace. We then had to recruit, train, equip and deploy an Iraqi security force which became known as the Palace Protection Force, to take over the Palace.
> "Then we had to conduct a relief in place[1290] with the Iraqi Palace Protection Force, and then, the final act in all of that, was to remove ourselves in early September.
> "… I reflect that it went remarkably well, considering all of the complexities."[1291]

1409. As a result of withdrawing UK police from the Warren site, support to the PJCC and the NIIA ceased, as did station visits by Police Transition Teams.[1292]

The security situation after British withdrawal

1410. The Governor of Muthanna province was assassinated on 20 August, the second Shia governor to be killed that month.[1293]

1411. On 20 September, Maj Gen Binns stated:

> "Reporting from multiple sources indicates that the security situation is improving; IPS and IA units are conducting joint operations in the city … and LOs [liaison officers] from the BOC [Basra Operations Command] are now working in the PJCC. Basrawis seem reassured by this new security profile but remain concerned that militias are using the ceasefire period to reorganise and resupply. Of course criminality and gangsterism remain endemic."[1294]

1412. On 1 October, ahead of a visit to Iraq, Mr Brown was briefed by a junior official that there had been "some worrying high profile assassinations of religious and police figures" and a car bomb which had killed three people in recent weeks.[1295] Support by local politicians for Gen Mohan and Maj Gen Jalil was described as "sporadic".

1413. On 2 October, Mr Brown told journalists in Baghdad:

> "What we have been trying over these last few months also to build up the Iraqi Security Forces … we are now in a position where there are nearly 30,000 Iraqi Security Forces [in the South]. So what we propose to do over these next few months is to … maintain a facility for re-intervention if necessary, but at the same time we play a greater role in training future security forces. I believe that within the next two months we can move to Provincial Iraqi Control, and that is the Iraqis taking responsibility for their own security in the whole of Basra. I believe that the 30,000 security forces that are being trained are capable of discharging these responsibilities for security …"[1296]

1414. On 7 November, Acting ACC Michael Colbourne, Chief Police Adviser from March 2007 to April 2008, wrote to the FCO in London to articulate Maj Gen Jalil's expectations for UK support with police training.[1297] Maj Gen Jalil intended to reform the Basra IPS by:

- "restructuring the force to deliver five Emergency Battalions" (only one was currently formed);
- "rebuilding the NIIA (retaining 50 of the current staff and dismissing the rest)";
- "rebuilding the CID (retaining 50 of the current staff and dismissing the rest)"; and

- "re-organising the 'local policing' resources to deliver effective crime prevention, investigation and community policing".

1415. ACC Colbourne wrote that developing the Emergency Battalions would be "the most demanding aspect of this support". He had agreed with Maj Gen Jalil that his team would complete the current training of his officers at Shaibah in addition to generating an Iraqi training team. He planned for the six existing ArmorGroup IPAs to put that team in place, capable of delivering the Emergency Battalion syllabus, by early December. It had been agreed that all other Basra-based ArmorGroup contractors would end their missions by the end of November. ACC Colbourne stated that "the sheer scale of the training" required a "bigger and more permanent" solution.

1416. ACC Colbourne wrote that the Emergency Battalions would be "instrumental" in enabling Maj Gen Jalil to "engage the militias" and "hold ground". Once achieved, he wrote that there would "be an urgent need to reposition the 'miltaristic' policing style which will be dominant in Basra, to a more community focused local policing approach".

1417. The House of Commons Defence Committee had published a report on 3 December 2007, following a visit to Iraq from 8 to 11 July.[1298]

1418. Reporting on the Committee's visit to Basra, Mr Asquith said that in response to being asked about the current security situation in the city and the likely consequences of a UK withdrawal within 12 months:

> "The Basrawis were clear: services and reconstruction were improving but the main problem was that the ISF were under-funded, unqualified and security was deteriorating. The British Government had promised a lot when it liberated Iraq, but had not delivered. Militias were more of a concern than criminal gangs. The provincial authorities were not able to confront the militias because the security forces owed their loyalty to political parties rather than the State … Pulling no punches, they said a British withdrawal would 'be followed by chaos sweeping the province like a hurricane'."[1299]

1419. The Committee's report concluded:

> "Despite its increasing capability, the Iraqi Army in South Eastern Iraq still requires the support of UK Forces, particularly in logistics and intelligence …
> "… The Police would seem to have a long way to go in becoming truly effective and in gaining the trust of the population. Given the scale of the problems which still need to be tackled, there would seem to be a need for an ongoing commitment by the UK to training and mentoring the Iraqi Police."[1300]

1420. Maj Gen Binns described the method of support at that time in his evidence to the Inquiry:

> "… the concept was described as M2T, monitoring, mentoring and training. I would say it was a big T. It was a medium-sized M, monitoring, but we didn't do a lot of mentoring …
> "So if I start with the T, training, I think we had a very successful training centre that we had built at Shaibah Log Base. We were able to take people from initial training, we were able to supervise Iraqis training themselves. We were able to equip them, to deploy them, to sustain them … we didn't then mentor them when they were deployed on operation, and that was the significant difference between the way that we approached support and the way that the Americans approached support in Basra."[1301]

THE ABSENCE OF A CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM IN BASRA

1421. Mr Browne visited Iraq from 29 October to 2 November.[1302] He described the visit, in a letter to Mr Brown, as "intense but stimulating and productive", observing that it had been "markedly the most encouraging of my seven visits to Basra". He commented:

> "The primary deficiency in the security apparatus remains the judicial sector. I am sceptical about our ability to deliver an effective Iraqi Police Service when there is no functioning framework of enforceable law within which they can operate. This needs our urgent attention. It does not, in my view, need to mean the deployment of significant additional resources to Iraq; I am attracted by the idea of electronic mentoring of the Iraqi judiciary by international counterparts."

1422. The FCO, DFID, the MOD and the Stabilisation Unit produced a UK Strategy for Security and Justice Sector Reform (SJSR) in December.[1303] Acknowledging that it was subject to any Ministerial decisions in 2008 on the UK's overall strategy in Iraq, it listed four areas for development in 2008-2009:

- A presence in both cities could help the UK influence central policy initiatives by feeding intelligence from work on the ground.
- The UK could contribute strategic policing advice to the IPS and influence US thinking on the IPS's development needs.
- The UK could utilise its "significant experience in pursuing civil service reform in weak states" to reform Iraq's "weak" Government institutions, making them more effective.
- The UK could encourage the EU and UN to put greater resources into co-ordinating Rule of Law donor engagement.

1423. The paper identified three "sub-programmes":

- Supporting the MOI and IPS with training and development programmes. £12.98m was available from the Stabilisation Aid Fund (SAF) and £8m from the Peacekeeping budget.
- Supporting the Iraqi judiciary and wider justice system – the paper did not explain how that would be done other than stating it would "support" its various components and build Basra's professional links in the Middle East. £3.18m was available from the SAF.
- Supporting the IMOD by building a professional cadre of IMOD civil servants through mentoring. Resources to be delivered from the MOD's administrative budget.

Withdrawal and Provincial Iraqi Control for Basra

1424. On 8 October 2007, Mr Brown announced plans for a significant troop drawdown over the next 12 months (dealt with in Section 9.6).[1304] He described the need for two remaining phases:

> "In the first, the British forces that remain in Iraq will have the following tasks: training and mentoring the Iraqi Army and police force; securing supply routes and policing the Iran-Iraq border; and the ability to come to the assistance of the Iraqi Security Forces when called upon. Then in the spring of next year – and guided as always by the advice of our military commanders – we plan to move to a second stage of overwatch where the coalition would maintain a more limited re-intervention capacity and where the main focus will be on training and mentoring."

1425. On 9 October, Lt Gen Houghton briefed the Chiefs of Staff that the plan for 14th Division would see "initial operating capability" by December 2007 with their training being complete by June 2008. He also informed them of Gen Mohan's intention to relocate the Basra Operations Centre to Basra Air Station, a move that would "benefit MND(SE) in terms of improved opportunities for key leader engagement, better situational awareness and senior officer mentoring".[1305]

1426. ACM Stirrup visited Iraq from 26 to 29 October.[1306] A note on his visit stated that Maj Gen Binns was generally positive about the ISF but doubted it would have the ability to counter JAM if the current cease-fire broke (see Section 9.6). The Deputy Brigade Commander of 1 Mechanised Brigade told ACM Stirrup that Basra was experiencing an increase in criminality in the wake of MNF withdrawal.

1427. ACM Stirrup met the Commanding Officer of the Monitoring, Mentoring and Training Battlegroup who assured him that 14th Division were on track to be ready by June 2008. The Chief of Police Training Adviser told him that Maj Gen Jalil was "proving very dynamic, robust and effective, particularly in fighting the MOI's reluctance to root out militia influences" but that only 48 percent of Basra police had been trained.

1428. On 8 October, Lt Gen Odierno had advised Gen Petraeus that he recommended Basra for PIC in December.[1307] He had been encouraged by the positive impact that Gen Mohan and Maj Gen Jalil were having but remained concerned by reports of militia influence within the Basra ISF. Maj Gen Binns commented: "Not a ringing endorsement, but a positive step and an endorsement we've been trying to achieve since April this year."

1429. Basra transitioned to PIC on 16 December 2007 (described in Section 9.6).

1430. When asked about the capability of the ISF in December 2007 during his evidence to the Inquiry, Maj Gen Binns said:

> "… they had weaknesses … they were well trained, as individuals, but their leadership was not experienced, they were capable of conducting tactical, low-level operations, but their ability to conduct manoeuvre, to sustain themselves logistically, was a challenge to them.
> "But I thought they wouldn't get better until they were given responsibility … it was a bit like taking the stabilisers off a child's bike. They were going to wobble for a while and I was there to make sure they didn't fall over."[1308]

1431. On the police's capability at that time, Maj Gen Binns said:

> "The police were a mixed bag. At their worst, they were trouble. They had been infiltrated and they were a constraint on progress.
>
> "At their best, and there were some very good police units … they were good, they were effective. The national police units, who came from Baghdad, were highly effective and something that the Iraqis were particularly proud of."

1432. On 20 December, the JIC assessed:

> "Prospects in Basra will depend on ISF willingness and ability to take on Shia militias or reach and maintain an accommodation with them and on the ability of local political leaders to broker deals which restrain political violence. All are uncertain at this stage. The loss of either General Mohan or Jalil would remove a stabilising influence."[1309]

1433. On the 14th Division, the JIC judged:

> "The replacement of an Iraqi Army brigade in Basra with the new 14th Army Division (still 50 percent undermanned) and the deployment of an NP [National Police] battalion and a mechanised infantry unit have raised the ISF profile in Basra from 30,000 in June to 33,500 in December. MNF expect ISF to reach a full strength of 36,500 in June 2008. Largely manned from outside Basra, these forces are probably less influenced by local tribal and political ties or militia infiltration than those recruited locally. The vast majority of JAM continues to observe a cease-fire with MNF in Basra and have not challenged ISF for local control – although […] they think they could successfully do so."

1434. On 8 January 2008, AM Peach told the Chiefs of Staff that Gen Mohan had created a "security equilibrium" in Basra, using a "carrot and stick" approach, but that recent concessions and reassurances by him to JAM "demonstrated the precarious nature of the balance of power in Basra".[1310]

1435. Gen Mohan visited the UK in January.[1311] He gave an "upbeat" description of security, stating that it was up to the British if they wanted to leave but that he needed to be left with "real military capability" to outface JAM and Iranian-backed militias. He asked for UK assistance in building intelligence capabilities.

1436. IDF attacks on UK forces at Basra Air Station began to rise again in 2008 (see Section 9.6). On 21 February, Major General Barney White-Spunner, who had just succeeded Maj Gen Binns as GOC MND(SE), commented:

> "General Mohan is fully aware (as are we) that his ability to further strengthen his control of Basra City is limited as the ISF cannot match JAM in their urban heartlands, though he is deploying 14th Division into the city as soon as he can. Our efforts to develop the ISF capability to interdict smuggling of lethal aid as well as strenuous efforts to develop their urban warfare skills may enable Mohan to have the desired effect in the future, but for now there is not very much he can do."[1312]

1437. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lt Gen White-Spunner recalled that the first "increasingly obvious" point on his arrival was that:

> "… we needed to redirect our training of the ISF and we needed to … dedicate more of a mission to … develop 14 Division."[1313]

1438. Lt Gen White-Spunner said that Gen Mohan had asked for "offensive support":

> "By this we mean those weapons systems … which support infantry rather than being infantry themselves, particularly the ability to target air and helicopters, intelligence and surveillance assistance, assistance with command and control and logistics."

1439. On 23 February, Mr Prentice discussed the security situation in Basra with Dr Rubaie, who confirmed that an order replacing Gen Mohan had been signed by Prime Minister Maliki based on a report that a "non-interference pact" had been signed with JAM.[1314] Mr Prentice commented that the UK had some understanding of the balance that Gen Mohan and Maj Gen Jalil had to strike in handling the militias and that "It was probably wise not to seek a confrontation with JAM, while the army and police were still building their strength." Dr Rubaie observed that there was a difference between calming the situation and fearing to confront it.

1440. On 27 February, the JIC assessed security prospects in the South:

> "The Iraqi security forces (ISF) ability and willingness to maintain security in the South remains patchy and dependent on MNF training, logistic and specialist air support. Radical improvements in police effectiveness are unlikely. The army will remain at the forefront in providing security, relying on assistance from units outside the South to cope with serious and sustained violence there. The Iraqis would only call for MNF troop re-intervention as a last resort.
> "Violent criminality, murders, kidnappings, score-settling and intimidation will remain part of life in southern Iraq. Pressure from national Shia political and religious leaders, reinforced by some local political leaders and security officials, may limit the scope of unrest. But local ISF action, accommodations between the ISF and elements of JAM, and the perception of MNF willingness to intervene, will also remain crucial tools for managing instability."[1315]

1441. The JIC reported that, although reliable data for attacks against non-MNF targets was lacking, in Basra City alone there had been about 80 murders and 40 kidnappings. Accounts in the media suggested that Shia militia were increasingly punishing and sometimes killing women for "contravening strict interpretations of Islamic mores". Around 10 women were reportedly murdered each month in Basra City.

1442. Mr Brown and Mr Browne had breakfast with the Chiefs of Staff on 6 March.[1316] The Chiefs told them that "there was quality in the ISF but it was not broadening as rapidly as hoped, so training and mentoring of 14Div remained a vital job".

Charge of the Knights

1443. In late March, Prime Minister Maliki launched a security operation in Basra, code-named Sawlat al-Fursan (Arabic for "Charge of the Knights"). The operation had wide-ranging effects on the UK's position and standing in Iraq and is described in detail in Section 9.6.

[1316] Letter Fletcher to Rimmer, 6 March 2008, 'Prime Minister's Breakfast with Chiefs of Staff, 6 March'.

1444. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lt Gen White-Spunner described the lack of a strategy at the start of the Charge of the Knights:

> "To start with, there wasn't one, because, of course, the detailed planning hadn't been done. That's why the first few days were very anxious … – particularly for General Mohan – because there was really no plan for his existing troops – 14 Div, and the police … to work to."[1317]

1445. Lt Gen White-Spunner described how Gen Mohan was given a planning team and a strategy was developed:

> "… General Mohan and I drew up this plan which saw an Iraqi lead with us in support rather than the other way on, as in SINBAD … the overall plan, which was actually very similar to SINBAD in concept, it was a clearance of Basra and the whole province by phases …"[1318]

1446. Lt Gen White-Spunner told the Inquiry:

> "One of those things we did in the first days of Charge of the Knights was bring forward what we had wanted to do, what we had realised we had to do in February, which was to put teams in with the MiTTs … with the Iraqi formations to whom we were responsible …"[1319]

1447. Lt Gen White-Spunner explained how that was a "major change" as the UK approach to MiTTs was brought closer to the US approach:

> "Ultimately, we looked at what they [the US] were doing and certainly it was very influential. Our construct was slightly different … the point was that we reversed what had been British policy up until then, which wasn't to do this, and had very strong and immediate support – I put a submission in to the Ministry of Defence I think on 1 April and had authority the next day to do this. So I thought that showed great sort of flexibility and ability to adapt."[1320]

1448. Lt Gen White-Spunner later added:

> "It became rapidly clear to us that the nature of support that the Iraqi Security Forces wanted had changed with Charge of the Knights …
> "Charge of the Knights meant we had to adjust very rapidly and untidily, but we did it …"[1321]

1449. On 29 March, the Director of Joint Commitments reported to Mr Browne's Assistant Private Secretary that he considered "little tangible success has been achieved by either side, and sustained conflict looks set to continue".[1322]

1450. An eGram on the same day stated that the Iraqi media were reporting that over a hundred police officers had been sacked in Basra, apparently for losing their weapons and/or abandoning their posts during the recent clashes.[1323]

1451. On 31 March, it was reported that questions had been asked at the MCNS meeting that day about the reports of police desertions in Baghdad and allegations of poor co-operation between the police and army.[1324] The representative of the MOI told the Council that "only 10 percent of the national Police had proven ineffective" and that more than 400 police had been dismissed in Basra in recent days for "disloyalty".

1452. On 14 April, the CIG assessed ISF performance in MND(SE) during Charge of the Knights.[1325] It referred back to the JIC's Assessment on 27 February, reporting that the JIC had correctly predicted that:

- The ISF would rely on MNF support – "… on their own, the ISF underperformed against JAM in Basra, Maysan and Dhi Qar during recent operations. In Basra they relied heavily on MNF supplies (i.e. ammunition and rations), air strikes and eventually MNF mentoring. […] Military reporting suggested little sign of a detailed operational plan or evidence of precision targeting of JAM Special Groups or other hard-line elements until the arrival of MNF training teams from 1 April."
- The influence of Shia militias would hinder radical improvement in the effectiveness of Basra's police – "Basra's Chief of Police reportedly believes that hundreds of local police melted away within the first 24 hours of fighting – others joined JAM's ranks. Reporting that several police stations and dozens of police vehicles were abandoned in the face of militia intimidation supports this. Many of the National Police units drafted in from Baghdad, with superior arms and armour, fared much better. The affiliation of many to ISCI [Islamic Supreme Council in Iraq]/Badr probably strengthened their resolve to try and weaken their chief rival [JAM]."
- The 10th and 14th Divisions of the IA would require assistance from outside the South to cope with serious and sustained violence – "… even with reinforcements from Baghdad's 1st Division, military reporting suggests that the Iraqi Army lost most tactical engagements against JAM and failed to take any ground prior to JAM's stand down on 31st March. However, neither did they cede ground and specific successes, such as taking charge of the strategically important ports at Umm Qasr and Khor al-Zubayr and expelling the militia ridden Facilities Protection Service has emboldened them. Iraqi Special Forces were ineffective until their US mentors were re-inserted. In Dhi Qar's capital Nasiriyah, JAM reportedly made some territorial gains over the ISF before their stand down, while in Maysan, ISF opted not to confront JAM (recognising they would not be able to defeat them and leaving them in control of Al-Amara for the second time in two months)."

1453. Assessing the ISF's future, the CIG stated:

"Despite their underwhelming performance, we assess that JAM's stand down, leaving ISF holding the field, has increased the latter's credibility among most Basrawis and imbued them with greater confidence. Despite the continued likelihood that Generals Mohan and Jalil will be moved on, diplomatic reporting suggests that the MOI may at least continue some of their security reforms: it has already sacked 1,000 militia affiliated members of the police. However, many will almost certainly re-surface within the system. Others, unless directed towards viable alternative employment, may replenish JAM's ranks."

1454. On 14 May, the JIC stated in an Assessment that, as a result of the Charge of the Knights, "public confidence in the ISF has grown".[1326] However, "Strong JAM resistance in the initial phases of the Charge exposed enduring weaknesses in the largely untested local ISF: inadequate planning, confused command and control structures, feeble logistics and split loyalties … Basra's police were particularly ineffective."

"Though the ISF overall are improving, the Iraqi Government has recognised that radical changes are needed to upgrade Basra's security forces – particularly the police. The Ministry of Interior plans to fire 6,000 security personnel for deserting their positions … implementing [changes] effectively will be tricky: militiamen dismissed from the army or police often find employment elsewhere in the ISF …"

1456. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lt Gen White-Spunner reflected on police performance during the Charge of the Knights, and the different approach taken afterwards:

"I don't think the police came out of Charge of the Knights very well, if I'm being honest … we do need to look at how we trained the police prior to that. I think we may have erred on the side of training the police in what I would call sort of UK/Home Counties policing, whereas actually what was probably wanted was something slightly more robust …

[1326] JIC Assessment, 14 May 2008, 'Iraq: the Charge of the Knights'.

> "What happened during the Charge of the Knights was actually a lot of the police collapsed effectively and it took a lot of time to rebuild them and we tried to rebuild them on a different model, on more what I would call … a paramilitary basis, so that they could fire weapons, defend themselves and restore order as much as they could take fingerprints and gather evidence."[1327]

1457. Lt Gen White-Spunner commented on the joint working between the army and the police:

> "It was because the police were felt to be less reliable than the Iraqi Army. The Iraqi Army has always been to the fore in Iraq … and there was a feeling that the police would be morally and physically strengthened by having the Iraqi Army posted alongside them."[1328]

1458. When asked whether the police fought against the ISF during the Charge of the Knights, Lt Gen White-Spunner responded:

> "A few, very few. Some units did very well. I certainly wouldn't want to be overcritical of the force as a whole … some of his [Maj Gen Jalil's] units did very well, but a lot just put their weapons down and melted away. Some were infiltrated by JAM."[1329]

1459. On 8 July, an eGram from the British Embassy Office Basra reported that the operational phase of Charge of the Knights had ended.[1330] "Intelligence-led strike operations" continued around Basra, leading to the arrest of the second in command for the team that attacked the Contingency Operating Base on 8 May and 8 June. The ISF considered their operation in Maysan a success: the Chairman, two Council members, and the former Chief of Police were arrested for supporting militia and criminal activities. They tried to arrest the Governor of Maysan but he had already fled.

1460. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lt Gen Shirreff described how 14th Division was able to tackle JAM in the South during the Charge of the Knights, unlike the locally recruited 10th Division:

> "There was no way they were prepared to really get stuck in and fight against the Jaysh Al Mahdi, for understandable reasons, and I think it was only when Iraqi troops from outside the Shia south came in that you were able to really begin the process."[1331]

1461. Maj Gen Shaw also reflected on the Charge of the Knights in his evidence to the Inquiry:

> "Charge of the Knights actually was a great success, in terms of the establishment of … Iraqi self-rule, because, finally, it was a decisive blow by Maliki declaring some elements of the Shia polity out of bounds."[1332]

Iraqi Navy progress

In April 2008, the Iraqi Navy grew and took on additional responsibilities:

- Around 500 Iraqi Army personnel were transferred to the Iraqi Marines to form a second battalion.[1333] One battalion provided defence of the offshore oil platforms and the second protected the port of Umm Qasr.
- The Iraqi Navy took responsibility for the point defence of the Khwar al Amaya Oil terminal and perimeter security for the port and power station in az-Zubayr.

By that stage the Navy personnel total had increased to over 1,800.

As the UK had failed to negotiate an MOU covering the continued presence of Royal Navy trainers, the 80 Royal Navy personnel temporarily departed Iraq along with other UK forces in July 2009.[1334] A UK-Iraq Training and Maritime Support Agreement was signed in November 2009 and the trainers returned. They worked alongside around 50 US Navy, Marine and Coastguard personnel.

The Royal Navy team remained in Iraq until 22 May 2011 when the agreement expired.[1335] Between 2003 and 2011, the UK trained 1,800 Iraqi Navy personnel, providing between 50 and 90 Royal Navy personnel for the task. Dr Liam Fox, the Defence Secretary, stated:

> "Royal Navy personnel have used their formidable skills and expertise to bring about a transformation in Iraq's naval force. The Iraqi Navy has a key role to play in protecting Iraq's territorial waters and the oil infrastructure that is so vital to Iraq's economy, and I am proud of the role British forces have played in making it capable of doing that job."

The Naval training mission continued until May 2011 when 81 Navy trainers and three UK personnel in Baghdad withdrew and Op TELIC formally ended.[1336]

Basra 'Sons of Iraq' programme

1462. On 1 April 2008, Prime Minister Maliki announced that he was going to supplement the ISF with 10,000 Basra citizens as Sons of Iraq (as described earlier in this Section).[1337] Maj Gen White-Spunner reported:

> "In effect, he has engaged with the local tribes and established a 'Sons of Iraq' programme. The maturity of this programme seems similar to that for his overall Basra initiative; limited. A combined MNF-I and MNC-I team has begun to work on possible recommendations for implementation, but clearly this must be a GoI programme and they may not want any coalition support. A sufficiently robust governance structure will be required to prevent this group turning into another armed militia and a considered approach is needed to prevent them becoming a new target set for JAM. Whilst the establishment of such a programme in MND(SE) is something that the UK has sought to avoid and which we continue to oppose, our voice carries little weight and there is little that we can and ought to do other than support the MNC-I in developing recommendations."

1463. On 14 April, the CIG reported:

> "Intelligence shows that despite the Government of Iraq's previously strong objections to tribal awakenings in the South, their proven ability to act as force multipliers for the ISF in Basra and a counter-balance to JAM is going to be one of the key products of the recent conflict. Intelligence suggests that 500 have already been recruited and that Maliki has tasked local tribal leaders to hand pick others. Diplomatic reports suggest that as many as 25,000 have been asked for. However, this additional dynamic to Basra's security landscape is not without risk. Inter-tribal conflict may result in places: reporting suggests that JAM already has plans to eradicate them."[1338]

1464. On 8 July, an eGram from the British Embassy Office Basra suggested that the number recruited had risen to 7,000, when reporting that the Sons of Iraq might return to "the streets of Basra" because the MOI had not paid them.[1339] General Adel had asked for outstanding salaries to be paid immediately. He also requested "not to be sent any more police officers as he ha[d] enough".

The UK starts embedding troops with the Iraqi Army

1465. On 2 April, a junior official in PJHQ wrote to Mr Browne, advising him that MND(SE) was intending to embed MiTTs within 14th Division to strengthen "some of the key vulnerabilities that ha[d] been demonstrated during recent operations".[1340] It would be "in a manner akin to the Operational Mentoring Liaison Team (OMLT) concept successfully used in Afghanistan". The US had "made it clear that they would welcome" the move. The official stated:

> "It is true to say that most armies around the world would have struggled in the circumstances faced by 14 Div over the last two weeks. We should not therefore rush to criticise what we were already aware was still some way from a properly trained Division. Our main focus will be to help resolve the following concerns: a lack of situational awareness; a lack of clear command and control; poor planning; and an inability to co-ordinate effectively with coalition assets and experience, in particular with regards to calling on coalition forces for fire support and in extremis extraction when these can only be delivered within coalition rules of engagement."

1466. On presentation, the official wrote that there were "many potential positives" but it would be likely to raise questions about whether the UK handed Basra over to PIC too early "and whether we have acted too late and only under pressure".

1467. The total number of military personnel involved was 150.

1468. In Mr Browne's absence, Mr Adam Ingram, the Minister for Armed Forces, considered the advice on 3 April.[1341] Mr Ingram noted the advice and "emphasised the need to ensure that personnel are clearly briefed on the red lines beyond which they must not operate and the action to be taken in the event such lines are crossed". He "also asked that any evidence of behaviour by Iraqi forces with which UK personnel had concerns be reported rapidly to Ministers".

1469. A note for Mr Browne was written on Mr Ingram's response by Mr Browne's Private Secretary the same day.[1342] He reported that MiTTs were now deployed in Basra. He wrote:

"… It wasn't so long ago that MiTTs/OMLTs [Operational Mentoring Liaison Teams] in Iraq were thought to be a bad idea, but then, the situation has definitely changed in the last week or so …

"Everyone appears to be content that the legal position is robust, but there are clearly presentational risks in being seen to be drawn into town, while Warrior back in Basra will not go unnoticed. It means 58 additional people will be deployed but they're temporary and will be invisible – we're still at 'around 4,000' established posts."

1470. Maj Gen White-Spunner reported on 3 April that US MiTTs and the "accompanying military resources they bring" were having a "significant supporting impact" to those Iraqi forces.[1343]

1471. On 4 April, Mr Jon Day, MOD Director General Operational Policy, advised Ms Aldred that there were over 400 US troops embedded with the Iraqi reinforcements sent to Basra in support of Charge of the Knights.[1344]

1472. On 17 April, Maj Gen White-Spunner reported that the UK MiTT concept was continuing to evolve but was adding "real value to current operations".[1345]

Iraqi appointments

On 17 April 2008, Maj Gen White-Spunner wrote that the senior Iraqi personnel responsible for security in Basra were to be replaced:

- Gen Mohan, Basra Operations Commander, was replaced by General Mohammed (the former Commander 14th Division);
- Maj Gen Jalil, Provincial Director of Police, was replaced by General Adel (a former police commander in Baghdad); and
- General Abdul Aziz became Commander 14th Division.[1346]

1473. In May, Maj Gen White-Spunner's weekly reports highlighted a number of resource issues:

- There were no "suitable" armoured vehicles available for the UK MiTTs; the choice being either Mastiff which was too large or Bulldog which was tracked.[1347] US and Iraqi personnel used Humvees.
- "Substantial engineering work" was required to create "sustainable accommodation and force protection of their locations across the city".[1348] As a consequence there was a requirement for reinforcements to free up engineering squadrons who were currently undertaking guarding tasks.
- By 2 May, only two of a planned four brigades for 14th Division were operational.[1349] There would be a further requirement for UK MiTTs when the final two brigades came online, and delivering that requirement would require "taking risk" against the Brigade Quick Reaction Force.

1474. On 20 June, Maj Gen White-Spunner reported that the full UK MiTT group was in place.[1350] The Engineer Group was addressing "the considerable force protection and environmental health risks that are currently being carried by MND(SE)".

The future of the Iraqi police in Basra

1475. On 1 April 2008, Mr Crispin Blunt suggested to Parliament that a large number of the criminal forces against which the ISF was fighting were members of the Basra police, whom the UK were responsible for training.[1351] Mr Browne responded:

> "The early attempts to create a police force in Iraq had exactly the results that the Hon. Gentleman describes, as criminal elements came out of the police forces and may, indeed, have deliberately gone into them in order to obtain training. Under the generalship of General Jalil … we have dealt with that very problem during the past year or more: a significant number of police officers have been dismissed from the Iraqi police force, while others have been retrained to ensure that the situation does not occur again. We have learned significant lessons from those early days of police training, and we shall implement them in Afghanistan to ensure that we do not repeat the problem."

1476. On 10 April, Maj Gen White-Spunner reported that the severe problems with police officers were:

> "… seen here partly as an issue of training (maybe the training teams had focused, understandably, more on civilian policing skills than military tactics) but more as a result of deep rooted corruption and lack of loyalty to the GOI."[1352]

1477. Maj Gen White-Spunner warned that there were discussions in MNC-I and the Iraqi Government over whether to disband the Basra police entirely and start again. He also reported that MNC-I and CPATT were keen on the concept of Police Transition Teams stating: "we will need to know how much appetite there is in the UK to provide these."

1478. The following week, on 17 April, Maj Gen White-Spunner wrote:

> "… daily interaction with the IPS at the coalface (i.e. in their stations, of which there are over 40) would require numbers in the high 100s to be successful, plus the associated force protection. My feeling from the UK police team here is that the bill would be too big for the UK to source, and would involve accepting a degree of risk in their modus operandi which would be unwelcome. Our approach is therefore to encourage maximum CPATT involvement and consequent injection of resources, as the need to rebuild the police in Basra in the next six months remains urgent."[1353]

The US takes over SSR tasks in the South

1479. Lt Gen Houghton met Gen Petraeus on 25 April.[1354] They discussed force levels and tasks for UK and US forces in MND(SE) and agreed the following division of SSR tasks:

- The UK would provide:
  - MiTTs for the Basra Operations Centre;

[1352] Minute White-Spunner to CJO, 10 April 2008, 'GOC MND(SE) Weekly Letter – 10 April 2008'.
[1353] Minute White-Spunner to CJO, 17 April 2008, 'GOC MND(SE) Weekly Letter – 17 April 2008'.
[1354] Minute Houghton to PSO/CDS, 26 April 2008, 'CJO – Gen Petraeus Meeting 25 Apr 08'.

- MiTTs of 14th Division with supporting Quick Reaction Forces; and
- the Naval Transition Team.

- The US would provide:
  - MiTTs of 10th Division;
  - border security; and
  - IPS reform/retraining.

1480. On 1 May, Mr Brown met Gen Petraeus and agreed that the key remaining UK task on SSR would be the preparation of 14th Division to be operational by the end of the first quarter of 2009.[1355] Once that task was complete, the UK would consider its mission complete.

1481. On 2 May, Mr Simon McDonald, Mr Brown's Foreign and Defence Policy Adviser, warned Mr Brown:

> "We'll need to think about how we assess 14th Division's readiness; we do not want to leave this solely to the US; they may be tempted to use that responsibility to delay us."[1356]

1482. On 5 June, the JIC Assessment of the ISF judged:

> "In Basra, even with coalition mentors, the ability of 14th Army Division to fully maintain security once Jaysh al-Mahdi (JAM) fighters return is uncertain, without the continued support of reinforcements from 1st and 7th Divisions (which are likely to be called on to support other operations in Sadr City and Maysan)."[1357]

1483. On 13 June, Maj Gen White-Spunner reported that development of 14th Division was likely to take until April 2009.[1358] He stated that, in December, there would be a complete US military police battalion in Basra which, together with the Joint Security Stations, he believed would lead to a "slow improvement in police performance".

1484. NSID(OD) met on 15 July and discussed the future strategy for the UK in Iraq.[1359] It was suggested that beyond April 2009 the "remaining military tasks" that would "resemble normal defence co-operation" were:

- continuing the "small scale" mentoring for 14th Division's Headquarters;
- training the Iraqi Navy; and
- supporting officer training.

1485. On 22 July, Mr Brown made a statement to Parliament on the future strategy for Iraq, as described in Section 9.7.[1360] He stated that, in response to "changing needs", the UK had now embedded more than 800 UK personnel within the Iraqi command structure. He continued:

> "The focus of the 4,100 forces still in southern Iraq is now on completing the task of training and mentoring the 14th Division of the Iraqi Army in Basra … Other remaining military tasks … include … continuing to develop the capacity of the Iraqi navy and marines …"

1486. On 19 August, Mr Nigel Haywood, the British Consul General in Basra, wrote that the first US police training teams had deployed in Basra.[1361] Their first impression of the IPS had been "positive".

1487. On 26 August, Mr Haywood reported a "milestone": "the first visit downtown in civilian vehicles (albeit armoured Land Cruisers with a Mastiff escort), and also the first visit to the Governor's office, for nearly two years".[1362] Mr Haywood wrote that that showed the UK's confidence in the ISF, although acknowledged "we will be able to demonstrate greater confidence, when we are able to travel in civilian vehicles without a UK military escort".

1489. Mr Haywood also said that the contract to build the new Basra Central Prison had been signed "after weeks of delay". It was due for completion in a year.

1490. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Mr Haywood described policing support at that time as "community policing, use of forensic evidence, building up forensic laboratories".[1363] He said:

> "Arguably, those weren't what was immediately needed in the period post-Charge of the Knights, but it laid the groundwork for now what is becoming an increasingly good policing system. If that hadn't happened, then there would have been nothing to build on."

1491. In a video conference on 11 September, Mr Brown told President Bush that training of Iraqi forces in Basra was "going well" and that the UK would "finish the job".[1364]

1492. On 18 September, a JIC Assessment stated:

> "Locally raised army units in the South will continue to need coalition mentors and to operate alongside more experienced Iraqi forces to manage security for the rest of this year. By early 2009, provided JAM remains quiescent, they will be able to cope with only limited MNF mentoring … In the unlikely event of a widespread return to violence we would expect local units to call for reinforcement by more experienced Iraqi forces in the first instance. But they might ultimately still need to call on MNF for specialist assistance."[1365]

1493. On police effectiveness, the JIC Assessment stated:

> "Interior Minister Boulani has taken steps to address police ineffectiveness. However, despite an increase in MNF mentors and better vetting of police recruits, we expect militia loyalty and corruption in the local police to remain serious problems […] The Army will have to retain overall responsibility for security for at least the next few years."

1494. Mr John Hutton, the Defence Secretary, visited Iraq in October.[1366] In a letter to Mr Brown, he wrote:

> "The Iraqi Security Forces (ISF), the Army in particular, are looking confident and capable. Their show of force in the areas which I visited, where they took the lead in providing my security, was genuinely impressive. There is no doubt that Basra itself has been transformed and the ISF now have complete freedom of movement throughout the city. While they do not yet have all the capabilities that we would like to see in a fully-formed Division, and there is important work still to do, we will soon have reached the point where we can say with confidence that we have fulfilled our training mission for 14 Division …"

1495. On 16 December, the British Embassy Office Basra reported that the US military police teams and IPAs had almost reached full deployment.[1367] That was followed by the deployment of US Border Transition Teams and Port of Entry Transition Teams in January.[1368]

1496. The UK police mission continued to deliver training in community-based policing and forensics throughout 2009.[1369] A review of UK support to the IPS was undertaken in November 2009 and recommended that the programme be closed at the end of the financial year. The police mission in Basra was commended as a "politically useful" extension of the Consulate staff.

Training of 14th Division completed

1497. On 27 March 2009, a junior official informed Mr Brown that 14th Division was considered to be effective and that all UK mentors and trainers had been withdrawn.[1370]

1498. In his post-operation tour report on 15 May, Major General Andrew Salmon, GOC MND(SE) from August 2008 until March 2009, assessed:

> "There was considerable adaptation seen from our MiTTs who, given the circumstances, did a great job. But this is a specialist game where maturity, linguistic and teach, coach and mentor skills are required. A great MiTT made a huge difference and enabled civil capacity; poor ones made little progress. Much of this is down to training and selection, like the USMC [US Marine Corps] who provide the benchmark. Our soldiers and officers also tend to approach their tasks through the lens of the enemy as opposed to the lens of the people. We have much to learn from our American colleagues … It was noticeable that US MiTTs were much better prepared than ours."[1371]

1499. Maj Gen Salmon wrote that the decision to enable some UK MiTT elements to travel in Iraqi Army vehicles "was a defining decision – pivotal in establishing trust and building meaningful relationships at the tactical level". There was "no doubt that the (accurate or otherwise) US tactical perception of UK casualty aversion ha[d] been a negative factor in coalition cohesion over the past 12 months":

> "Basra has arguably progressed from anarchy to democracy in 12 months. The militias have been defeated and residual insurgent activity is limited and cellular in nature. There is widespread recognition of the Rule of Law, with judicial processes being developed to meet the need of a democratic society. To all intents, 14th Division has met the MNSTC-I mandated requirement of ORA 2 [Operational Readiness Assessment level 2 – see Box, Provincial Iraqi Control'], under British tutelage. In terms of wider Basrawi security, policing and border security have improved considerably. Collectively, the ISF conducts intelligence-led coordinated operations supported by an integral IO capability. The harmonisation of the ISF requires further work but has improved markedly … UK Defence can withdraw from Iraq having delivered on its promises and with its professional reputation intact."

SSR in Maysan province

1500. Mr Tansley provided some background about Maysan province in his 6 December 2005 eGram:

> "Maysan has long had the reputation for being lawless and separate from the rest of Iraq. During Saddam Hussein's time, more than 20,000 soldiers were permanently deployed in the province in an attempt to subdue it. The locals claim that they, rather than coalition forces 'liberated' Maysan in 2003, and this helped explain the higher levels of hostility to MND(SE) than elsewhere in the region."[1372]

1501. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lt Gen Shirreff said:

"Maysan had always been a very difficult province. There was effectively no security at all where MNF were concerned."[1373]

1502. On 9 July 2004, Commander Kevin Hurley, UK Senior Police Adviser Iraq (South), reported that the Governor of Maysan province, Governor Riyadh, had been "implicated" in the shooting of the local Chief of Police.[1374] Cdr Hurley wrote that the Governor's continued tenure was "a potential challenge to not only the development of a wholesome policing ethic but also that of the wider democratic process".

1503. On 24 July, Mr Collis reported that Maysan province was fragile and stuck in "political stagnation".[1375] Although Prime Minister Allawi had suspended Governor Riyadh, the Governor refused to acknowledge it and continued in his role. Mr Collis attributed the "bad" economic situation to "35 years of neglect and the overnight loss of its previous principal employer, the old Iraqi Army". The deployment of police mentors was "likely to be problematic on security grounds".

1504. By 28 July, Mr Collis wrote that the situation had "worsened".[1376] A suspension letter issued from Baghdad had been sent through low-level police channels, rather than from Prime Minister Allawi, meaning Governor Riyadh either had not seen the instructions, or was ignoring them. The Governor's behaviour was causing concern for some Council members and Mr Collis predicted that, without further action, he would "continue to undermine those he sees as rivals and the scope for violence w[ould] rise".

1505. On 3 September, Mr Collis wrote that a cease-fire was agreed between the local Office of the Martyr Sadr (OMS) leadership, the IPS and ING on 2 September and a declaration was signed.[1377] Key points included a commitment to resolution 1564 (2004) (allowing MNF freedom of movement whilst undertaking reconstruction work and IPS training), and the IPS being given "the responsibility of upholding security".

1506. Mr Collis wrote that Maysan was still without an effective Governor. The Governorate Council was incapable of electing a replacement as a result of intimidation from Governor Riyadh's brother, the tribal leader Mr Abu Hatim ("Prince of the Marshes").

1507. On 21 September, Mr Collis reported that Governor Riyadh had been exonerated by a Baghdad court but the circumstances surrounding his exoneration were unclear.[1378] Mr Abu Maythem, Chief of Police, had taken "one look at the letter exonerating Riyadh, declared it a forgery and repeated his desire for justice to be served". While Mr Maythem agreed "the current situation was calmer than for a while", he "believed fighting would start up again soon".

1508. Mr Hatim looked most "likely to come out on top of this struggle", appearing to have "purged" the Council of anyone who opposed him and "worn down any opposition in Baghdad to acquitting his brother". There was "no sign" of General Rashash, Prime Minister Allawi's Security Co-ordinator, and Mr Maythem "appeared quite unaware" of his appointment.

1509. On 26 September, Mr Davies reported that as part of a deployment of 38 ArmorGroup contractors, three contractors were deployed to Maysan to develop criminal intelligence capability and mentor the TSU.[1379] Mr Davies also reported that the location of the police in Maysan had "received some rocket and mortar fire during the week".

1510. On 15 October, Mr Collis stated that the security situation in Maysan remained "superficially quiet" following the cease-fire, with "no serious attacks against the MNF for several weeks".[1380] The political struggle, however, continued. There had been a series of high-profile murders and the perpetrators were unknown. Governor Riyadh had used the opportunity to criticise Mr Maythem for failing to prevent the murders. The fall-out from Mr Hatim's 'purge' of the Council rumbled on. Mr Collis concluded:

> "Maysan remains a sorry mess and a standing indictment of the new Iraq's (and our) failure to grip its linked problems of tribal warlordism, Iranian meddling, corruption and extremism."

1511. On 24 October, the Chief of Police, who was being mentored by DCC White, was murdered in al-Amara as he exited a mosque.[1381] Following that, a police committee was established, with UK and Danish support, to oversee policing, including the selection of a new Chief of Police.

1512. Following a visit to Maysan province on 10 February 2005, Mr Collis wrote:

> "Real progress has been made in Maysan, although none of it is irreversible and we need to ensure adequate resources are in place to maintain SSR and reconstruction momentum. UK forces have turned round a difficult environment. Their security presence is robust, but welcomed by the local population … The province looks to be an early candidate for a reduced MNF-I presence, with only a back-up role in security. Our planned increase in police mentoring is essential to maintaining momentum. There are currently very few attacks on local security forces; the small number of rejectionists continue to target MNF-I. The absence of pressure from the local population, or their leaders, for early withdrawal was striking."[1382]

1513. On 21 February, the FCO strategy for support to policing in Iraq in 2005 noted that the GCPP had approved additional funding to ArmorGroup to allow mentoring to be undertaken in Maysan.[1383]

1514. By April, 20 ArmorGroup contractors were deployed under the co-ordination of a UK police Chief Inspector.[1384] They were supported by four CPATT mentors.

1515. The FCO produced an IPS Transition Plan on 7 September.[1385] It stated that 57 percent of the IPS in Maysan had completed basic training and 93 percent had undertaken other specialist training. The FCO judged that training was "largely on track" and "transition targets should be met if co-operation continues".

1516. On 10 October, Mr Wheeler produced an update of policing in each of the four MND(SE) provinces.[1386] On Maysan, he said:

"The lack of co-operation by the Chief of Police has had a particularly detrimental effect on what we have been able to achieve eg many police stations have still not been visited by PAT. The security situation has constrained the work of PAT, and CPATT and the Royal Military Police have been trying to fill the gap. And IPS/militia affiliation is considerable eg there have been instances of IPS complicity in attacks on MNF forces. The Chief of Police has been unwilling to be mentored. Very recently he has withdrawn his students and instructors from the training programme, claiming that ArmorGroup are not up to the job … Abuse of prisoners is still occurring … The PJOC is fully equipped, but there is disagreement between the IPS, the Iraqi Army and the Governor on its role …"

1517. Mr Tansley visited Maysan from 2 to 3 December.[1387] He reported that the area "belie[d] its reputation" for being "lawless". It had been "relatively peaceful in recent months" with a lower number of attacks on MND(SE) than in Basra, and no attacks on the ISF since November. Despite that, Mr Tansley reported that the threat remained "relatively high". He wrote:

"… beneath the surface there is an underlying tension. Unlike in neighbouring Dhi Qar, the (relative) stability depends on an uneasy balance of power between the Badrists and Sadrists, rather than co-operation. The potential for the situation to deteriorate quickly remains."

1518. A 'Transitional Plan Update' issued from Maysan on 27 December stated that the proportion of recruits who had completed basic training had risen to 70.5 percent, in line with the 2005 training target.[1388]

1519. On 20 January 2006, Mr Tansley provided an update on the readiness of Maysan for handover to Iraqi control.[1389] It stated that the Iraqi Army was of "adequate standard" though suffered from logistical issues; the DBE was "inadequate in size (7,000)" but was "judged to be acting effectively"; and reform of the police was "going well" despite a 100 percent growth in numbers (due to an MOI employment generation initiative) and militia (mainly Badr) affiliation.

1520. In his review of UK support to policing in Iraq on 31 January (described earlier in this Section), Sir Ronnie Flanagan concluded that Maysan province should "be capable of moving to Operational Overwatch at the earliest opportunity".[1390]

1521. On 28 February, Captain Richard John Holmes and Private Lee Ellis were killed in an IED attack in a joint Snatch and Warrior vehicle convoy in al-Amara.[1391]

1522. At a meeting between MNF representatives and the Chief of Police on 2 March, it was agreed that such attacks should not be seen as a way of prising the relationship between the ISF and MNF apart.[1392]

1523. The Chief of Police had also reported difficulties with the Head of the OMS in Maysan who "wanted to commit acts of terror, but the Governor was trying to keep a lid on the strife". It was thought that extremist elements were "attempting to gain kudos and standing in the community" by attacking the MNF.

1524. Dr Howells visited Iraq in March. An FCO briefing pack for his meeting with the Muthanna and Maysan Chiefs of Police stated that the proportion of trained police in Maysan had increased to 86 percent.[1393] Security conditions were "less favourable" than in Muthanna but a continued coalition presence could be "counter-productive". UK support for the province at this time comprised 17 ArmorGroup police advisers, one police officer and one prison adviser.

1525. The UK's overall support was 95 police advisers in MND(SE) and Baghdad, 57 trainers in Jordan, six prison advisers, one justice adviser and three EU JustLex courses. The US contribution was 247 police trainers Iraq-wide, 66 JIPTC trainers, 70 prison advisers, and, justice advisers (no number given).

1526. The FCO briefed Dr Howells on concerns about over-recruiting Iraqi police. In Muthanna, there was estimated to be three times as many officers as the sanctioned 1,960. In Maysan, staffing levels were twice the 4,000 agreed by MNF-I. Those units sat "almost entirely outside" existing training programmes for the IPS.

1527. On 24 August, the UK military vacated Camp Abu Naji on the outskirts of al-Amara in Maysan and handed it over to the Iraqi Army.[1394] Shortly afterwards the base was looted, with reports that the Iraqi Army at best allowed the looting but may have been directly involved.

1528. On 26 October, Maj Gen Shirreff reported that there was significant fighting in al-Amara:

> "Al-Amara and the fighting between JAM and the IPS, has dominated events this week. Nevertheless, despite the media images of burning buildings, destroyed police vehicles and black-clad militiamen with slung RPGs [Rocket Propelled Grenades], the news is not all bad. Events were kicked off with the killing of the (Badr) Head of the Criminal Intelligence Unit by JAM, resulting in the arrest (and subsequent killing) of the brother of the leader of Amara JAM by the IPS. In response JAM attacked the Badr dominated IPS. In the ensuing street battles on 19-20 Oct around 20 people were killed, scores injured, dozens of police cars destroyed and several buildings damaged. Despite all this, the response by both the IA and the Iraqi Government gives ground for optimism."[1395]

1529. Maj Gen Shirreff reported that the 10th Division had responded by deploying large numbers of troops rapidly and the Government had sent a delegation from Baghdad to negotiate a cease-fire. MNF assets had been used to show force and provide situational awareness. Maj Gen Shirreff reported that the incident had "tempered" assessments of Maysan's readiness for security transition.

1530. The cease-fire held into the following week but there were reports of police being murdered in their homes.[1396]

1531. On 8 December 2006, a junior FCO official emailed Mr Asquith to say that the MND(SE) Strategy Group had agreed Maysan should be reinstated as a candidate for transition in January 2007.[1397] Mr Asquith was asked to encourage Dr Rubaie to "press hard" for this at MCNS.

1532. On 10 December, Mr Asquith responded:

> "MND(SE) have just assessed Maysan as Amber (so even the most ardent transitioners aren't pushing); the Chief of Police is refusing to step down;

> Badr/JAM (or tribes – that we don't really know which is symptomatic of the lack of clear knowledge on the ground) threaten to shape up for another bout; Iranian angle (I'll leave it at that) likely to become hot from early Jan with obvious risks for Maysan (and, indeed Basra); and there is an ESC [Emergency Security Committee] still in place … To argue forcefully for Maysan to transition in these circumstances strikes me as a touch Nelsonian. Or did Strategy Group take all these factors into account when deciding we should get [Dr] Rubaie to 'press hard' at MCNS next week?"[1398]

1533. On 25 January 2007, Mr Asquith reported that the MNF were unable to visit police stations in the centre of town, and relied on police to meet them on the city perimeter.[1399]

1534. On 14 March, the British Embassy Office Basra reported that it was continuing to push that Maysan was ready for transition: "Our approach with the US – that Maysan is not perfect, but it is good enough – appears to be working."[1400] Prime Minister Maliki had disbanded the Emergency Security Committee on 7 January and "sacked" the Chief of Police Mr Maythem, replacing him with General Hassan.

1535. The Embassy stated that there was "a lot of anecdotal evidence of arms smuggling" across Maysan's border, and "regular press reports of arms smuggling and militants crossing", but no "concrete evidence". The local Chief of the DBE was "weak" and the MOI was "looking to replace him". While there had been attempts to close the border and improve infrastructure, the Iraqi Government was concerned about the potentially negative impact on the local economy. MND(SE) would continue patrolling the border after transition. The Embassy stated:

> "The border issue will not be easily solved; it is a source of wealth as well as weapons."

1536. On 3 May, Mr Sheinwald reported to Mr Blair that ACM Stirrup saw no utility in the Maysan border-monitoring role.[1401] It was not preventing incoming arms, nor acting as a deterrent. However, ACM Stirrup did not want to "make an early move", given US sensitivities in relation to Iran.

1537. On 4 April, the Iraqi Government announced that Maysan would transfer to PIC on 18 April.[1402]

1538. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Maj Gen Shaw described the reason for the decision to transfer Maysan to PIC at that time:

> "What happened in Maysan was not that there was any blinding flash of new security, but, rather, that the situation in Maysan had been stable for long enough, in 1539. On 19 April, Mr Richard Jones, the British Consul General in Basra, reported that, at the transfer ceremony for PIC, Dr Rubaie had described the transition as "another expression of Iraqi will".[1404]

1540. Mr Jones wrote that the handover was immediately overshadowed by an IED attack in the north-west of the province which had left two UK soldiers dead[1405] and one seriously injured. He concluded:

> "As we have reported … Maysan has always been a tough, lawless place. The question is whether the broad local balance can continue. It has held pretty well since the de facto withdrawal of coalition forces (apart largely from the border) and the violence last Ramadan."

1541. Maj Gen Binns, in his evidence to the Inquiry, recalled ongoing concerns about post-PIC border infiltration:

> "[Lt Gen Odierno] ordered me to conduct operations on the border with Iran in order to disrupt the flow of what he described as lethal aid … He was concerned about the border crossing points and he was concerned about infiltration through the marsh area in Maysan province.
> "So from September onwards, we started to conduct a series of operations which became known as Operation CERTAIN SHIELD into the border area.
> "I think they may have been effective as a deterrence, but we didn't find anything …"[1406]

1542. Maj Gen Binns went on to reflect that capacity-building was a useful area on which to focus:

> "… a good way of achieving what we needed to achieve was to develop the capabilities of the Department of Border Enforcement … So we improved our relationship with them."

UK police officer numbers 2003 to 2009

1543. As with civilian personnel (described in Section 15.1), there was no single continuous record for the number of UK police officers deployed to Iraq. How numbers were recorded varied considerably in relation to:

- how a ‘police officer’ was defined – some definitions included retired officers and MOD police officers, others did not; and
- the way in which numbers were counted – some counted the posts in place regardless of whether an officer occupied it at the time, others did not.

1544. Table 6 contains a broad estimate of the number of UK police officers deployed to Iraq between 2003 and 2009. Because of the limitations of the source material and the variety of sources used, the numbers quoted are approximate and, in some cases, are inconsistent with other material. The explanatory notes provide the reader with helpful background information on how the numbers have been calculated. In some cases, the Inquiry has made assumptions in the figures about the continuation of posts based on preceding or subsequent evidence.

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses conclusions in relation to the evidence set out in Section 12.1.

2. This Section does not address conclusions in relation to:

- broader planning and preparation for the conflict in Iraq and its aftermath, which are described in Section 6.5;
- the decision to remove some members of the Ba'ath Party from public office, a process known as "de-Ba'athification", which are described in Section 11.2;
- the UK contribution to the reconstruction of Iraq, which are described in Section 10.4; or
- the deployment of civilians to Iraq, which are described in Section 15.2.

Key findings

- Between 2003 and 2009, there was no coherent US/UK strategy for Security Sector Reform (SSR).
- The UK began work on SSR in Iraq without a proper understanding of what it entailed and hugely underestimated the magnitude of the task.
- The UK was unable to influence the US or engage it in a way that produced an Iraq-wide approach.
- There was no qualitative way for the UK to measure progress. The focus on the quantity of officers trained for the Iraqi Security Forces, rather than the quality of officers, was simplistic and gave a misleading sense of comfort.
- After 2006, the UK's determination to withdraw from Iraq meant that aspirations for the Iraqi Security Forces were lowered to what would be "good enough" for Iraq. It was never clear what that meant in practice.
- The development of the Iraqi Army was considerably more successful than that of the Iraqi Police Service. But the UK was still aware before it withdrew from Iraq that the Iraqi Army had not been sufficiently tested. The UK was not confident that the Iraqi Army could maintain security without support.

Pre-invasion planning and preparation

What is SSR?

The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) defines SSR as development work that helps societies to "escape from a downward spiral wherein insecurity, crime and underdevelopment are mutually reinforcing".[1]

In considering the SSR effort in Iraq, the Inquiry's task was complicated by a lack of clear terminology. That is indicative of the lack of clarity which hampered SSR activities from the start. The term Security Sector Reform was not used in a consistent way, and was sometimes used interchangeably with phrases such as "security system reform" and "Rule of Law". It was sometimes used to refer solely to police reform or to work to reform the army. The term "Rule of Law" was often used to refer specifically to the justice sector.

The term "Security Sector Reform" (SSR) is used in this Report to refer to work to rebuild and reform Iraq's security and justice institutions. The evidence available to the Inquiry reflects the UK's overwhelming focus on the Iraqi Army (IA) and Iraqi Police Service (IPS). Low-budget projects were undertaken in relation to the Iraqi judiciary and prison system (see Box, 'The justice sector', later in this Section) but their scale was very small by comparison.

3. Before the invasion, UK Government departments recognised that Security Sector Reform (SSR) would be an important component in reconstructing Iraq.

4. The FCO acknowledged that SSR should be "at the centre of post-conflict work, rather than outside it as happened in Afghanistan",[2] and understood that the issues raised by SSR would be complex and should be planned for as soon as possible.

5. Papers on SSR written by the FCO between October and December 2002 demonstrated the range of fundamental questions on SSR in Iraq for which the UK did not yet have answers. They included:

- "What security structures would be appropriate for a post S[addam] H[ussein] Iraqi Government? How do we arrive at an answer? What are the threats, internal and external? Should we undertake a comprehensive review of the armed forces?"[3]
- "How do we replace an excessively large security apparatus with something 'right sized'? Reform or abolition? Which parts of the security apparatus might be loyal to a new government and which not?"

- How to reform the working culture of the security sector, "particularly the police and the courts, so that it operates on the basis of humanitarian values in support of a legitimate government"?[4]

6. Between December 2002 and March 2003, very little progress was made in answering those questions. SSR was not always referred to in consideration of post-conflict operations. Specific plans were not developed for what would be done on the ground.

7. The UK saw a need to understand the US strategy before developing its own. That was consistent with the broad UK approach to post-conflict planning, on which the UK assumed that the US would lead, as addressed in Section 6.5.

8. The UK's short and medium term objectives for SSR were articulated by the MOD in February 2003. They were defined in very broad terms, with the desired end state: "to include the restructuring of the intelligence agencies, armed forces, police and criminal justice system. All elements of the Security Sector to be affordable and accountable".[5]

9. From 7 February onwards, responsibility for the UK's policy on SSR sat with the FCO under the leadership of Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, and Sir Michael Jay, the Permanent Under Secretary. From 10 April, Mr Straw also chaired the Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq Rehabilitation (AHMGIR).

10. Two teams in the FCO had a key role in relation to SSR:

- the Iraq Planning Unit (IPU), established to improve Whitehall co-ordination on post-conflict issues and provide policy guidance on the practical questions that UK civilian officials and military commanders would face in Iraq; and
- the United Nations Department (UND), which would help to identify, train and deploy civilian police to Iraq.

11. The US-led Coalition Military Assistance and Training Team (CMATT) was responsible for the training of the New Iraqi Army. The UK provided nine military officers in June 2003 to assist with that task, one of which was to act as the Deputy Commander of CMATT. It appears from the evidence that, in practice, the MOD led on this aspect of SSR.

12. On the eve of the invasion, there was no coherent SSR strategy in place between Coalition partners. That was described as a "high-level risk"[6] by the MOD's Defence Advisory Team.

13. Even though officials had warned that knowledge of conditions within Iraq was incomplete, it was assumed that Iraq would have a functioning criminal justice system and security forces which, after the removal of Ba'athist leadership, would have the capacity to play their part in its reconstruction.

14. It was unclear how the international SSR effort would be co-ordinated and therefore what contribution the UK would make.

Occupation

15. Immediately after the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime there was widespread looting by the Iraqi population, including in Baghdad and Basra. As described in Section 9.8, UK forces in Basra were not given instructions by their commanders in the UK on how to deal with it.

16. Brigadier Graham Binns, commanding the 7 Armoured Brigade which had taken Basra City, concluded that "the best way to stop looting was just to get to a point where there was nothing left to loot".[7]

17. As the need for a functioning police force to control lawless behaviour became increasingly apparent, there remained no strategy for SSR.

18. Officials from the Department for International Development (DFID) reported that the Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance (ORHA) had drawn up extensive plans for SSR but that those had been disregarded by the US and Coalition military.

19. The UK recognised that an SSR strategy was needed. On 24 April, the AHMGIR agreed that the UK should lobby the US to create a "comprehensive strategy", and to involve UK personnel in ORHA scoping studies.

20. A paper produced for the AHMGIR on 8 May indicated that the UK's approach continued to be based on the assumption that "the UK will neither be required nor able to develop an independent policy on SSR in Iraq".[8] The UK's immediate priorities were therefore to influence the development of US policy, recognising that:

> "Reform across the full range of security activities (armed forces, intelligence agencies, justice and law enforcement institutions) is an essential element of the overall Coalition strategy to establish a united and representative Iraqi Government and to create the conditions under which the Coalition can eventually disengage."

CPA Order No.2: 'Dissolution of Entities'

In May 2003, Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) Order No.2 "dissolved" a number of military and other security entities that had operated as part of Saddam Hussein's regime, including the Armed Forces. Neither the Iraqi Police Service (IPS) nor the Ministry of Interior (MOI) was dissolved. The UK's role in the development of this Order is addressed in Section 9.8.

There was nothing in CPA Order No.2 that prevented former employees of the military from applying to join the New Iraqi Army (NIA), although the provisions of Order No.1 (removing "full" members of the Ba'ath Party – see Section 11.1) would apply.

Sir David Manning, the Prime Minister's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of the Overseas and Defence Secretariat, told the Inquiry:

> "… these were policies that added to the difficulties, because we might have addressed the security vacuum by trying to encourage Iraqi police, Iraqi military, to co-operate with us, instead of which, they are disbanded and then become natural dissidents and potential insurgents."[9]

Disbanding the Iraqi Army automatically increased unemployment in Iraq.

In November 2003, Mr David Richmond, the Prime Minister's Special Representative on Iraq,[10] reported that issue had dominated discussions during his recent visit to Ar Ramadi, the capital of Anbar Province. He stated that "unemployment had forced many to do illegal acts, including attacks on the Coalition".[11] De-Ba'athification had "made it impossible for most of them to be employed by the State. The governor said that 50 percent had joined the Ba'ath Party not out of conviction but because it was a condition of employment; 40 percent for material gain; and only some 10 percent because they supported Ba'athist ideology".

Although a monthly stipend for those with at least 15 years' service (who were not senior Ba'athists) had been introduced at the end of June, many struggled to gain access to the payments. Ms Ann Clwyd, the Prime Minister's Special Envoy to Iraq on Human Rights from 2003 to 2009, told the Inquiry about a meeting with a senior army officer who had queued for his stipend for two weeks without reaching the front of the queue. He had told her: "if they want to humiliate us, this is the way of doing it".[12]

Issuing Order No.2 was a key CPA decision which should have been considered between Washington and London. It was to have a long-term impact on the development of the insurgency in Iraq.

21. A more proactive UK strategy for policing in Iraq – produced by UND and sent to No.10 by Mr Straw – was endorsed by Mr Blair in early June. Its immediate objective was "to stabilise the security situation by creating an effective interim police force with international civilian police working alongside Iraqi police and Coalition military forces".[13] The strategy's longer-term objective was "to establish an effective, viable and sustainable police force within a fully functioning security sector".

22. The initial action would be deployment of "an armed International Police Monitoring Force … to Baghdad and Basra, to conduct joint patrols with the current Iraqi police force and Coalition military", requiring 3,000 armed police officers. Once the Iraqi police were considered to have received sufficient initial training, the international presence would shift to a longer-term training focus, eventually taking on a mentoring role. UND suggested agreeing a strategy on how to reform the Iraqi Police Service (IPS) by 14 June and that the international force should be in place by 31 August.

23. The AHMGIR, under Mr Straw's chairmanship, did not discuss how the strategy would be implemented, or consider inconsistencies with the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) plans for police reform, as highlighted by the MOD. The MOD had been in touch with Mr Bernard Kerik, a former New York City Police Commissioner and the CPA Director of Interior Affairs. As a result, the MOD considered that the FCO's policing strategy was "about three weeks behind the curve"[14] because Mr Kerik did not want an international force – instead he wanted 7,000 trainers. UND suggested maintaining its approach until the US produced a policing strategy.

24. As set out in Section 9.8, the UK struggled to have a decisive impact on CPA policies.

25. In July, responsibilities for SSR within the CPA were divided. Mr Kerik took on responsibility for the Iraqi Ministry of Interior (MOI), including policing, fire, customs, border control, immigration, passports, citizenship and disaster relief. Mr Walt Slocombe, CPA Senior Advisor for National Security and Defense, focused on the development of the Iraqi armed forces. That split was seen by the UK as a set-back to agreeing a coherent national SSR strategy.

26. By mid-July, there were just four senior UK personnel in Iraq working across SSR as a whole (including reform of the police and army).The FCO had deployed Acting Deputy Chief Constable Douglas Brand to lead the UK's attempt to influence the CPA police reform programme and Acting Deputy Chief Constable Stephen White to lead on policing in Basra. DCC White was accompanied by two MOD police officers.

27. SSR strategies began to develop on a regional basis, largely in isolation from each other.

28. On 17 July, the AHMGIR discussed a paper by the IPU which stated that there "was still no cohesive strategy"[15] but that this was "not necessarily a cause for current alarm" because it reflected the rapidly moving situation in Iraq. The Inquiry does not agree with that analysis. A shared understanding of what sort of police force was required in Iraq and how it could be delivered was essential to ensuring that SSR resources were used effectively and coherently.

29. The AHMGIR identified the requirement for approximately 7,000 international police officers – of which it was intended that the UK would provide 100 – as "ambitious" but did not commission further work to understand the impact on CPA plans if the total could not be reached.

30. In August, UND asked DCC Brand to lobby the US for the creation of a policing strategy for Iraq. There was no established UK policy position at that point on what sort of police force was appropriate for Iraq, the role of an Iraqi police officer, the ideal force structure, or how police reform should be delivered. That hampered DCC Brand's ability to influence US strategy.

31. Mr Kerik estimated in early August that Iraq would need 65,000-75,000 police officers and that it would take six years to develop a force of that size. There was no Coalition plan to deliver that number of officers.

32. By the end of August, the CPA's plans for a 7,000-strong international training force were recognised to be unachievable. The aspiration was now "1,500 to 2,000" officers.[16]

33. A policing strategy for Iraq was also essential to ensure that the international effort was coherent across the country. The lack of co-ordination between police reform in Baghdad and Basra could be seen in a report produced by DCC White on 26 August. He assessed that 91 international officers would be required to support the policing mission in Multi-National Division (South-East) (MND(SE)) and an additional 48 would be required to provide force protection. DCC White told the Inquiry that that caused some controversy when the numbers were communicated to the CPA staff in Baghdad as they were considered to be inconsistent with the new 'MOI 60/90 day Strategic Plan' which DCC White had not seen.

34. In the absence of a clear strategy for what type of force was needed, and a realistic assessment of how it could be delivered, priority was given to pushing Iraqi police officers through basic training in large numbers.

Initial problems deploying UK police officers

Mr Stephen Pattison, Head of UND until June 2003, told the Inquiry that the process of recruiting officers to deploy overseas was "always a struggle"[17] and "not straightforward". The requirement was often for armed police which ruled out the majority of UK officers.

---

[16] Minute Brand, 10 August 2003, 'Report from Iraq – Douglas Brand'.
[17] Statement, 6 January 2011, pages 12-13.

The focus was therefore on getting UK officers into niche roles in which they could use their experience without being operational. As any officers deployed would have to be volunteers, certain security conditions also had to be met and funding identified. Government officials do not appear to have appreciated the scope of that task before they started recruiting officers for Iraq.

The UK's target was to have deployed 100 UK officers to conduct basic training by the end of September 2003.

On 18 July, Mr Straw wrote to Mr David Blunkett, the Home Secretary, asking him to seek nominations of up to 200 officers for firearms training. By September, 260 had applied but none had been deployed.

It is unclear whether that was because of a reluctance on the part of the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) and Chief Constables (concerned about breaching their duty of care given the security situation in Iraq) to release officers or whether it was because the officers who had applied were not suitably qualified.

In addition to the officers required to run basic training, DCC Brand had also requested support staff and officers to address more specific training needs such as intelligence and operational planning. He told the Inquiry how, after lobbying for a Special Branch system, he was unable to find someone to make the concept a reality and consequently lost the opportunity.

An email from DCC Brand on 21 September expressed frustration that officers had still not been deployed to a Joint Command Centre in Baghdad designed to prevent friendly fire incidents:

> " … I don't mind where they come from as long as they get here ASAP … I made my original request … 6 weeks ago … If we are only just thinking about approaching PSNI [Police Service of Northern Ireland] it may be weeks or months before the officers are able to travel and we would lose all credibility with the American military … To remind you, this was our idea … I urge you to act swiftly and not delay any longer."[18]

The FCO, and in particular UND, had prior experience of deploying officers overseas but was unable to meet the large-scale requirements of Iraq. Sir Michael Jay should have ensured that his department provided the resources that the senior UK officers needed.

In November, after meeting DCC White, Mr Bill Rammell, FCO Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, reported that DCC White's assessment of progress was at odds with the way the situation was being described in public.

The Home Office record of the Iraq Senior Officials Group of 4 November recorded that Mr Straw's initial reaction to DCC White's complaints was to call a "special meeting of Ministers to discuss what more could be done"[19] but that FCO officials had advised that that was not necessary.

Following a visit in November, Mr Straw directed Mr John Sawers, FCO Director General Political, to resolve the matter: "A combination of the Byzantine bureaucracy of ACPO and a lack of understanding in the FCO about police issues and practice … threaten further delays and a sub-optimal delivery in an area where the UK has a serious contribution to make."[20]

After a slow start, the UK reached its target of 100 trainers in January 2004. The first tranche deployed to the training centre in Jordan[21] in November 2003 and the first tranche of 24 officers for az-Zubayr Academy in Basra deployed in December. DCC Brand did not receive his additional officers for non-training roles until March 2004.

Iraqiisation

35. From early June 2003, and throughout the summer, there had been signs that security in both Baghdad and MND(SE) was deteriorating. As the summer wore on, authoritative sources in the UK system, such as the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC), began to identify issues with the potential to escalate into conflict and to recognise the likelihood that extremist groups would become more co-ordinated (see Section 14.1).

36. In September Mr Donald Rumsfeld, the US Defense Secretary, applied pressure on the CPA to increase the number of Iraqi Army officers by ordering an acceleration of the training programme, halving the training time to one year, and increasing its budget from US$173m to US$2.2bn.

The Iraqi Civil Defence Corps (ICDC)

The Iraqi Civil Defence Corps (ICDC) was created in July 2003 to:

- give Coalition operations an Iraqi face;
- keep unemployed young men out of the insurgency; and
- increase the number of security forces available.

Established by CPA Order No.28, the ICDC was described as "a security and emergency agency for Iraq"[22] and was authorised to perform a wide range of constabularly duties. It operated under the authority of the Administrator of the CPA but was subject to the supervision of Coalition Forces.

The ICDC's performance received mixed reviews but it became an important component of SSR while other elements, such as the Iraqi Police Service and Iraqi Army, were being developed.

37. As security worsened, Ministers sought to expedite "Iraqiisation", the term used to refer to the ability of the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) to take the lead responsibility for security.

[21] The majority of police training took place at the Jordan International Police Training College (JIPTC).
[22] Coalition Provisional Authority Order Number 28 – Establishment of the Iraqi Civil Defense Corps, 3 September 2003.

38. On 2 September 2003, in a meeting of Ministers and senior personnel, Mr Blair said that he believed that the key to the security situation in Iraq was "the rapid mobilisation of an effective Iraqi police force".[23] That included increasing Iraqi police manpower to 70,000 within three months. That ambitious new target brought forward the timescale set by the CPA for reaching that size of force by more than six months.

39. The Inquiry has seen no evidence pre-dating 2 September of the origins of the proposal to accelerate training so dramatically, or of analysis of whether it was achievable.

40. The IPU advised that existing policy was to provide 70,000 police officers by mid-2004 and train 40,000 for the New Iraqi Army within one year. It listed some ideas for how SSR could be accelerated and improved but did not suggest any further resources beyond those which were already in train. The advice did not assess how those suggestions would be resourced and implemented and did not provide an analysis of whether Mr Blair's target of 70,000 officers was achievable.

41. A briefing paper for Mr Blair by Mr Richmond stated that Ambassador Bremer did not think that Mr Blair's target was achievable.

42. The IPU paper and Mr Richmond's advice suggested that, at the very least, detailed work was needed to assess whether it was possible to accelerate the training timetable in the way Mr Blair proposed, and what resources that would require, before the idea was pursued further.

43. Sir Michael Jay, as the senior official accountable for the resourcing of the UK's police reform effort, should have ensured that such an assessment was made. The AHMGIR, chaired by Mr Straw, failed to assess whether Mr Blair's target and the IPU's suggestions could be achieved.

44. Mr Blair pressed the idea of acceleration, including with President Bush, without having requested or considered such detailed advice. Ahead of a video conference with President Bush on 5 September, Mr Blair sent the President a Note which stated:

> "Iraq has 37,000 police. We need to double that. Given the number of trainers and their facilities, that will take a year. We cannot wait that long. So: if we need to treble or quadruple the trainers and expand the numbers of Iraqi police even beyond that contemplated, we should do it …"[24]

45. The record of the video conference between Mr Blair and President Bush stated that Mr Blair had said a "big push" was required to boost numbers and speed up training of Iraqi Security Forces.[25]

46. For the first meeting of the Iraq Senior Officials Group on 9 September, an IPU paper maintained that the focus should be on the Iraqi Civil Defence Corps (ICDC) and the police "as the most likely to produce quick results, while continuing to support the longer-term development of the New Iraqi Army".[26] It did not address Mr Blair's target of doubling police officer numbers. It assessed that "the main problem in developing the Iraqi Police is the slowness with which CPA is developing its strategy, concept and timelines for reform" and that "in the absence of a central strategy, we are pursuing regional options".

47. The Annotated Agenda for the meeting of the AHMGIR on 18 September re-affirmed the requirement for a "coherent overall policing strategy".[27] Cabinet Office officials reported that the UK was lobbying Ambassador Bremer, and Washington, to expedite creation of a strategy and operational plan, and was offering the services of DCC Brand to write them. The Annotated Agenda did not reflect Mr Blair's desire to double the number of police officers.

48. Despite the IPU's analysis that lack of strategic direction for police reform was the "main problem", it was not mentioned in a report to Mr Blair from Mr Straw's office on 17 October. That risked giving an unrealistic impression of both what had been achieved and what might be achieved in the future. The report stated: "We judge that the Coalition now has a credible and deliverable strategy to train 30,000 Iraqi police over the next year."[28] By that stage, around 40,000 police officers were considered to have been trained.

49. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that he considered that judgement to be "reasonable"[29] at the time but that with hindsight he could see that it was not.

50. Following the FCO Police Contributors conference in early October, it was clear that sufficient additional international support to make plans for accelerated training deliverable was unlikely to be forthcoming.

51. In October, a public order incident in Basra demonstrated the continued deficiencies of the local police.

52. Shortly afterwards, DCC White publicly expressed concerns about the SSR programme in Iraq, and the UK's resourcing of it, in a documentary broadcast by BBC Northern Ireland. DCC White told the Inquiry that his remarks had caused controversy in the UK and he was left "feeling unsupported and isolated"[30] but for the support of Sir Hilary Synnott, Head of CPA(South), and Ms Jane Kennedy, Minister of State for Northern Ireland.

53. Following a review, Combined Joint Taskforce-7 (CJTF-7)[31] issued an Order on 27 October entitled 'Acceleration of the Iraqi Police Services' which envisaged enhanced support from CJTF-7 for enlarged and accelerated police training programmes. It had been developed without consultation with the UK.

54. Sir Hilary Synnott reported that the Order had:

> " … considerable implications for military resources to be devoted to police training; for our current plans, including the recently inaugurated Basra Regional Police Academy; and for the significant Danish effort at present and in future. We had no warning of this from CPA Baghdad (beyond a slight reference to such a possibility), no subsequent information from them and no consultation."[32]

55. On 6 November, the AHMGIR was told that the new approach included "accelerating recruitment, training and deployment of Iraqi security forces".[33] The ICDC was set to increase by April 2004 and the target for 70,000 police should be reached by August 2004 rather than March 2005. The training of the Iraqi Army would be slowed, but the Army would "now be allowed to undertake internal as well as external security tasks".

56. Although the US military had produced plans for accelerating training, they had not addressed DCC White's concerns about the quality of that training.

57. Former DCC Brand told the Inquiry:

> "Trying to persuade my military colleagues at two-star and three-star level that this was a long-term investment of restructuring the police seemed to work against their sort of short-term mission goals, and I very vividly remember the presentation that was done to the Commanding General which was entitled '30,000 in 30 Days' … I had to say 'Okay, in that case then, why don't you give me the military to train? I have read a few war books, I have seen a few war films, it can't be as difficult as that, or is that as ridiculous as what you are suggesting, which is we recruit 30,000 in 30 days, call them police, label them police, give them weapons and say 'You are now in the police' but actually have no capability to do the things that policemen should do at all?"[34]

58. In November, Chief Constable Paul Kernaghan, the lead on international affairs for the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO), told Mr Straw that police reform in Iraq still lacked vision and that the UK contribution was insufficient.

59. At about the same time, Mr Jim Daniel, a senior ex-Home Office adviser sent to Iraq to help the CPA generate a policing strategy, decided to resign. The combination of

CC Kernaghan's advice, DCC White's views and Mr Daniel's resignation were sufficient to highlight that police reform – an essential part of the UK's exit strategy – was in serious difficulties.

60. By the end of November 2003, Mr Straw had clear evidence that police reform in Iraq lacked strategic direction. He should have instigated consideration of the UK's options for resolving the problem, including work to define a UK position on the right strategy for Iraqi policing.

61. The response of the AHMGIR, chaired by Mr Straw, was instead that the UK should lobby the US to make improvements in police training. Mr Straw should have recognised that lobbying alone would be insufficient to address the critical lack of a strategy/vision for policing in Iraq. Mr Straw's direction to Mr Sawers (see Box, 'Initial problems deploying UK police officers', earlier in this Section) focused too narrowly on the deployment of UK police officers rather than on the wider issues in police reform.

THE US MILITARY TAKE THE LEAD ON POLICE REFORM

62. In mid-November, a new political timetable for Iraq was announced, which brought forward the handover of power from the CPA to the Iraqi Transitional Government (ITG) to June 2004.[35] Former DCC Brand told the Inquiry that the change of timetable critically changed everyone's outlook: "all the focus was on 'Let's get this over to the Iraqis', and so our longer-term intentions were almost squashed from there on".[36]

63. Towards the end of 2003, within the UK there was awareness that assessments given by US commanders were "exaggerated"[37] and there were doubts about Iraqi capacity. A significant gap in figures was highlighted by the FCO, which assessed that there were around 45,000 operational police officers throughout Iraq, all requiring some level of re-training. The US assessment was that there were 63,000 operational police officers.

64. In the absence of a coherent strategy, Coalition partners continued to work independently of one another. An example of this occurred in February 2004, when the UK started recruiting 40 retired UK officers to act as mentors. At the same time, the US was developing plans to recruit around 500 police advisers from Dyncorps to act as mentors, of which 50 were planned for deployment to the South. That was met with some consternation by Mr Steve Casteel, who replaced Mr Kerik as CPA Director of Internal Affairs in September 2003. He reportedly said: "This isn't two countries, you know."[38]

65. Secretary Rumsfeld transferred the responsibility for training and mentoring police officers to the US military in March 2004 following a report by Major General

Karl Eikenberry, former US Security Co-ordinator and Chief of the Office of Military Co-operation in Afghanistan. It was thought that the change would provide the unity of command across the security sector that was needed. The report reiterated that the Army's focus should remain on external threats but its training rate be reduced to allow the development of other security forces.

66. The change in responsibilities led to the creation of a new umbrella structure, the Office of Security Co-operation (OSC), commanded by Major General Paul Eaton, the former commander of CMATT. CMATT and the newly named policing equivalent – the Coalition Police Assistance Training Team (CPATT) – would report to the OSC and the OSC would report to the CJTF-7.

67. It appears that DCC Brand and Mr Casteel had not been consulted about that significant change in approach. Former DCC Brand told the Inquiry that the creation of the OSC was a shock to both him and Mr Casteel. He said that, while the military could do "the volume stuff",[39] they did not have the skill set to conduct basic training or the policy advice on policing. That meant "they were making it up … from theatre, rather than back at the policy headquarters".

68. On 25 March 2004, the FCO's Weekly Update on Iraq for No.10 stated that a CENTCOM review had concluded that transition to local control across Iraq was "likely to be delayed by up to eight months from their original over optimistic target of May 2004".[40] The paper stated that was "not a surprise":

> "The Iraqi Security Forces do not just have to be hired; they must be vetted, trained, equipped, mentored and certified ie capability, not numbers, is the key … Bremer has been pushing for quality for months, without the support in Washington, where the emphasis has been on numbers. On the positive side, a lesson has now been learned."

69. The Cabinet Office sent an update for Ministers on 2 April, stating that police training was to be accelerated under the new structures with a target of completing in-service training of 43,000 officers by January 2005.

70. Although advice and information sent to Ministers consistently emphasised the importance of training competent police officers, the focus of effort continued to be on training officers in high numbers.

SECURITY DECLINES

71. There was a significant worsening of security in the spring of 2004. Coupled with revelations of abuse by members of the US military of Iraqi detainees in Abu Ghraib prison, this led many of the Inquiry's witnesses to conclude that the spring of 2004 was a turning point, as described in Section 9.8.

72. In April, weaknesses in the ICDC and IPS were exposed as a result of uprisings in Fallujah and Najaf. Some officers abandoned their posts and aided the insurgency. Others mutinied when they came under fire.

73. The ICDC was affected worst of all. 12,000 members deserted within two weeks. Consideration was given to re-engaging military officers dismissed under the policy of de-Ba'athification (see Section 11.1). Ambassador Paul Bremer, Presidential Envoy to Iraq and Head of the CPA, maintained that the de-Ba'thification policy was correct, but had been poorly implemented. Mr Blair told President Bush that the Coalition needed to do "whatever it takes"[41] to get the ICDC and police into shape. He added: "I'm not sure we really have our entire system focused on this; and it needs to be".

74. Mr Blair held a meeting with Ministers and senior officials on 13 May to discuss security in Iraq. He expressed a clear view that there were two key issues in Iraq: the political process and security, of which security was "fundamental".[42] After the transfer of sovereignty, Mr Blair felt that the Iraqis would be reluctant to ask the Coalition to manage security for them and this "put a real premium on building capacity urgently".

75. At Mr Blair's request, a team led by Major General Nicholas Houghton, Assistant Chief of the Defence Staff (Operations), visited Iraq from 20 to 23 May to see what could be done to speed up Iraqiisation of the security sector.

76. Maj Gen Houghton's frank assessment identified issues that should already have been clear to Ministers and officials. He noted the lack of strategy, "bureaucratic complexity"[43] hindering access to funds and resources, "initiative overload" and a short-term focus. He stated that the concept of acceleration was "misplaced". It was "'Sustained Effort", with some change in emphasis, that would produce the desired capability. He highlighted the need for "honest acceptance" of the likely timescales.

77. Maj Gen Houghton assessed that:

> "The biggest single thing that will move the creation of capability forward is the increased use of military and police assets in mentoring roles. This should involve, for example, widening the concept of embedding troops within ICDC Units. Given available assets this will mean taking risk on maintaining security."

78. Maj Gen Houghton judged that an SSR strategy must be "authored, owned and executed" in Iraq, not in London.

79. Maj Gen Houghton stated that over 80,000 police officers were operational with approximately 20,000 having received training. An accelerated training programme was being put in place by CPATT.

80. Mr Blair tried to inject a new sense of urgency into Iraqiisation. In five meetings and conversations with President Bush in May and June, Mr Blair raised Iraqiisation, emphasising its importance and his hope that Lieutenant General David Petraeus, Commanding General Multi-National Force – Iraq,[44] and Prime Minister Designate Dr Ayad Allawi could agree a joint plan on Iraqiisation for publication.

81. On 3 June, Mr Blair asked to be informed of "any obstacles or log jams"[45] which he might need to raise with President Bush. He commissioned a round-up on Iraqiisation every two weeks.

82. Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, and General Sir Mike Walker, Chief of the Defence Staff, provided Mr Blair with an update on Iraqiisation two weeks later. Mr Blair again asked to be informed of any issues automatically rather than having to ask.

83. On 16 June, Mr Blair wrote to President Bush that the problem with Iraqiisation was "obvious": "The numbers in the police are there. But not the quality or equipment …"[46]

84. By the end of the Coalition's Occupation in June 2004, Ministers were aware that Iraqiisation was critical to the UK's withdrawal and that it was the quality, not quantity, of officers in the ISF that was critical. But the US and UK were no closer to achieving a coherent SSR strategy for Iraq. As the CPA was disbanded and responsibility for day-to-day interaction with the Iraqi Interim Government on civil affairs passed to the newly appointed British and US Ambassadors, there was no plan to develop one.

The justice sector

For SSR, the UK's overwhelming focus was on the army and police. The need for a robust judicial system had been recognised but was poorly supported.

Prisons were listed as a "priority one area"[47] in April 2003 but by December it was reported that "not much work had been done in this area".

In June 2003, Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, told the AHMGIR that corruption and intimidation had left the Iraqi judicial system in a worse state than expected and that it would require a long-term commitment from the international community to rebuild it.

In March 2004, a report from Mr Robert Davies, Chief Police Adviser to the Ministry of Interior, stated that only one out of five Iraqi Correctional Service facilities was functioning in the UK's Area of Responsibility. Even that facility was in poor condition and overcrowded. In January, the prison held 478 prisoners against a capacity of 230.

Part of the reason identified for this rise had been a weakness in the due process where prisoners were kept on remand without judicial review.

SSR projects in the justice sector were small in comparison with efforts being made to reform the Iraqi Army and Iraqi Police Service:

- In January 2004, DFID approved a contribution of £2.2m over two years towards the International Legal Assistance Consortium (ILAC). A review of the programme in June 2006 stated "that the project was put together under pressure rapidly to get programme activities started with some quick-win activities … The pressure to move fast, however, may well have sown the seeds for the eventual, limited impact".[48]
- A support programme for prisons in southern Iraq was approved during the summer of 2004. The UK awarded £1.7m to the programme (after a bid of £5.53m) to train and mentor staff. All prisons within the CPA(South) boundary run by the Iraqi Prison Service were overseen and maintained by the UK.
- The UK contributed some staff towards the EU JustLex programme that began in February 2005. The programme was an integrated police and Rule of Law mission for Iraq by Member States arranging senior management training for the police, judiciary and prison service. Over four years, it comprised 40 staff from across the EU and spent roughly €30m.

As with the majority of SSR programmes, success seemed to be measured by the number of Iraqi staff trained. The programmes were not effective in solving the underlying problems of corruption and intimidation that thwarted significant improvement.

Officials were still reporting in May 2006 that justice continued to be "the missing link".[49]

In March 2007, the Better Basra plan described Iraq's judiciary as "weak and unable to prosecute serious crime".[50] Prisons were described as "old, overcrowded" and said to "not meet minimum international human rights standards". That assessment suggested that little progress had been made from the UK's early assessments of Iraq's justice sector.

Severe overcrowding was still an issue in December 2007 when an FCO official reported that:

> "Through a combination of negligence, incompetence, poor co-ordination and lack of adequate facilities it can take a long time to process detainees through the investigative, judicial and correctional systems."[51]

Transition

85. After the UK and US ceased to be Occupying Powers in Iraq in June 2004, SSR was conducted under the authority of resolution 1546 (2004) and the annexed letters from Dr Ayad Allawi, the Iraqi Prime Minister, and US Secretary of State Mr Colin Powell.

The role of the Multi-National Force (MNF) was to continue building the capability of the ISF and its institutions through a programme of recruitment, training, equipping, mentoring and monitoring.

86. During the CPA era, the metric used to measure progress in relation to the ISF had been the number of personnel on duty. Immediately after the transition, that metric was replaced by "trained and equipped"[52] personnel. The net result was a 75 percent drop in the totals of force personnel attributed to the MOI from 181,297 "on duty" personnel on 15 June to 47,255 "trained and equipped" personnel on 25 August.

87. Shortly after transition, Mr Straw advised the Ministerial Committee on Defence and Overseas Policy (DOP) that the SSR objective for the following six months should be for the ISF to be in control across much of the country. That was the basis on which UK troop reductions would be feasible. DOP agreed. It is not clear how Mr Straw reached the conclusion that that was a viable objective.

88. By early October, there was clear evidence that the SSR objective agreed by DOP was unlikely to be achievable because:

- The Basra police chief was working with militants who were causing disruption in the area.
- There remained significant capacity issues within key ministries.
- There was a need for more focused IPS training in areas of operational planning and intelligence.
- Warnings from theatre continued to stress that the focus on numbers was misplaced – the morale and integrity of officers who had joined the ISF was questionable and those issues needed to be addressed to deliver the capabilities required.

89. In November, FCO officials informed Mr Straw that they were factoring such concerns into their planning. They assessed that the two most serious problems were the dysfunctional MOI and the lack of equipment, both of which were being addressed by UK-funded initiatives.

90. It should have been clear to Mr Straw and FCO officials, for whose advice Sir Michael Jay was accountable, that the ISF were unlikely to be able to provide security and that troop reductions based on the assumption that Iraqiisation would be successful needed to be reconsidered.

91. On 9 December, despite evidence to the contrary, the FCO continued to advise that, by the summer of 2005, the ISF could take the lead on security. It was overly optimistic of the FCO, under Mr Straw's leadership, to believe that would be the case. That over-optimism distorted consideration of when UK forces should be withdrawn from Iraq.

92. A JIC Assessment of 15 December assessed that a credible ISF, capable of managing the insurgency unaided, would not emerge until 2006 at the earliest.

93. The JIC Assessment was discussed at the Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq the following day. Ministers agreed that a number of papers should be prepared, including practical suggestions to adjust the Petraeus Plan[53] for SSR, ways of improving the Iraqi Ministry of Defence and MOI, a list of security and funding issues for Mr Blair to raise with President Bush and a list of useful activities that other countries could be asked to undertake. The lack of a policing strategy for Iraq, which had been identified by the IPU as early as July 2003, had still not been addressed.

94. In February 2005, the FCO produced a paper for the AHMGIR that contained proposals for a greater focus at the national level where there was "an urgent need for an Iraqi national policing strategy, supported by an appropriate training syllabus to address established weaknesses".[54] The proposals were for the development of a National Police Plan and in the areas of forensics and intelligence. The FCO paper also pointed to potential funding pressures if those new proposals were to be adopted and if current projects were extended.

95. The FCO told the AHMGIR that the key message from the paper was that funding beyond September was extremely tight and tough decisions would need to be made.

96. In the absence of an SSR strategy against which the merits and contribution of any particular project or programme could be judged, the basis on which such decisions could be made was unclear.

97. Just three months after the JIC had raised concerns about the development of the ISF, the MOD advised No.10 in March that the Petraeus Plan was "largely on track, meeting the demands of a well-entrenched counter insurgency".[55] The ISF was expected to achieve full strength by January 2006 and the transfer of regional control would be under way. The view from No.10 was that the MOD's advice was "rather insubstantial, and almost certainly too optimistic in its assessment of the quality of much of the ISF".[56]

98. The MOD's assessment was also contrary to other reports coming from Iraq around that time and it became difficult for Ministers to know which evidence was most accurate. In his Hauldown Report, Lieutenant General John Kiszely, Senior British Military Representative, Iraq (SBMR-I) from October 2004 to April 2005, described the MOI as dysfunctional and stated that any expectation that the IPS would be able to perform well against the insurgency was unrealistic.

[53] The Petraeus Plan followed a 'Troops to Task' assessment carried out by Lt Gen Petraeus in the summer of 2004. The resulting plan was to increase the Iraqi Police Service and Iraqi National Guard by roughly 50 percent.

99. During the summer of 2005, there is evidence that UK officials were not clear about their departments' role within the SSR effort and felt disconnected from what was happening on the ground. That was exemplified in June when DFID commissioned a consultant to assist the FCO in drawing together a cross-Whitehall strategy for UK support to the development of Iraqi policing capacity. The FCO, the MOD and DFID struggled to reach an agreement on what the strategy should say and acknowledged they simply did not know whether policing was on track or not.

100. Lieutenant General Robin Brims, SBMR-I, reported in July that, although the Iraqi Army was steadily increasing in confidence, it did not yet have the ability to conduct complex operations. The police were lagging behind the army and were of doubtful quality but plans were in place to address that.

101. Mr Blair saw Lt Gen Brims' report and sought an honest assessment of the progress of Iraqiisation, which suggests a lack of confidence in the MOD's reporting. Dr John Reid, the Defence Secretary, admitted that there was still a focus on quantity rather than quality in stating "numerically, generation of ISF remains on track, but significant development in key capability areas is still needed".[57]

102. The information on ISF numbers also masked other issues. In September, an FCO transition plan for the IPS showed, when compared with earlier MOD papers, that the overall figure of 55 percent of police trained masked considerable variations across MND(SE) – although 90 percent of personnel in Dhi Qar province had received training, the figures for Muthanna and Basra were considerably lower (40 percent and 42 percent respectively).

103. Mr Blair expressed his concerns about ISF capability, following reports of police involvement in attacks on the Multi-National Forces in Basra. But despite concerns that had been expressed about the capacity of the ISF, Dr Reid recommended a reduction in UK forces should take place in October or November of 2005.

104. A few days after Dr Reid made his recommendation the Jameat incident in Basra on 19 September raised questions about the ISF in MND(SE). Officials from the FCO, the MOD and DFID judged that the incident had highlighted the risks to achieving UK objectives in MND(SE), and that those risks had implications for military resources. Nevertheless, assumptions about ISF readiness were not re-examined by Ministers. Reluctance to consider the potential implications of the Jameat incident obscured what it had revealed about the security situation in MND(SE).

105. Sir Nigel Sheinwald, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser, wrote: "It is clear that we need to review whether our police training strategy in the South-East is working, and whether the national policing strategy knits together."[58] Sir Nigel reported that Mr Blair had agreed that Sir Ronnie Flanagan, Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary, should be asked to visit Iraq and that he wanted a UK Minister to take ownership of the overall policing strategy, including liaison with the US over national strategy, supported by a dedicated team in London.

The MOD takes the lead for policing

106. The critical importance of ISF capability in assessing readiness for transfer to Provincial Iraqi Control, on which UK plans to draw down were based, was emphasised by the 'Conditions for Provincial Transfer' published by the Joint Iraqi/MNF Committee to Transfer Security Responsibility, and by Dr Reid, who told the Defence and Overseas Policy Committee on Iraq (DOP(I)) on 12 October that "successful Iraqiisation remains the key".[59] DOP(I) decided that Dr Reid should have lead responsibility for building the capacity of the IPS in Basra in addition to his responsibility for the Iraqi Army.

107. DOP(I) discussed the need "to do more to speed up the development of police" but considered that "the plan for ISF development that was in place was largely sound".[60]

108. Mr Blair asked for a major and sustained push to make progress on the ability of the ISF to take the lead on security.

109. General Sir Mike Jackson, Chief of the General Staff, raised concerns about ISF effectiveness in a minute to Gen Walker and concluded: "it is not to our credit that we have known about the inadequacies of the IPS for so long and yet failed to address them".[61]

110. At the same time, the JIC stated that the Iraqi armed forces stood at 91,000 personnel and MOI forces at 106,000 personnel, but that those figures did not take account of absenteeism or provide an indication of true capability. The IPS suffered from divided loyalties and a significant number were involved in criminality for financial gain.

111. In MND(SE), there was a lack of confidence that plans to tackle corruption within the IPS were working. There were questions about whether the IPS should be disbanded and started from scratch. Major General James Dutton, General Officer Commanding MND(SE) (GOC MND(SE)) from June 2005 to December 2005, told the Inquiry that was why he had proposed a three-point plan on 24 October. It was more focused on reform than re-design and reflected the new approach that "we should be aiming for a police force that is relevant and 'good enough' for this region".[62]

112. The need for a single SSR strategy was raised again by Sir Ronnie Flanagan when he visited Iraq in November to conduct another review of the effectiveness of the UK's policing strategy. In his final report of 31 January 2006, Sir Ronnie reported that a broad strategic plan was being developed and the disconnected ways of working were becoming a thing of the past. While that work may have been under way at that time, the Inquiry has not seen any evidence of a national strategy being produced as a result.

113. By the end of 2005, Whitehall remained overly optimistic about ISF development. In papers prepared for DOP(I) on 20 December, the MOD stated that the development of the Iraqi Army remained on track for the fully funded and trained figure of 130,000 by December 2006 and the IPS was making an increasingly significant contribution although it was behind the Iraqi Army in development terms. There remained a significant issue about whether the Iraqi Government and ministries had the capacity to direct and sustain the civil and military security forces. That was alongside the risk of increasing sectarianism and militia infiltration.

114. Mr Blair told President Bush on 23 December: "The two clear messages were: the vital nature of leadership of the MOI and MOD; and 2006 being the year of the police."[63]

Preparation for withdrawal

"Good enough"

115. In late 2005, General George Casey, who became Commander of the CJTF-7 in June 2004, designated 2006 as the "Year of the Police", recognising that a national police force was vital to any exit strategy.

116. From 2006, the UK appears to have stopped lobbying for the creation of a national SSR strategy and instead focused on what was necessary to enable the withdrawal of troops. Without a means to measure progress objectively, success continued to mean the number of officers trained.

117. Acting Deputy Chief Constable Colin Smith, Chief Police Adviser Iraq, wrote about the Year of the Police in January 2006 that "the strap line that 'just enough is good enough' is, whilst probably realistic, not particularly encouraging".[64] He wrote that it could be "a defining factor in the development of an effective Iraqi Police Service".

118. In March 2006, Dr Reid continued to press ahead with drawdown and announced that troop levels would reduce in May 2006 from approximately 8,000 to around 7,200 based on "completion of various security sector reform tasks, a reduction in the support levels for those tasks, and recent efficiency measures in theatre".[65] That rationale did not include an assessment of the effect of those tasks on the capability of the ISF.

119. The assessment of ISF capability from other sources was still discouraging:

- Operation CORRODE, an operation aimed at removing corrupt police, proved difficult to implement with limited political engagement in Basra. The JIC afterwards reported that it suspected that officers had been reassigned rather than removed.
- The JIC reported that the ISF could cope with low-level threats but its readiness to handle Shia extremists or intra-Shia violence was uncertain. Army command, control and logistics capabilities were all still developing, making major operations without MNF support difficult.
- Mr Robin Lamb, British Consul General in Basra, reported that local staff regarded the IPS "as at best ineffective, and at worst complicit in the assassinations. We would support that assessment".

120. The security situation in MND(SE) continued to decline in 2006, and the UK continued to plan for drawdown. That is addressed in Section 9.8.

121. The MOD's assessment in June was that the ISF programme was "on target to complete by December 2006 with 80 percent of the ISF trained and equipped (less the forces in Anbar province and the Air Force and Navy capability)".[66] The police were "some way behind" but "significant progress" was expected by the end of the year. Their effectiveness rested on their credibility with the Iraqi people, which was "increasing but remain[ed] an issue". The ISF should "be capable of managing the threat that they will face but could be quickly undermined by poor leadership".

122. On 1 September, an eGram from the British Embassy Baghdad reported an "important step psychologically"[67] for the Iraqi military: the Iraqi Ground Forces Command and Iraqi Ministry of Defence would commence "a staggered handover" of command and control functions from MNF-I on 3 September. The Embassy stated that "while the assumption of responsibility looks gradual and sensibly phased, in reality the pace will be demanding to both MNF-I and the IGFC [Iraqi Ground Forces Command]". As "life support and logistics capabilities" were "developing at their own, much slower, pace", the Embassy predicted that "IA Divisions will remain dependent on MNF-I for some time to come".

BETTER BASRA

123. In summer 2006, in recognition of the need to stabilise Basra and prepare it for transition to Iraqi control, the UK developed the Basra Security Plan and Better Basra Plan. The former was "a plan to improve Basra through operations, high impact reconstruction and SSR … lasting for up to six months",[68] the military element of which became known as Operation SALAMANCA and included operations against militia groups.

124. Major General Richard Shirreff, GOC MND(SE) from July 2006 until January 2007, anticipated that during Op SALAMANCA there would be "a concerted and sustained effort by Police Training Teams"[69] to "turn those police stations capable of improvement into police stations that are capable of providing basic security in their local areas". His aim was "to cull the unredeemable and rehabilitate the 'just about' salvageable".

125. In September, as set out in Section 9.8, the scope of Op SALAMANCA was constrained. It later became known as Operation SINBAD.

126. While most reports from theatre indicated that Op SINBAD had progressed well, it does not appear to have created the significant development in the Iraqi Army's capability that had been desired. On 27 October, Mr Blair was informed that the Iraqi Army had performed well in some areas but it still lacked maturity.

127. Operations designed to weed out corrupt officers were only able to achieve limited success because a proper governance structure within the ministries and judicial system was lacking. Operation THYME in December 2006 sought to purge the Serious Crime Unit of corrupt officers, but the DOP(I) was told in January 2007 that, although arrest warrants had been issued for members of the Serious Crime Unit, they had not been actioned. There were signs that those members of the Serious Crime Unit were "continuing to operate".[70]

128. Mr Blair stated that, during his visit to Iraq at the end of 2006, "he had sensed, for the first time, that Iraqi Generals felt that if they were given the right training and equipment they would be able to do the job".[71]

129. On 24 January 2007, Mr Des Browne, the Defence Secretary from May 2006 to October 2008, wrote to Mr Blair to update him on the rationale behind a planned reduction in troops from 7,000 to 4,500-5,000:

> "There is no question of us leaving a vacuum in the city [Basra], as the IA and IPS are already doing patrols and we will remain present in the Provincial Joint Co-ordination Centre and military transition teams. Early evidence from the final stages of Op SINBAD, where the IA are in some areas not just in the lead but doing it by themselves, is that inevitably they enjoy a greater level of consent than we do – but also that they are doing a decent job. They are far from the finished article but after re-posturing our shift towards mentoring and support will ensure they continue to develop."[72]

130. The third iteration of the Better Basra Plan was produced on 2 March 2007. It looked to develop capacity and capability across wider SSR components, such as the judiciary and prison service. It repeated the benchmark that the police would be brought to a "good enough" standard to transition to Provincial Iraqi Control (PIC). It also announced that over the next six months, the UK would be deploying military transition teams (MiTTs) within the 10th Division of the Iraqi Army (see Box, 'MiTTs', below).

131. In June, Major General Jonathan Shaw, GOC MND(SE) from January 2007 to August 2007, stated that he was not convinced that the ISF was ready for transition. That was in the light of the continuing decline in security. The US and parts of the Iraqi Government had serious concerns over the ability of the ISF in Basra to cope with the security situation.

132. Concerns continued to be raised about the security situation in MND(SE) and that the ISF would not be able to maintain security alone. Mr Dominic Asquith, British Ambassador to Iraq, reported in July that Basrawis had expressed the view to the visiting House of Commons Defence Committee that "a British withdrawal would 'be followed by chaos sweeping the province like a hurricane'".[73]

133. On 8 October 2007, Mr Gordon Brown, who had become Prime Minister in June, announced plans for a significant troop drawdown over the next 12 months. He described the need for two remaining phases:

"In the first, the British forces that remain in Iraq will have the following tasks: training and mentoring the Iraqi Army and police force; securing supply routes and policing the Iran-Iraq border; and the ability to come to the assistance of the Iraqi Security Forces when called upon. Then in the spring of next year – and guided as always by the advice of our military commanders – we plan to move to a second stage of overwatch where the coalition would maintain a more limited re-intervention capacity and where the main focus will be on training and mentoring."[74]

134. On 9 October, Lieutenant General Sir Nicholas Houghton, Chief of Joint Operations, briefed the Chiefs of Staff that the plan for the Iraqi 14th Division[75] would see initial operating capability by December 2007, with training complete by June 2008.

[75] The 10th Division was the Iraqi Army division in MND(SE) which had been trained by UK personnel. It was given an additional brigade in June 2007 to create a new Division: 14th Division, which would assume responsibility for Basra while 10th Division would be responsible for the rest of the South-East, across Muthanna, Dhi Qar and Maysan provinces.

135. Basra transitioned to Provincial Iraqi Control on 16 December 2007. Maj Gen Binns told the Inquiry that the ISF "were well trained, as individuals, but their leadership was not experienced, they were capable of conducting tactical, low-level operations, but their ability to conduct manoeuvre, to sustain themselves logistically, was a challenge to them".[76] The police were "a mixed bag".

136. Reports on the ISF's capability did not change materially in the period leading up to the UK's withdrawal. There remained concern over their ability and willingness to maintain security in the South. When Mr Brown and Mr Browne had breakfast with the Chiefs of Staff on 6 March 2008, the Chiefs told them that "there was quality in the ISF but it was not broadening as rapidly as hoped, so training and mentoring of 14Div remained a vital job".[77]

137. On 2 April, a junior official in PJHQ wrote to Mr Browne, advising him that MND(SE) was intending to embed MiTTs within 14th Division to strengthen some of the key vulnerabilities that had been demonstrated during the recent operation, Operation Charge of the Knights. That decision is addressed in the Box below. The operation and its impact are described in Section 9.8.

MiTTs

The concept of military transition teams (MiTTs), in which US military personnel were embedded within Iraqi fighting units, was first put forward by the US in early 2005. It was seen as a successful tactic, and had been used by the UK in Afghanistan.

Although the UK deployed MiTTs to work with 10th Division during the summer of 2007, it did not adopt the same approach for 14th Division until April 2008, choosing instead to focus on leadership and embedding UK personnel at brigade and divisional level.

The different approaches taken by the UK and the US between 2005 and 2007 again demonstrated the lack of coherence across the SSR effort. It also created tensions with the US who believed that the UK had not adopted the same approach because of an aversion to casualties.

138. By mid-April, confidence in the IPS was so low that Major General Barney White-Spunner, GOC MND(SE) from February 2008 to May 2008, warned that there were discussions in Multi-National Corps-Iraq (MNC-I) and the Iraqi Government over whether to disband the Basra police entirely and start again.

139. On 14 May, the JIC stated that public confidence in the ISF had grown but the same concerns remained about how it would fare against Jaysh al-Mahdi (JAM) resistance.

[76] Public hearing, 15 January 2010, page 25-26.
[77] Letter Fletcher to Rimmer, 6 March 2008, 'Prime Minister's Breakfast with Chiefs of Staff, 6 March'.

140. Mr John Hutton, the Defence Secretary, wrote to Mr Brown after he visited Iraq in October:

> "The Iraqi Security Forces (ISF), the Army in particular, are looking confident and capable. Their show of force in the areas which I visited, where they took the lead in providing my security, was genuinely impressive. There is no doubt that Basra itself has been transformed and the ISF now have complete freedom of movement throughout the city. While they do not yet have all the capabilities that we would like to see in a fully-formed Division, and there is important work still to do, we will soon have reached the point where we can say with confidence that we have fulfilled our training mission for 14 Division …"[78]

141. On 27 March 2009, a junior official informed Mr Brown that 14th Division was considered to be effective and that all UK mentors and trainers had been withdrawn.

Security Sector Reform strategy

142. Between 2003 and 2009, there was no coherent US/UK strategy for SSR in Iraq.

143. In 2003, the UK expected the production of an SSR strategy to be led by the US and, when it was clear that one did not exist, was unable to exert the necessary influence on the CPA in Baghdad to ensure that one was developed.

144. As a consequence, instead of working within an SSR framework that was understood and agreed between international partners, the UK developed its own SSR policies and plans for MND(SE) without a clear understanding of how they contributed to – or whether they were fully consistent with – the SSR approach across Iraq.

145. Without a coherent US/UK strategy for SSR, the UK was unable to fully understand its role and how or whether its plans contributed to the overall rebuilding of Iraq's security sector. It was unclear what success looked like and therefore how to measure it.

146. The development of effective Iraqi Security Forces, which could take the lead on security very rapidly, became a key element of the UK's "exit strategy" for Iraq. In the absence of a clearly defined end state, and driven by the desire to reduce UK troop levels, the focus of SSR work became the quantity of officers trained, not their quality. There were numerous warning signs that that was a flawed approach, including reports directly from those on the ground and JIC Assessments. But there was a reluctance to pause and consider what was required to deliver the quality needed.

147. After June 2004, it became even more challenging to reach consensus on a strategy for SSR with the establishment of the Interim Iraqi Government, another party that was expected to take the lead on developing a national SSR strategy. That did not happen.

[78] Letter Hutton to Brown, 23 October 2008, [untitled].

148. Underlying problems with SSR started to be more clearly visible: the simple metrics used to gauge success during the CPA era had obscured the actual number of trained police officers; the integrity of many police officers was in doubt; and the Iraqi ministries responsible for the ISF were dysfunctional. These issues had not been gripped because the Coalition had focused too simply on the number of officers.

149. Sir Ronnie Flanagan's review in November 2005 appears to be the last serious attempt to argue that there should be a single, coherent policy on SSR in Iraq. Although Sir Ronnie's final report in January 2006 stated that a broad strategic plan was being prepared in conjunction with the Interim Iraqi Government, subsequent SSR strategy remained largely incoherent.

150. Sir Ronnie's final report came at a crucial time. The December 2005 Parliamentary election signalled a shift to greater Iraqi political independence. In January 2006 the UK Cabinet approved the deployment of UK troops to Helmand province in Afghanistan. The UK's SSR objective in Iraq became almost exclusively to demonstrate that the conditions for withdrawal were met. The requirement for a coherent SSR strategy which would establish viable long-term Iraqi Security Forces was set aside.

Measuring success

151. After six years in Iraq, it was difficult to judge what the UK had achieved in the field of SSR. While the number of police appeared to have increased and the Iraqi Army's confidence had undoubtedly grown, without a clearly defined end state for either there was not an appropriate benchmark by which the UK could measure whether it had achieved what it set out to do.

152. The UK knew that the capability of the ISF was critical to withdrawal but did not design an effective way by which it could measure that capability. Judgements were based mainly on reports from theatre – the authors of which were also without a formal means of measuring the ISF's capability.

153. Focusing on the number of trained officers was a problem in Iraq because it was too simplistic. It hid many of the complexities that sat behind and skewed the numbers. The UK was unable to adjust that approach in Iraq because, up to 2006 (after which point its ambitions for SSR changed), it never truly understood what measurements would indicate whether the ISF was capable of maintaining security in Iraq.

154. After 2006, "good enough" for Iraq informally became the benchmark. It was never clear exactly what that meant. This loose benchmark was used as a justification for continuing to plan for withdrawal in the face of contradictory evidence.

155. In 2009, the fragility of the situation in Basra, which had been the focus of UK effort in MND(SE), was clear. Threats to its security remained. The ISF continued to be reliant on support from Multi-National Forces to address weaknesses in leadership and tactical support. If the capabilities of the ISF had been good enough, it seems unlikely that the US would have embarked on the action that it did – to deploy its own forces to Basra when the UK withdrew, so as to secure the border and protect supply lines. The US and the UK appear to have had different definitions of what “good enough” meant.

Lessons

156. In Section 6.5, the Inquiry states that better planning and preparation for a post-Saddam Hussein Iraq would not necessarily have prevented the events that unfolded in Iraq between 2003 and 2009. It would not have been possible for the UK to prepare for every eventuality. However, better plans and preparation could have mitigated some of the risks to which the UK and Iraq were exposed between 2003 and 2009 and increased the likelihood of achieving the outcomes desired by the UK and the Iraqi people.

157. The lessons identified by the Inquiry with regards to planning and preparation for post-conflict operations are described in Section 10.4. Those lessons, which focus on the essential tasks that should be undertaken, also apply to SSR planning.

158. An SSR strategy should define the functions of different elements of the relevant security sector and the structures needed to perform those functions. Considering those questions should drive a robust debate about how security requirements might change over time.

159. An understanding of the many different models that exist internationally for internal security, policing and criminal justice is essential. But those models cannot be considered in isolation because what works in one country will not necessarily work in another which may have very different traditions. It is therefore critical for the SSR strategy to take full account of the history, culture and inherited practices of the country or region in question. The strategy also needs to be informed by the views and aspirations of the local population.

160. A strategy should set out the desired operating standard for each function and state how that differs, if at all, from what exists. In doing so, the strategy should specify where capacity needs to be developed and inform a serious assessment of how the material resources available could best be deployed.

161. It is essential that the UK has an appropriate way to measure the success of any SSR plan. If a clear strategy is in place and has taken account of the views of the local population, the indicators of that success should be obvious. It should rarely concentrate on a one-dimensional set of numbers but instead be a more qualitative and rounded assessment.

Introduction

1. This Section addresses the discussions within the UK Government between September 2000 and September 2001 on the UK's Iraq strategy, in the light of questions over the sustainability of the existing policy of containing Iraq, the election of a new US Administration and concerns over the legal basis for the No-Fly Zones (NFZs).

2. The Section follows on from Section 1.1, which addresses the UK's Iraq strategy between 1990 and September 2000, and is followed by Section 3.1, which addresses the development of the UK's Iraq strategy from September 2001. Section 3.1 also summarises UK policy and thinking in September 2001.

Before September 2000

3. Iraq's failure to comply fully with UN Security Council resolutions over a period of 10 years, or with international treaties to prevent the proliferation of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons, was seen as a challenge to international order, the authority of the UN and the rule of law.

4. On the basis of its past behaviour, and the evidence found by UN and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) inspectors between 1991 and 1998, it was widely assumed that, although the inspections had been successful in dismantling and containing Iraq's capabilities, Saddam Hussein's regime had the intent and much of the knowledge to develop ballistic missiles and weapons of mass destruction if it had the opportunity to do so.

5. In addition, the UK Government and some others believed that, given the opportunity, Saddam Hussein aspired to exercise regional power through the threat or use of force, and would not be constrained by international law or decisions of the Security Council.

6. A policy of containing Iraq initially designed to meet short-term needs had been extended for over a decade. Sanctions were hurting the population of Iraq without having a significant effect on Saddam Hussein's regime. The Security Council was divided about the benefit of maintaining sanctions and the way ahead, and there were doubts about how long the existing policy could be sustained. Iraq was confident in continuing to resist the return of inspectors. Internal opposition had been suppressed and exile organisations had limited support. The strains within the international community were clear.

7. The Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction, the Butler Report, concluded in July 2004 that there was a "progressive reduction" in the Joint Intelligence Committee's (JIC's) estimates of Iraq's capabilities in the period to 1994/1995 but "growing suspicions and concerns" between 1995 and 1998.[1] Those suspicions and concerns were “exacerbated and reinforced by Iraqi prevarication, concealment and deception”. The Butler Review detected “signs that this context led to the JIC making its estimates of Iraqi capabilities on an over-cautious or worst case basis (not always declared as such)”.

8. The Butler Report concluded that the JIC Assessments would have left the impression in the minds of readers “of suspicion and concern about Iraq’s break-out capability” coupled with “possible possession” of chemical and biological agent stockpiles in breach of Iraq’s obligations and “concern about the ability of Iraq to regenerate a small number of ballistic missiles”.

9. The UK’s assessment of Iraq’s continued possession of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) in defiance of the obligations imposed by the UN is set out in Sections 4.1 to 4.3. Those Sections also address the UK’s wider concerns about proliferation. The Butler Report is addressed in Section 4.4.

10. The framework in which the UK, and other states, viewed Iraq in 2000 was determined by their experience since 1990. That conditioned their positions and behaviour and provided the background to the UK review of policy in autumn 2000, which is the starting point of the Inquiry’s considerations.

The erosion of the sanctions regime

In his statement for the Inquiry, Sir Jeremy Greenstock, the UK Permanent Representative to the UN in New York from July 1998 to July 2003, wrote:

> “In 2000, little new work was done on Iraq, with the Security Council largely exhausted with the subject … Sanctions continued, but the [sanctions] regime remained vulnerable to Iraqi non-co-operation and deceit and the feeling that sanctions were gradually unravelling increasingly took hold internationally.”[2]

A number of reasons for the erosion of sanctions were offered to the Inquiry, including the lack of consensus within the Security Council, the loss of international public support and a decline in the willingness of many nations to enforce sanctions.

Sir Jeremy told the Inquiry:

> “Of all the issues that I dealt with in the Security Council, Iraq produced the greatest divisions among the Permanent Five[3]…
> “The United States was at one end of the spectrum in regarding Iraq as a threat and as regarding the United Nations as unable to deal with the threat in a way which was required.

[2] Statement, 20 November 2009, page 2.
[3] The five Permanent Members of the UN Security Council – China, France, Russia, the UK and the US.

> "The United Kingdom was sympathetic to that view, but wanted to see the United Nations operating successfully on Iraq because we regarded it as a collective problem. The French, Russians and Chinese had all abstained on [resolution] 1284, and were therefore not particularly on the side of just straight containment of Iraq, because they also wanted to see progress towards the end of sanctions.
> "The other members of the Security Council were mainly of that view, that they did not see that the downsides of sanctions, as far as the humanitarian effects on the Iraqi people were concerned, were worth the degree of containment which they [sanctions] provided for an Iraq, the threat from which was not fully proven, in their view, in terms either of military capability or in terms of possession of weapons of mass destruction.
> "I don't think there was a single member of the Security Council who believed that Iraq was trying honestly and honourably to meet Security Council conditions. I don't think there was a single member of [the] Security Council, throughout my period there, who supported Saddam Hussein or Iraq. I don't think there was a single member of the Security Council who believed that Iraq was innocent, was not plotting to develop military capability, was not defying United Nations, was not cheating on sanctions but … [there was a] spectrum of views about how intensely that was a problem and about how it should be dealt with."[4]

Mr Geoff Hoon, FCO Minister of State responsible for the Middle East from May 1999 (and the Defence Secretary from October 1999), told the Inquiry that public leaders in the Middle East:

> "… blamed us for … starving the Iraqi people, for depriving them of medical supplies … sanctions were failing … they were not delivering the benefit that we anticipated politically and … worse than that, we were getting the blame for things that were actually Saddam's responsibility."[5]

Sir William Patey, Head of the FCO's Middle East Department from 1999 to March 2002, told the Inquiry that Saddam Hussein had been "very good" at manipulating the sanctions regime, to create sympathy within the Arab world and to preserve his own regime.[6]

Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary from 2001 to 2006, told the Inquiry that, without weapons inspectors on the ground in Iraq and "with a collapse in international will to enforce, or even merely to sustain, a sanctions regime, 'containing' the Iraqi regime became a challenge".[7]

The Inquiry asked Sir William Patey why it appeared that the countries neighbouring Iraq were becoming less concerned about the threat from Iraq and more willing to allow trade to carry on in contravention of the sanctions regime.[8] Sir William told the Inquiry that those countries' attitudes to Iraq varied:

> "… the concern was greater in Kuwait and Saudi Arabia than it was in Syria and Turkey, and Jordan had a rather special relationship with Iraq, a dependency relationship, it was very worried about its economy and being cut off. So there were a complex set of relationships.
> "I think I would describe the region as, if they had had faith in the policy, they would have supported it more, but if it was going to fail, they didn't want to be on the wrong side of Saddam … I would say they were hedging their bets … not that … they were unaware of the threat."

Sir William also told the Inquiry that the complexity of the sanctions regime itself, including the Oil-for-Food (OFF) programme, meant that Iraq was able to evade the controls.[9]

While sanctions on civilian trade were eroding, the UK assessed that the arms embargo on Iraq remained broadly effective.

Mr Simon Webb, MOD Director General Operational Policy from July 1999 to September 2001, told the Inquiry:

> "… The general impression we had … by the start of 2001 was that the arms embargo was, in general, holding up well … almost all members of the United Nations were abiding by it, which was preventing the Iraqis from acquiring major new weapons systems … but there was some leakage still of parts and components which allowed them [the Iraqi military] to be a bit more effective."[10]

Mr Carne Ross, First Secretary responsible for the Middle East at the UK Permanent Mission to the United Nations in New York (UKMIS New York) from 1997 to 2002, told the Inquiry:

> "While there were serious sanctions breaches, it was not the UK judgement that these permitted significant rearmament, which was our major concern."[11]

Review of the UK's strategy on Iraq, autumn 2000

11. Section 1.1 addresses the UK's review of its strategy on Iraq in May 1999. The review concluded that, despite the difficulties in sustaining the strategy:

> "Containment … remains the only viable option for achieving our policy objectives."[12]

12. In April 2000, the JIC judged that it was likely that Iraq was continuing to develop offensive biological and chemical warfare capabilities (see Section 4.1).[13]

13. In June 2000, as part of a "continuing series of papers addressing Iraqi issues", the JIC assessed Iraq's response to the NFZs.[14]

14. The JIC stated that Iraq continued to challenge coalition patrols of the NFZs. In the preceding year, Iraq had concentrated on using anti-aircraft artillery and highly mobile surface-to-air missile systems and rockets to fire at US and UK aircraft "on most days they flew". The capability of Iraq's air and air-defence forces was "limited" but there was a "continuing, albeit small, risk" of losing an aircraft.

15. The JIC judged that if Saddam Hussein decided to co-operate with UN Security Council resolution (UNSCR) 1284 (1999), he would, in return, seek the abolition of the NFZs.

16. On 22 September, a French civilian aircraft flew from Paris to Baghdad without the UN Sanctions Committee's approval.[15] The Box below addresses the background to and implications of that flight.

17. The FCO set out the Government's position in a telegram to the British Embassy Moscow on 3 October:

> "The legal position on flights is not clear but our position, based on past practice relating to SCRs 661 and 670, is that approval for all flights to Iraq must be sought from the Sanctions Committee and is granted on humanitarian grounds only … EC [European Commission] Regulations prohibit flights from the EU [European Union] which do not have Security Council approval. Others challenge this legal interpretation and claim that the resolutions do not prohibit civilian flights. A number of countries led by France and Russia have recently allowed aircraft to fly to Baghdad without Committee approval (and in the case of France, in clear breach of the EC regulation). We are likely to begin discussion in the P5 soon on a revised Security Council position. It would strengthen our hand in the debate if we could stem the flow of non-approved flights to Iraq. Above all, we must resist a resumption of commercial flights which would be a far greater challenge to our position and to the sanctions regime than the present flurry of non-commercial flights."[16]

Challenges to the ban on air travel

Throughout the 1990s, the UN Sanctions Committee and UN Member States had interpreted the provisions of resolution 670 (1990) to require the Sanctions Committee's approval for all civilian flights to Iraq.

Baghdad International Airport reopened in August 2000.[17]

An FCO official informed the Private Office of Mr Robin Cook, the Foreign Secretary, on 22 September 2000 that a French civilian aircraft had flown from Paris to Baghdad, without the Sanctions Committee's approval.[18] Although the French Mission notified the Committee in advance, in doing so it stated that it was not seeking approval for the flight and it disregarded a request from the chairman of the Committee that the flight should be delayed so that the matter might be considered by Committee members.

The FCO official set out the background:

> "The French and Russians have been pressing for some time for a relaxation on civilian flights to Baghdad, claiming it is time to end the cultural and intellectual isolation of the Iraqi people. They challenge our interpretation of the UNSCRs and claim there are no restrictions on flights which do not carry cargo, although they accept that SCR 661 prohibits the financial arrangements necessary for commercial flights to Iraq."

The media subsequently reported that Russia intended to resume scheduled flights to Baghdad.

The briefing for Mr Cook's meeting with the French Foreign Minister, at Cahors on 9 February 2001, stated that:

> "Since Baghdad International Airport reopened in August 2000, there have been over 150 humanitarian flights into Iraq. Although the Iraq regime has tried to portray these as sanctions-breaking, all but a handful (including one French flight) have received advance approval from the UN Sanctions Committee."[19]

In his statement to the Inquiry, Mr Straw stated that as a result of the lack of action by the UN to censure the flight, Saddam Hussein demanded that other key international partners begin flights into Baghdad, leading to the "total collapse" of the travel ban.[20]

18. With the containment policy under pressure, and in preparation for discussions with a new US Administration, the UK reviewed its policy on Iraq.

19. Mr Tom McKane, Deputy Head of the Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec) in the Cabinet Office from September 1999 to September 2002, described in his statement to the Inquiry how:

> "In Autumn 2000, ahead of the US Presidential election, the Government initiated a stock-take of Iraq policy in order to be ready to engage with a new US Administration, which was expected to undertake its own review, irrespective of who won the election."[21]

20. Sir Peter Ricketts, Chairman of the JIC until September 2001 and subsequently FCO Political Director until July 2003, told the Inquiry that the Government's view at this time was that "containment policy was failing and the rate of failure was accelerating".[22] Sir Peter set out the background to the review:

> "We were very aware … that international support for this structure of sanctions and deterrence was eroding, both in the region and in the Security Council.
> "The net effect of that was that Saddam Hussein in Iraq was feeling pretty comfortable. He had substantial illegal revenues from which he could pursue patronage inside Iraq and continue the efforts to procure materials for his weapons of mass destruction programme. He was busy restoring his standing in the Arab world by very visible support for the Palestinian intifada, which was another major issue that was happening at that time.
> "There were no inspectors in the country to inspect his weapons programme and the US/UK sanctions policy was … unpopular. He was able to put the blame for the suffering of the Iraqi people on the West. So our review of the policy … was really designed to try to regain the initiative …"[23]

21. The Inquiry heard different perspectives on the degree to which the policy of containment was sustainable.

22. Sir John Sawers, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs from January 1999 to September 2001, told the Inquiry:

> "… we [the UK Government] didn't feel that our policy was failing; we felt that the policy of containment we had in place was having a significant effect. That there was still Iraqi activity, especially on chemical and biological elements, that was hard to explain. We couldn't get our UN inspectors in place … But the main concern was the costs of our policy in the wider Arab world and international opinion and the vulnerability we faced in terms of the monitoring of the No-Fly Zones."[24]

23. Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff from 1997 to 2007, told the Inquiry that "Containment was dying in 2001", and that:

> "The reason, in 2001, that people were looking at smart sanctions was because sanctions weren't working. They were hurting the wrong people. People were really suffering in Iraq as a result. Saddam was cheating and getting what he needed out of it [the sanctions regime]. Support for sanctions was disappearing. There was no way we could continue containment on the same basis as we had before."[25]

24. On 29 September, Mr McKane commissioned the FCO to produce a paper which would:

- review progress in implementing the strategy on Iraq agreed by the Defence and Overseas Policy Committee of the Cabinet (DOP) in May 1999;
- weigh up the prospects for sustaining that strategy;
- assess the likely attitudes of the possible new US Administrations; and
- consider the issues that the UK would have to address with the US.[26]

JIC Assessment, 11 October 2000: 'Iraq after Saddam'

On 11 October, at No.10's request, and in the context of (unsubstantiated) reports that Saddam Hussein was seriously ill, the JIC assessed the prospects for Iraq after Saddam's death.[27]

The JIC stated that any new regime was unlikely to be radically different. Strategic considerations and political, economic and commercial interests would produce strong pressure for an early and widespread end to Iraq's isolation. Iraq's political rehabilitation could be rapid, "overwhelming any voices of caution from London, Washington or elsewhere".

25. Mr Alan Goulty, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa, sent a draft discussion paper, entitled 'Iraq: Future Strategy', to Mr McKane on 20 October.[28]

26. The draft paper defined the UK's objectives as "to limit Saddam's ability to re-arm and develop WMD, and to reduce the threat Iraq poses to its neighbours". Full implementation of resolution 1284 remained the best means to achieve that, but the resolution's "shelf life" was limited. Without progress by summer 2001, it was likely to lose credibility. If Iraq was to be persuaded to comply with the resolution, it needed to be convinced that the resolution offered "something new" and that, if it complied, the UN would suspend and eventually lift sanctions.

27. The draft paper stated that the US had been "reluctant to contemplate lifting of sanctions as long as Saddam remains in power" and that there was a "perception that the US is less than wholly committed to implementation of SCR 1284 and the concept of suspension of sanctions, thus undermining the credibility of the approach".

[28] Letter Goulty to McKane, 20 October 2000, 'Iraq', attaching Paper [draft], [undated], 'Iraq: Future Strategy'.

28. The draft paper recommended an early approach to a new US Administration. Both US Presidential candidates had limited their freedom of movement by stressing that they wanted to see sanctions tightened. The UK's "pitch" should be that implementation of resolution 1284 best served US and UK interests, and that the status quo was not sustainable:

> "Support for the UK/US approach is diminishing. Our position in the Security Council is weakening over time … UK/US policy remains deeply unpopular at street level. No matter how big the 'Oil-for-Food' programme may become, it is cumbersome and bureaucratic and will never be able to redress the deterioration of Iraq's infrastructure, the impoverishment of the middle classes and the stifling of normal economic activity. For as long as sanctions remain in place, responsibility for the humanitarian situation will be ascribed to the US and the UK."

29. The draft paper concluded:

> "Containment, but a looser version, remains the best option for achieving our policy objectives towards Iraq. International support is vital if this is to be sustained. SCR 1284 delivered the balanced package envisaged in the May 1999 DOP paper. Need for some tactical adjustments to make policy sustainable in the medium term. Adjustments to the southern NFZ will be a key element. The US need to be convinced that we are better served with UNMOVIC [UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission] inside Iraq with sanctions suspended than by the status quo. Other alternatives remain unattractive at this stage."

30. The draft paper considered other strategic options, including "regime overthrow". It stated that this option "would command no useful international support" and commented:

> "The US support for overthrow allows Iraq to claim with some justification that there is no point in complying with the SCRs as the US will never lift sanctions while Saddam remains in power."

31. The draft paper also set out the difficulties in sustaining the NFZs:

> "Elements both here and in the US Government consider the zones largely ineffective, dangerous and presentationally damaging. Our legal basis is tenuous and we run the risk of a case against us at the ICJ [International Court of Justice]. It is also inconceivable that Iraq will accept UNMOVIC [inspections] without a deal on the NFZs.
> "There are grounds unconnected with implementation of [resolution] 1284 to consider with the US withdrawing from the southern NFZ. But we could not avoid the charge that this was a retreat, unless it could be presented as being in response to a positive gesture from Iraq … Otherwise, we would justify it on the grounds that UNMOVIC would not be able to operate safely and effectively in Iraq if the current level of confrontation was maintained; that we had other means of monitoring the > situation on the ground; and that, in the event of evidence of renewed oppression of the Shia, we would resume patrolling (although, in reality, this is most unlikely). We should maintain enforcement of the northern NFZ as a sign of our continued commitment to the Kurds …

> "Abandoning the SNFZ [southern NFZ] would be unpopular with the Kuwaitis who have come to regard it as vital for their defence. We would need to reassure them that we had other equally effective ways to fulfil our commitment to their defence and the containment of Iraq."

32. Mr Simon Webb, MOD Director General Operational Policy, offered his comments on the draft paper in a letter to Mr McKane on 30 October.[29] He suggested that the Government needed to consider whether the conclusions agreed by DOP in 1999 "remained extant". Mr Webb stated that he was "sceptical about Saddam's susceptibility to inducements" and suggested that:

> "A surer foundation would be to re-assess our strategic objectives for Iraq in a regional context, and then look imaginatively at the options – military but also others – for achieving them."

33. The Cabinet Office chaired a meeting to discuss the draft paper on 31 October.[30] Officials concluded that the UK's policy objectives had not changed but that a new US Administration was likely to review its position, starting from "a blank piece of paper". In preparing to engage with the US, the UK should itself take a fresh look at possible approaches.

34. Officials commissioned a revised paper covering the wider context and the different options, including their military dimensions, setting out their advantages, disadvantages, opportunities and risks. The revised paper would inform discussions with the US.

JIC Assessment, 1 November 2000: 'Iraq: Prospects for Co-operation'

35. On 1 November, with the US Presidential elections imminent, the JIC assessed the prospects for Iraq co-operating with resolution 1284.[31] The JIC had judged in early 2000 that Saddam Hussein was unlikely to co-operate with resolution 1284 and allow inspectors back into Iraq until after those elections.

36. The JIC stated that the elements of resolution 1284 which were favourable to Iraq, such as abolishing the ceiling on approved oil exports and increasing the humanitarian programme, had been implemented. But Iraq continued publicly to reject the resolution and UNMOVIC. Unless UNMOVIC inspectors were allowed into Iraq, there could be no progress towards lifting UN sanctions. The JIC stated that it had little direct intelligence on Saddam Hussein's thinking. It assessed that Saddam Hussein was "content to drag out any decision for as long as possible – at least until after the US election – he wants to see if the West will make a better offer".

37. The JIC stated that Saddam had "good reason to remain intransigent in 2001".

38. The JIC's Key Judgements included:

- Saddam Hussein felt "little pressure to negotiate", because the proceeds of oil smuggling and illegal trade had "increased significantly this year" and more countries were "increasing diplomatic contacts and trade".
- Saddam Hussein still wanted "UN sanctions lifted in due course, especially to reverse the decline in Iraq's military capability".
- A message from Mr Cook on 1 September to his Arab counterparts, which reminded them that if inspectors were allowed into Iraq sanctions could be suspended within six months, had been interpreted by Iraqi and other officials, and the UN Secretary General, "as a potential precursor to the UK offering fresh ideas which could be put to the US after the Presidential election. Even if this came to nought, Saddam would hope to see a gap open up between Washington and London."
- Saddam Hussein would "only contemplate co-operation with [resolution] 1284, and the return of inspectors to Iraq, if it could be portrayed as a victory". He would not agree to co-operate unless:
  - there was a "UN-agreed timetable for the lifting of sanctions. Saddam suspects that the US would not agree to sanctions lift while he remained in power";
  - he was "able to negotiate with the UN in advance to weaken the inspection provisions. His ambitions to rebuild Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programmes makes him hostile to intrusive inspections or any other constraints likely to be effective."
- Before accepting resolution 1284, Saddam Hussein would "try to obtain the abolition of the No-Fly Zones. He is also likely to demand that the US should abandon its stated aim to topple the Iraqi Government."

39. Mr Blair told Parliament on 1 November:

> "We believe that the sanctions regime has effectively contained Saddam Hussein in the last 10 years. During this time he has not attacked his neighbours, nor used chemical weapons against his own people."[32]

40. The US Presidential election was held on 7 November. The result was not declared until 12 December, after a recount in Florida.

[32] House of Commons, Official Report, 1 November 2000, column 511W.

41. Mr Goulty sent a revised paper, entitled 'Iraq: Options Paper', to Mr McKane on 15 November.[33]

42. The paper stated that sanctions were "fraying at the edges". Since the breach of the embargo on civilian flights on 22 September, over 40 civilian flights had landed in Baghdad "signalling to some the end of Saddam's isolation". Saddam Hussein's income from "sanctions busting" was "an all-time high" of around US$1.5bn a year. Saddam believed that the situation was developing in his favour and was under no immediate pressure to resume co-operation with the UN.

43. The paper considered the advantages and disadvantages of seven policy options:

- regime overthrow by supporting external and internal Iraqi opposition groups;
- "Hard" containment;
- continuing with the present policy;
- "Soft" containment (a range of possibilities such as suspending sanctions and abandoning the southern NFZ);
- lifting sanctions (except those relating to arms and WMD);
- lifting sanctions plus regime overthrow by supporting external and internal Iraqi opposition groups; and
- "Military action/lift sanctions"; the US and UK would conduct a bombing campaign, "declare that this has achieved our disarmament objectives", then lift sanctions.

44. Mr Goulty advised that the paper contained no conclusions, given its primary purpose of providing background for discussions with the US.

45. The Cabinet Office chaired a meeting to discuss the revised paper.[34] Summarising the main points of the discussion in a letter to Mr Goulty, Mr McKane stated that, with regard to Iraqi WMD:

> "Our current objective is to eliminate Saddam's existing capabilities, and constrain his ability to reconstitute them. Although this appears anomalous in the context of our approach to other proliferators in the region, Iraq merits special treatment both because of its proven willingness to use WMD, and because of the requirement that the UN has placed upon it. This is the answer to the accusation of double standards.

> "If UNMOVIC ever gets back into Iraq, that will not be the end of the story. If UNMOVIC does its job properly, Iraq will presumably try to obstruct it and sooner or later there will be an UNSCOM-style [UN Special Commission] confrontation. Unless we want to leave Saddam's finger on the trigger, we should not regard UNMOVIC as a long-term solution."

[34] Letter McKane to Goulty, 20 November 2000, 'Iraq: Future Strategy'.

46. Mr McKane also reported that the term "overthrow" was being interpreted in different ways. The "more muscular variants" appeared impractical. At the other end of the spectrum could be a "more rhetorical approach", focusing international attention on the behaviour of Saddam Hussein's regime.

47. Mr McKane set out the actions agreed at the meeting, including:

- the MOD would look at "military alternatives to the NFZs that still meet our fundamental objectives";
- the FCO would prepare briefing for Ministers and senior officials for initial contacts with the new US team. That should not "prescribe options, but stress that we remain shoulder to shoulder with the US in tackling the problem and are willing to discuss with an open mind how best to achieve our objectives"; and
- no further drafts of the options paper were required.

JIC Assessment, 23 November 2000: 'Iraq: Regional Rapprochement'

48. The JIC judged that Iraq's relations with the Arab and Islamic world continued to improve, driven by trade and political factors.

49. On 23 November, at No.10's request, the JIC assessed developments in Iraq's regional relations.[35]

50. The JIC's Key Judgements included:

- Saddam Hussein was "exploiting the crisis in Israel and the Occupied Territories to improve Iraq's relations with the Arab and Islamic world … many Arab leaders now see revived relations with Iraq as a justified response to perceived bias by Washington towards Israel and double standards on UN resolution".
- Most Arab countries now believed that "economic sanctions against Iraq should be lifted. But the Gulf States in particular are afraid of Saddam's ambitions and will want military sanctions to continue while he remains in power."
- Commercial ties between Syria and Iraq had "gathered pace this year. Oil smuggling and illegal trade is likely to increase further." Syria would "remain cautious about forging closer political and military ties with Saddam".
- Jordan and Egypt believed that "Iraq's isolation … is at an end" and both were "likely to increase contacts and trade with Iraq".
- Kuwait would "not revive its relations with Baghdad while Saddam remains in power". With the exception of Kuwait, all Gulf states were "likely to face pressure for a further warming of relations with Baghdad, especially if the crisis in Israel continues …"
- Relations between Iraq and Iran were "unlikely to change dramatically".

[35] JIC Assessment, 23 November 2000, 'Iraq: Regional Rapprochement'.

51. The JIC stated that "Arab rapprochement with Iraq" was "being driven by trade and political factors over which the UK has little or no control". The implication of that rapprochement was that there was less pressure on Iraq to comply with UN resolutions.

52. Mr Blair told officials that his preference was to link a shift on sanctions with the return of inspectors to Iraq, and asked Mr Robin Cook, the Foreign Secretary, for his advice on the approach to adopt with the US.

53. On 24 November, Mr Sawers wrote to Mr Blair advising:

> "We face problems ahead on Iraq. Among the Arabs, only Kuwait sees Saddam as a real threat. Support for economic sanctions is weakening: many Arab countries see it as 'punishment' and think ten years is enough. And Arab perceptions of US and British support for Israel in the Palestinian crisis is accelerating the breakdown of the sanctions regime. We have been looking at the policy options, but there are no easy alternatives."[36]

54. Mr Sawers listed examples of "sanctions fatigue" and stated:

> "Whether it is Bush or Gore, the incoming US Administration will look again at Iraq policy. Their first instinct will be to toughen, not weaken, the US approach and seek Saddam's ouster. But short of invading Iraq, that is unlikely … The US may also choose to view Iraq in the wider proliferation context, thus linking it with Iran, rather than as sui generis."

55. Mr Sawers identified the issues the UK should consider:

> "i. What is our view on continuing economic sanctions?
> ii. Should a shift on sanctions be linked with a return of the inspectors? … But if UNMOVIC ever gets into Iraq, we will be back to the confrontations we faced with UNSCOM, and Saddam's finger will remain on the trigger.
> iii. Should we continue with the No-Fly Zones? … There is a tricky balance here.
> iv. What posture should we adopt on these issues with the incoming American Administration? … I am inclined to raise these as questions, and include other alternatives such as stepping up our efforts to overthrow Saddam. We should go with ideas and concerns, not with a settled, revised policy. That way we can take the Americans through the pros and cons of all the options."

56. Mr Sawers continued:

> "My own view is that we ought to use the arrival of a new Administration to put Iraq policy on a more sustainable footing. We do not want Saddam to develop WMD or threaten his neighbours. But nor do we want sanctions to just erode away, or allow Saddam to trigger recurring crises over the next five years. That argues for scaling back to targeted sanctions, while suspending broader economic sanctions; keeping control of oil revenues; and finding a way out of patrolling the southern NFZ."

---

57. Mr Sawers also sent Mr Blair the JIC Assessment on developments in Iraq's regional relations. Mr Sawers described it as providing "useful background" on how events were "combining to ease the pressure on Iraq and make it more difficult for us".

58. Sir John Sawers told the Inquiry:

"It wasn't absolutely clear whether UNMOVIC's return to Iraq was desirable because it could have provoked another confrontation … there wasn't any great confidence that UNMOVIC would be any more successful than UNSCOM had been.

"There was no change in Iraqi attitudes, there was no readiness, really, on the Iraqi side to co-operate with the United Nations and we didn't think that we could force Saddam through military action to accept an inspections regime."[37]

59. Mr Blair commented on Mr Sawers' minute:

"My firm view is option (ii) [linking a shift on sanctions with the return of inspectors]. It puts sanctions to rest; gets inspectors back in and even if he [Saddam Hussein] plays around, at least it's obvious. But Iraq policy is going nowhere at present and I am genuinely appalled by the human consequences."[38]

60. Mr McKane responded to Mr Sawers' minute on 27 November, asking if there was "one further policy option", of "dismissing" any thought of moving UNMOVIC into Iraq and instead working to enforce sanctions.[39] On the question of whether a shift on sanctions should be linked with the return of inspectors, Mr McKane commented that an inspection regime would not be a stable, long-term solution but it would help to justify publicly the suspension of sanctions.

61. Mr Sawers recorded Mr Blair's views in a letter to Mr Cook's Principal Private Secretary, Mr Sherard Cowper-Coles, on 27 November.[40] Copies of the letter were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, and Sir Richard Wilson, the Cabinet Secretary, and to Mr McKane.

62. Mr Sawers described Mr Blair as feeling "uncomfortably positioned on Iraq policy at present", and continued:

"The preferred option by far would be to implement SCR 1284, enabling the inspectors to return and sanctions to be suspended. But there does not seem to be much prospect of that happening any time soon. Meanwhile the human consequences of economic sanctions are pretty appalling, which is bad in itself and it gives critics an easy point of attack; and the pressures on Saddam are not that great."

63. Mr Sawers stated that work was under way to review the policy options, in advance of discussions with the new US Administration. Mr Blair would welcome:

"… the Foreign Secretary's views on the approach we should adopt, bearing in mind that the first instinct of a new [US] Administration will be to seek ways to unseat Saddam rather than to accommodate him".

JIC Assessment, 1 December 2000: 'Iraq's Military Capabilities'

On 1 December, at the request of the Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec) and in response to the inter-departmental policy review on Iraq, the JIC assessed Iraq's military capabilities.[41]

The JIC Assessment of Iraq's ballistic missile and WMD capabilities, including whether they constituted a residual threat, is set out in Section 4.1. The JIC Assessment of the threat that Iraq posed to its neighbours is set out below.

The JIC stated that Iraq had lost nearly half its military strength as a result of the Gulf Conflict and the capability of what remains had "declined since 1991". UN sanctions had "successfully prevented the procurement of new weapons systems" and had constrained equipment maintenance and repair.

The JIC's Key Judgements included:

- A "military offensive outside Iraq's borders would be limited by shortfalls in equipment and logistics".
- "While US/UK forces remain deployed in the region and prepared to intervene militarily, an attack on Kuwait is very unlikely. But if the southern No-Fly Zone and no-drive zone became defunct, warning time for an attack would shorten … Should deterrence fail, US/UK forces currently in the region might be insufficient to defeat an Iraqi attack."
- "If US and UK forces were withdrawn from the Gulf, and Saddam perceived that the west was no longer prepared to intervene militarily, he could try to re-take Kuwait. In such circumstances he would succeed, even with his current force levels."
- "To rebuild its Armed Forces, Iraq would need military sanctions lifted. This is unlikely while Saddam remains in power. But if it happened, it would take several years at least before Iraq's capabilities increased to a level which would alter significantly the military balance in the region."

[41] JIC Assessment, 1 December 2000, 'Iraq's Military Capabilities'.

The JIC stated that, while there would be competing demands for resources if sanctions were lifted, "Saddam and any likely successor are likely to give high priority" to "restoring military capability". The JIC continued:

> "It would take comparatively less investment to revive some of Iraq's WMD programmes. Although Saddam is unlikely to use such weapons, their development as a means of coercive diplomacy would give him an additional political tool to use in his attempts to re-establish his regional and international standing."

64. Sir Christopher Meyer, British Ambassador to the US from 1997 to 2003, told the Inquiry that, on 6 December 2000, he met Dr Condoleezza Rice and, separately, Mr Karl Rove to discuss the priorities of the new US Administration.[42] Dr Rice would become President Bush's National Security Advisor and Mr Rove would become one of President Bush's Senior Advisors.

65. Sir Christopher told the Inquiry that nuclear missile defence was at the top of the US list of priorities, with Iraq and the wider Middle East some way down. Sir Christopher described the US position on Iraq as:

> "We need to look at this. Things aren't going well. The policy of sanctions is in tatters, the smuggling, Saddam is getting away with blue murder. We need to do something …"

66. Mr Cook agreed with Mr Blair that full implementation of resolution 1284 remained the UK's best option and suggested that the UK should support efforts to clarify the ambiguities in the resolution concerning the process for lifting sanctions.

67. Mr Cook's Private Secretary wrote to Mr Sawers on 15 December, setting out Mr Cook's views.[43] Mr Cook agreed that full implementation of resolution 1284 remained "the best means of pursuing the UK's policy objectives". It would restore in-country control over Iraq's WMD programmes, "get us off the hook of responsibility for the humanitarian situation", and provide Iraq and the UK with an exit route from sanctions.

68. The "shelf life" of the resolution, however, was limited.

69. If Iraq was to be persuaded to comply with resolution 1284, it was "now clear that this will require the elaboration of a package of measures which is sufficiently attractive to lure the Iraqis in". France had recently proposed that the P5 should begin to clarify the "ambiguities" in resolution 1284, in particular those concerning the process for lifting sanctions. The timing was not ideal (between US Administrations), but a package that had the support of the P5 would be hard for Iraq to ignore. Reaching agreement within the P5 on a package of measures would "require some painful adjustments for ourselves and, even more so, for the Americans".

70. The new US Administration was expected to carry out a full policy review. Mr Cook advised:

> "We need to get in early and be prepared to press them hard. Their first instincts will be to look at tougher measures e.g. tighter sanctions, military action, greater emphasis on regime overthrow. None of these will have any credible support. Our pitch should be to persuade the US of the unattractiveness of these options and then convince them that SCR 1284 best serves our interests."

71. On Mr Blair's concerns over the humanitarian situation, Mr Cook advised:

> "With the 'Oil-for-Food' programme likely to be worth US$16bn this year, the situation on the ground is starting to improve. This has taken some of the sting out of the anti-sanctions campaign. But no matter how big the 'Oil-for-Food' programme may become, it is cumbersome and bureaucratic and relies on Iraqi co-operation. It will never be able to redress the deterioration of Iraq's infrastructure, the impoverishment of the middle classes, and the stifling of normal economic activity."

72. Mr Cook concluded:

> "Containment through implementation of SCR 1284 remains the best option for now. To make this achievable we will need to convince the US that this best serves our objectives and that we should work to agree an implementation package which will unite the P5. The status quo is unsustainable and other options are unattractive."

73. Mr Ross told the Inquiry that the "ambiguities" referred to by Mr Cook related to the final operative paragraphs of resolution 1284, which were "very complicated and … set out a really tortuous route of how the inspectors go back in".[44]

74. Mr Ross commented that, although the UK was "quite happy with that rather tortured route", it wanted P5 unity and "if the Russians and French said they wanted … clarification, then we were prepared to have that discussion".

Initial discussions with the new US Administration

75. According to published US accounts, Iraq was not seen as one of the highest priorities for the incoming Bush Administration.[45]

76. As Section 1.1 describes, a number of senior US politicians had been calling for tougher action on Iraq since 1998. Some of those politicians became senior members of President Bush's team.

77. Sir William Patey, Head of the FCO's Middle East Department from 1999 to March 2002, told the Inquiry that he was aware of "drumbeats" from voices in Washington who were talking about the possibility of regime change and arming Iraqi opposition groups, but that the UK's policy was "to stay away from that end of the spectrum".[46]

78. Mr Webb told the Inquiry that "regime overthrow was … mentioned [by US interlocutors] but it was quite clear that there was no proposition being put in our direction … about regime change".[47]

79. Sir Jeremy Greenstock, the UK Permanent Representative to the UN in New York from 1998 to July 2003, wrote in his statement to the Inquiry:

> "For all the rumbling in the background, Iraq did not appear to be at the top end of the new Administration's list of priorities in those early Bush months."[48]

80. Mr Jonathan Powell and Mr Sawers visited Washington on 14 January, where they met several members of President Bush's team, including Dr Rice.[49]

81. Sir John Sawers told the Inquiry that Dr Rice had been "critical of the Clinton Administration's policy of talking tough but actually acting rather weakly and she included Iraq in that criticism".[50] His impression was of a US Administration which would "take a hard edged approach but would nonetheless want to work with the United Kingdom", and whose main concerns would be domestic:

> "The issues about tax cuts and prescription drugs and social security reform were very much uppermost in the minds at the top of the [US] Administration rather than any specific foreign policy issue, apart from missile defence."

82. President Bush was inaugurated on 20 January.

83. In late January, the FCO's Middle East Department produced a paper which reassessed the UK's "fundamental interests" in relation to Iraq and recommended a new approach to promoting them.[51] The UK's interests included:

- regional stability, including through the non-proliferation of WMD;
- preserving the credibility and authority of the Security Council;
- maintaining the coherence of UK policy, including on human rights, adherence to resolutions and non-proliferation;
- improving the humanitarian and human rights situation in Iraq;
- avoiding a US/UK split; and
- reducing the UK's isolation in the EU.

[50] Public hearing, 10 December 2009, pages 5-6.
[51] Paper FCO, January 2001, 'Iraq: A Fresh Look at UK Interests'.

84. The paper identified the UK's aims for Iraq and the Gulf Region and concluded that a number of them were "unachievable" while Saddam Hussein's regime remained in power.

85. The paper recommended that "Plan A" should be to persuade the US that full implementation of resolution 1284 best served US/UK interests.

86. If Iraq rejected that, the medium-term "Plan B" should be to restrict sanctions to arms, persuade Iraq's neighbours to enforce them more rigorously, end the Oil-for-Food (OFF) programme in "Baghdad-controlled Iraq", increase support to the Iraqi opposition, impose a travel ban and assets freeze on Saddam Hussein and his regime, and pursue the indictment of Saddam Hussein for war crimes. That would be presented as targeting policy more directly at his regime.

87. Sir Jeremy Greenstock called on Mr Cook on 29 January.[52] On Iraq, Mr Cook stated that:

> "… we were at stalemate, and the situation was deteriorating … We had to find a means of sustaining our policy on WMD, but in a way that had a degree of international support and would be adhered to in the region … A more focused form of sanctions was needed."

88. Mr Cook said that he would discuss Iraq with Mr Colin Powell, the new US Secretary of State, during his forthcoming visit to Washington.

89. Sir Jeremy responded that the UK should try to get the US to focus on stopping oil smuggling from Iraq. Mr Cook agreed.

90. Mr Cook visited Washington from 5 to 7 February.

91. In a briefing telegram for the visit, officials at the British Embassy Washington advised that the new US Administration believed the current position on Iraq was "unsustainable".[53] It wanted a "new approach to more effective containment which can be sold in the region as enlightened and at home as tougher".

92. The Embassy also advised that Iraq had been "at the top of [Secretary] Powell's pile"; the State Department, Department of Defense and the White House had been working intensively to put up advice on policy options.[54] Mr Donald Rumsfeld, the US Defense Secretary, and his Deputy, Mr Paul Wolfowitz, would incline towards more vigorous action to topple Saddam Hussein.

[54] Telegram 117 Washington to FCO London, 1 February 2001, 'Your Visit to Washington: Iraq'.

93. The Embassy highlighted the scale of US scepticism about the effectiveness of weapons inspectors and the concept of "narrower and deeper" sanctions.[55] Any agreement on easing sanctions would need to retain essential controls. The UK should persuade the US to agree to elaborate those controls "now, in a package that will bring the P5 back on board, and thus increase pressure on Saddam". Simultaneously cracking down on smuggling would "tighten sanctions and squeeze the regime". That would "require a lot of political will and creative solutions", but would show that the UK was serious.

94. The FCO's briefing for Mr Cook stated that the objectives of the visit were:

- "to reach broad UK/US agreement on a new joint approach and agree to early talks at official level before an inter-agency approach has been agreed in Washington"; and
- "to underline the importance of reaching P5 agreement on Iraq and broadening regional support for UK/US policy."[56]

95. The FCO advised:

> "International support for our approach is fading fast. Divisions in the P5 and the collapse of the MEPP [Middle East Peace Process] have made key regional allies more uncomfortable with our current policy. We are increasingly isolated in the EU. We are held responsible for the suffering in Iraq, while memories of Saddam's brutality fade …
> "Until Saddam goes we need to work for sustainable containment, focusing on WMD, through implementation of SCR 1284. This means a mixture of stick and carrot …"

96. On 5 February, Mr Peter Westmacott, FCO Deputy Under Secretary (Wider World), sent Mr Cook a paper on the UK's policy objectives and the emerging US position.[57] Mr Westmacott proposed that the UK's aim should be to reach agreement on a "new, integrated approach" which offered "additional lures to Iraq to comply with [resolution] 1284", but also increased "the cost to the regime of not doing so", while "getting the Security Council back on the moral high ground".

[57] Minute Westmacott to Private Secretary [FCO], 5 February 2001, 'Visit to Washington: Iraq', attaching Paper, 5 February 2001, 'Iraq: Talking to the Americans'.

97. Devising such a package should allow P5 unity to be restored, but was likely to mean persuading the US "that some of their ideas for punishing/over-throwing Saddam will have to be kept in reserve for now".

98. Mr Westmacott offered a number of detailed suggestions for this package, including:

- a new, concerted effort to address oil smuggling;
- elaboration of how controls over oil revenues and imports could be relaxed after the suspension of sanctions;
- narrower and deeper sanctions, for as long as Iraq did not comply with resolution 1284; and
- incorporation of the NFZs into the package "on the basis of regional security needs … as well as humanitarian protection". That would be useful "given the problems at the London end over the maintenance of NFZ aerial patrols".

99. Mr Westmacott stated that such a package would require a new resolution, and commented:

> "But the best chance of getting agreement to a new resolution would lie in retaining [resolution] 1284 as the basis of the revised approach. The package itself nonetheless needs to be crafted in the expectation that Saddam will not comply. So it needs to be forthcoming enough to command P5 support but firm enough to remain relevant in the likely event that the carrots it contains fail to deliver Iraqi compliance."

100. Mr Peter Gooderham, Counsellor in the British Embassy Washington, wrote to Mr Westmacott on 5 February to report on Mr Cook's "briefing supper" in Washington.[58] Mr Cook had told officials that:

> "… [resolution] 1284 was no longer sustainable. It made sense, not least in UNSC-handling terms, to keep it on the table … we should accept that Saddam had no intention of complying with it. We should give up, therefore, the effort to get inspectors back into Iraq, and embark instead on a set of policies which did not depend on Iraqi co-operation for their sustainability."

101. Mr Cook had outlined a new package, comprising:

- targeting sanctions at military and dual-use items: that would mean the US taking a less restrictive approach on contract "holds";
- keeping financial controls in place, but seeking ways of facilitating the reconstruction of Iraqi infrastructure, in particular the oil industry;
- clamping down on smuggling;

---

[58] Letter Gooderham to Westmacott, 5 February 2001, 'Iraq: Policy Review: Foreign Secretary's Visit'.

- spelling out red lines in relation to Iraqi moves against Kuwait or the Kurds;
- setting out a "Contract for the Iraqi People (cf the FRY/Milosevic), offering a vision for Iraq post-Saddam". The activities of the Iraqi opposition should be rolled into that;
- selling the OFF programme more convincingly as a humanitarian programme; and
- dispensing with the southern NFZ patrols.

102. Mr Cook also wanted to confront Secretary Powell on the scale of Iraq's illegal oil trade.

103. In a manuscript comment on Mr Gooderham's letter, Sir John Kerr, FCO Permanent Under Secretary, suggested to Mr Westmacott that the policy outlined by Mr Cook was unlikely to "survive in the cold light of a Washington morning".[59] It seemed a recipe for infuriating allies in the Gulf (due to the proposal to dispense with the southern NFZ patrols) and would mean abandoning hope of P5 unity (because the 'Contract with the Iraqi People' suggested that the target was no longer the suspension of sanctions if Iraq stopped developing WMD, but Saddam Hussein himself). Sir John continued: "I much preferred the policy in your [Mr Westmacott's] note. I wonder if he [Mr Cook] read it?"

104. Sir William Patey told the Inquiry that the 'Contract with the Iraqi People' had been developed in response to the US "drumbeats" for regime change in Iraq, and was:

> "… our way in the Foreign Office of trying to signal that we didn't think Saddam was a good thing and it would be great if he went, but we didn't have an explicit policy for trying get rid of him."[60]

105. Mr Cook and Secretary Powell met on 6 February.[61] The British Embassy Washington reported that they had discussed the need to regain the initiative on Iraq through a radical new approach to secure common objectives and to get the public emphasis back on Iraq's WMD, including by moving from a sanctions debate to an arms control debate and narrowing the definition of dual-use items.

106. Mr Cook suggested working on a 'Contract with the Iraqi People' and that: "In return, we must bring smuggling under control, in particular by bringing the Turkish trade within Oil-for-Food." Mr Cook pointed out that the US would have to "reduce drastically" the number of holds it had placed on Iraqi contracts.

[61] Telegram 126 Washington to FCO London, 7 February 2001, 'Foreign Secretary's Meeting with Colin Powell: Iraq'.

107. Mr Cook stated that re-establishing inspections "should not be a test of the success of our policy, as this would require Saddam's agreement".

108. Mr Cook and Secretary Powell also discussed NFZs and agreed that US and UK "officials should meet very soon". Secretary Powell planned to visit the region at the end of February.

109. In a subsequent meeting with US Vice President Dick Cheney, Mr Cook said that he had agreed with Secretary Powell that the focus should be put back on Saddam Hussein's responsibility for the suffering of the Iraqi people, and his interest in acquiring WMD.[62]

110. Reporting on his visit to Washington to Cabinet on 8 February, Mr Cook stated that the new foreign policy team in the US was "prepared to explore new ideas on Iraq, where they understood the need to regain the moral high ground".[63]

111. In the subsequent discussion, it was pointed out that it was a good time to review policy on Iraq because the UK Government was "losing the propaganda battle".

112. In advance of Mr Blair's meeting with Mr Jacques Chirac, the French President, at the UK/French Summit on 9 February, the FCO advised Mr Sawers that:

> "The French have long argued that the key to enticing Iraq into co-operation and moving forward on sanctions is through 'clarification' of SCR 1284. An important element of this would be elaboration of the post-suspension modalities. The French are keen to revive bilateral talks on this topic which started promisingly 18 months ago but which tailed off as the US election approached and Iraq was put on the back burner."[64]

113. The FCO advised that Mr Blair should take a fairly non-committal line at the Summit.

114. The Inquiry has not seen a record of Mr Blair's discussions with President Chirac at the Summit.

115. The FCO's briefing for Mr Cook's meeting with Mr Hubert Vedrine, the French Foreign Minister, at the Summit stated that Mr Vedrine was openly hostile to sanctions, which he had described as "cruel and ineffective", and that he regarded the NFZs as "useless".[65]

116. In their meeting, Mr Cook encouraged Mr Vedrine to work with the US and the UK on Iraq.[66]

Review of the No-Fly Zones (NFZs)

118. Section 1.1 addresses the legal basis advanced by the UK for the creation and continued operation of the NFZs in northern and southern Iraq, and for the response to Iraqi attacks on aircraft enforcing the NFZs.

119. Operations in the NFZs and the targets which UK aircraft were permitted to attack were regularly reviewed and approved by Ministers.

Response Options (ROs)

The coalition established NFZs in the north and south of Iraq in 1991 and 1992 respectively (see Section 1.1).

With the agreement of Ministers, operational commanders were allowed discretion to respond in self-defence within the parameters of a number of graduated "Response Options" (ROs) defined as:

- RO1 – immediate self-defence. An aircraft in the air responding immediately to an Iraqi threat to it, or to another coalition asset, although not necessarily against the specific system directly causing the threat.
- RO2 – a coalition response against a pre-planned target to a threat during the course of a subsequent patrol on the same day.
- RO3 – a coalition response against a pre-planned target on the next patrolling day.[68]

ROs 1 to 3 were dependent on there being a "triggering threat" in the form of a weapon fired or a radar illumination.

- RO5 – pre-emptive self-defence on the basis of demonstrated Iraqi hostile intent, such as a pre-emptive operation against mobile surface-to-air missile (SAM) assets. RO5 was introduced to counter Iraqi tactics of threatening coalition aircraft and then moving assets before coalition aircraft could respond.

Any proposal to carry out an attack that did not fall within the parameters defined within ROs 1 to 3 and RO5 was classified RO4 and required Ministerial approval.

The agreed rules placed a limit on the number of targets that could be attacked in any single response (six); and on the number of attacks that could be carried out within any seven-day period (four).

From November 2000, the UK Commander was not authorised to commit to an RO attack where civilian casualties were expected.[69] By March 2001, UK forces no longer relied on delegated authority in cases where the risk of collateral damage to civilian buildings was considered higher than "low".[70]

120. Sir Christopher Meyer told the Inquiry that, throughout 2000, concern grew about how long the NFZs could legally be sustained and about how to respond if an aircraft was shot down.[71] Those concerns were greater in the UK than in the US.

JIC Assessment, 13 December 2000: 'Impact of the NFZs on Iraqi Persecution'

121. On 13 December 2000, at the request of Lord Williams of Mostyn, Attorney General from 1999 to June 2001, and the FCO, the JIC assessed the persecution of ethnic and religious communities in Iraq and how it was constrained by the NFZs.[72]

122. The JIC's Key Judgements were:

- Saddam Hussein's regime saw Iraq's Kurds and Shia as a threat and discriminated against them politically and in the allocation of resources. Human rights abuses had extended to the use of military force. "Since 1991, international monitoring and coalition enforcement of the NFZs had constrained but not prevented this persecution".
- In the north, Saddam Hussein wanted to regain full control of the Kurdish Autonomous Zone. Iraq's military forces were positioned to re-take the territory.
- Abolition of the northern NFZ would weaken the US "red line" and have a major impact on Kurdish confidence. "Any resistance [to a military assault by Saddam Hussein] would be put down brutally and scores settled, inducing a refugee crisis comparable to 1996". If the Kurds united to resist Saddam Hussein, a full-scale attack to re-take the north would lead to a "major humanitarian crisis comparable to 1991".
- In the south, Saddam used his security forces "to destroy villages, assassinate Shia clerics and execute suspects and their families".
- If the southern NFZ were withdrawn, Iraqi air power would be used "to enhance operations now conducted by ground forces". Such attacks would give Saddam Hussein more military options and "add to Shia misery". But Saddam did not need to kill or injure more Shia to achieve his current objectives.
- "Wide international support at the creation of the NFZs in 1991-92 has faded, especially since 1998. The NFZs are increasingly seen as an obstacle to progress on Iraq at the UN. Iraqi propaganda is effective in falsifying and exaggerating civilian casualties and collateral damage."

123. The JIC Assessment did not satisfactorily address all Lord Williams' questions.

124. On 21 December, Lord Williams' Private Office wrote to Mr Patey asking for further information and clarification on a number of points relating to the situation in the areas covered by the two NFZs.[73] This was to be in the form of a joint FCO/MOD response "agreed, as appropriate, with the Assessments Staff".

125. On 12 January 2001, in response to the November 2000 commission to look at military alternatives to the NFZ (described earlier in this Section), Mr Webb wrote to Mr McKane advising that:

- The elimination of Saddam Hussein's WMD capabilities could not be achieved without inspections. Air power alone would not be sufficient.
- There might be scope for adjusting the northern NFZ, to limit patrolling to the Kurdish Autonomous Zone only or to rely on patrolling within Turkish air space.
- The picture was "rather different" in the South. The southern NFZ remained justified on humanitarian grounds. More importantly, it was essential to the UK's objective of preventing Saddam Hussein from endangering regional stability by threatening his southern neighbours.[74]

126. On 17 January, Mr McKane chaired a meeting to discuss Iraq.[75] Officials agreed that the MOD should look at "possible options" for the southern NFZ with the US, including reduced coalition patrols and responses and reliance on some form of "active deterrence". Officials also noted that Lord Williams was reviewing the legal justification for the NFZs.

127. Officials agreed that it would be necessary to draw together for Ministers the various threads relating to Iraq, after progress had been made in discussions with the US. A further meeting was envisaged in "a month or so, subject to developments".

128. On 29 January, Mr Patey responded to the Attorney General's request of 21 December 2000 for further information relating to the NFZs.[76] Mr Patey advised that the letter had been agreed with the MOD and the Cabinet Office.

129. Mr Patey advised:

> "Both the UK and US have made it clear to Iraq and publicly that we will take military action if Iraq moves to reconstitute its WMD capability or threaten its neighbours. The US has in addition stated that they would take action if Iraq moved to attack the Kurds. While we have not made the same explicit commitment, any Iraqi attack on the Kurdish area … would be very difficult for the British Government to ignore. Our interests … are likely to argue strongly in favour of a response. This would however depend to a large extent on the circumstances …"

130. The detailed work on whether there were alternative means of achieving UK objectives in the NFZs, which had been undertaken in early 2000 and endorsed by Ministers (see Section 1.1), had concluded that regular patrols of the NFZs:

> "… afforded the most effective means of performing the mission at the lowest risk. Work conducted in the context of the current review exercise has indicated that in relation to the south this remains the case."

131. There might be scope for adjustment in the north but the "full implications" of the options for that would "require further study". Human rights monitors might provide a means to monitor the situation on the ground. Successive resolutions had called on Iraq to allow them entry but Iraq had refused. Mr Patey advised:

> "In the longer term the best guarantee against attacks on the civilian population is a change of regime and the establishment of a democratic government … It is difficult, however, to envisage measures which directly lead to the overthrow of the current regime which would also be consistent with international or domestic law."

132. It was "extremely difficult to verify" Iraqi claims that civilians had been killed or injured as a result of coalition action in either NFZ. The UK could not "make any sensible estimate of the number of people … who have been killed or injured as a result of coalition action in self-defence since January 1999. What we do know is that the vast majority of Iraqi claims are spurious, and that the actual number of civilians who have been affected by coalition action is likely to be very much smaller than Baghdad would have the world believe."

133. There was nothing to alter the JIC Assessment of 13 December 2000. Officials were looking separately at whether there might be a justification for the existence of the southern NFZ in terms of the defence of Kuwait.

134. US proposals for a response to Iraqi military activity against aircraft patrolling the southern NFZ highlighted the urgency of resolving the legal basis for the NFZs.

135. On 30 January, an FCO official invited Mr Cook to agree that the RAF should participate in a US-led attack on five targets north of the 33rd parallel, outside the southern NFZ, and a further target within the southern NFZ.[77] UK aircraft were to attack the target within the NFZ and provide cover for US aircraft involved in the attacks further north. A UK tanker would be used to refuel US aircraft.

136. The official reported the MOD's assessment: improvements to the Iraqi air-defence system (IADS), to provide secure links between early warning radars outside the southern NFZ and missile and anti-aircraft artillery batteries within the NFZ, could

---

[77] Minute FCO [junior official] to PS [FCO], 30 January 2001, 'Iraq: No Fly Zones; Proposed RO 4'.

"in a worst case scenario" reduce the warning of an approaching Iraqi missile to "as little as five or six seconds".

137. Mr Webb told the Inquiry why the proposed attack was necessary.[78] Iraqi surface-to-air missiles and anti-aircraft artillery contesting the NFZs had previously been controlled by radars close to those weapon systems:

> "What they [the Iraqi military] perfected was to move the radars back north of 33 degrees north … up around Baghdad, and then to provide information to the surface-to-air missiles and the anti-aircraft artillery by fibre-optic links …
>
> "What that meant was that there was a risk that the aircraft would find themselves patrolling, and suddenly, instead of being illuminated by a radar close to them that they could identify, something much further back would be controlling a missile which would suddenly come their way.
> "This made the operation of considerably more risk …
> "That target set was very, very carefully considered for, not only the basic legality, but there were also questions about proportionality and risk to civilian casualties …"

138. Lord Williams was briefed on the proposed attack by MOD and FCO officials on 30 January.[79]

139. Later that day, Mr David Brummell, the Legal Secretary to the Law Officers, wrote to Mr Martin Hemmings, the MOD Legal Adviser, recording that Lord Williams was "satisfied that a proportionate attack on the target could … be justified in the context of allied operations in the southern No-Fly Zone".[80] Mr Brummell wrote that Lord Williams noted the:

> "… assurance provided by FCO officials at today's briefing meeting that without the No-Fly Zones, they would be confident that further oppression would result on a scale comparable to that which led to the grave humanitarian crisis and the establishment of the Zones in 1991 and 1992. In the absence of that categorical assurance, the Attorney General would not have felt able to advise as … above. If that assurance no longer holds firm, he declines to approve the target."

140. Mr Patey responded to Mr Brummell the following day, stating:

> "Underlying this assessment there are different shades of view as to the likelihood of a grave humanitarian crisis … We are urgently consulting Ministers on this question."[81]

141. On 1 February, Mr Goulty advised the Private Offices of Mr Cook and Sir John Kerr:

> "The Attorney General has said he approves the target of a proposed US/UK attack north of the southern No-Fly Zone … but only on the basis of a specific assurance from the FCO, which we cannot honestly give. The JIC assessment of 13 December 2000 reflects our views, but the Attorney General regards this as insufficient. Our failure to join in this attack would risk a major disagreement with the US on the eve of the Foreign Secretary's visit to Washington, and increase the threat to our pilots in the SNFZ.
> "The Attorney General's position on the target reflects his long-standing concerns about the continued legality of the SNFZ, and his wish to revisit this question as soon as possible."[82]

142. Emphasising the urgency of the issue, Mr Goulty recommended:

> "… that the Foreign Secretary speak to the Defence Secretary with the aim of a joint approach to the Attorney General to persuade him to approve this target on political and military grounds, without prejudice to his urgent re-examination of the legal basis of the SNFZ. Legal Advisers concur."

143. Mr Goulty also advised that the Cabinet Office had been asked "to convene urgently the official committee on Iraq to review what assessment might properly be given to the Attorney General".

144. Sir John Kerr wrote to Mr Cook's Private Office, endorsing Mr Goulty's proposal and commenting:

> "I think the Dep[artmen]t, and the Legal Advisers, are right, on the wider issue of the legality of the SNFZ, that we cannot allow the Attorney to put in our mouths a 'categorical assurance' … about which we can't honestly be categorical. But he knows what he's doing: his motive is his concern to secure a real review of the basis of the SNFZ. So I agree with the proposal for a Hoon/Cook approach, from which he would get an undertaking that such a review would start forthwith, Hoon would in exchange get the removal of an impossible condition on the AG's authorisation of the target, and the SofS [Secretary of State] would get the removal of the risk that, just as he has his first meeting with [Secretary] Powell, politico-military Washington believes the UK has gone soft on Iraq."

145. Mr Brummell responded to Mr Patey's letter of 31 January on 2 February, stating that Lord Williams had "repeatedly underlined the need" to keep the lawfulness of activities in the NFZs "under review" and had "requested an update of the humanitarian situation in both the north and the south of Iraq".[83]

146. Mr Brummell pointed out that Lord Williams had "not however received … a clear and definitive assessment of whether, in the event UK and US operations in the southern No-Fly Zones were to cease, extreme humanitarian distress would result on a scale comparable to that which led to grave humanitarian crisis and to the establishment of the zones in 1991 and 1992".

147. Mr Brummell concluded:

> "The Attorney is profoundly concerned that, in the absence of a clear and definitive assessment, he is not in a position to take a view as to the legal arguments regarding the continuing operations by UK forces in the No-Fly Zones. He stresses that in these circumstances it is absolutely imperative that he receives at the very earliest opportunity a clear and definitive view, endorsed at the highest level, as to the assessment of the humanitarian consequences that will ensue in the event that such operations cease."

148. Mr Sawers showed Mr Brummell's letter to Mr Blair.[84] In an accompanying note he wrote:

> "Jonathan [Powell] mentioned this to you. Gareth [Lord Williams] is demanding unreasonable assurances, and if he persists will force us to stop enforcing/patrolling the southern NFZ.
> "Geoff [Hoon] will see Gareth on Monday and has asked me or Jonathan to go with him. I have told him you would be furious if we end up having to stop working with the Americans, whilst we and they are reviewing policy, and just before your first meeting with Bush."

149. Mr Sawers wrote in manuscript on Mr Brummell's letter: "Utterly unreasonable letter."[85] Against Mr Brummell's reference to a humanitarian crisis comparable to the scale of 1991 and 1992, Mr Sawers wrote: "Ludicrously high standard."

150. Mr Blair replied: "Unbelievable."[86]

151. Officials from the Cabinet Office, the MOD and the FCO made strenuous efforts in the days immediately following the receipt of Mr Brummell's letter to agree the terms of a joint response. Officials met on 2 and 5 February and draft responses were prepared and circulated.[87]

152. Mr McKane judged that the difficulty in providing the Attorney General with the "clear and definitive assessment" he had requested was sufficiently important to bring to the attention of the Cabinet Secretary.

153. On 2 February, Mr McKane advised Sir Richard Wilson's Private Office that it was proving extremely difficult to provide the Attorney General with the "clear and definitive assessment" that he had requested of the consequences of ceasing operations in the southern NFZ.[88]

154. Mr McKane stated that the consequences of having to cease operations would be "very serious and far reaching, not only for the defence of Kuwait and Saudi Arabia but also the transatlantic relationship".

155. Mr Hoon and Mr Brian Wilson, the newly appointed FCO Minister of State for the Middle East, met Lord Williams on 5 February to discuss the issue.

156. Mr Sawers advised Mr Blair on 7 February:

> "We (including Geoff Hoon, and FCO and MOD officials) were close to satisfying the Attorney's concerns with a letter which showed that the northern and southern NFZs were linked – if we stopped in the South, we would have difficulty persuading Turkey to agree to continued patrols in the North; and that there was an unacceptably high risk of humanitarian crisis (i.e. somewhere in Iraq) if we stopped patrolling the southern NFZ. But Robin [Cook] has refused to endorse the argumentation, and if the link between the two NFZs is removed, as he wishes, we are unlikely to persuade Gareth [Lord Williams]. Our planes would then have to stop patrols [of the southern NFZ] forthwith."[89]

157. A meeting with Mr Cook and Mr Hoon had been arranged for the following day. In the meantime "enforcement action is on hold, and an already once-delayed strike has been put back a second time".

158. The Inquiry has not seen a record of that meeting.

159. Mr McKane wrote to Mr Brummell on 8 February, in response to his letter to Mr Patey of 2 February.[90] Mr McKane advised that the response had been "endorsed by the Foreign and Defence Secretaries", and stated that:

> "Given the demonstrated unpredictability of Saddam Hussein's regime, it is impossible to make definitive judgements capable of being ascribed [with] absolute certainty when considering what might occur in any given hypothetical situation. The recent JIC paper … [of 13 December 2000] reflects this uncertainty. But we can, based on past experience and informed assessment of the nature of that regime, arrive at assessments to which we attach a high degree of confidence."

160. Mr McKane repeated the JIC's Assessment of the risks of withdrawing both the southern and northern NFZs, and added:

> "In the event that UK and US operations in the southern No-Fly Zone were to cease, no one can predict with absolute certainty how Saddam Hussein would act or what the consequences would be for the Shia population. Air power would give Saddam more military options. He used air power, including helicopter gunships, against the Shia population in 1991 and 1992. If the southern No-Fly Zone were lifted, he would do so again. More effective persecution of the Shia would add to their misery, and would risk provoking another cycle of uprising and brutal repression. A grave humanitarian crisis would result …
> "In addition, any judgement on the utility of the southern No-Fly Zone in preventing a humanitarian disaster must take into account the likely impact on our ability to prevent one in the north. We believe that, if UK and US operations in the southern No-Fly Zone were to cease, it would be more difficult to sustain the necessary political support for the northern No-Fly Zone …
> "Our overall judgement remains that there is an unacceptably high risk that, in the event that we cease patrolling the southern No-Fly Zone, extreme humanitarian distress would result on a scale comparable to that which led to grave humanitarian crisis and the establishment of the Zones in 1991 and 1992.
> "This assessment will be kept under review. The judgement it contains could change if alternative arrangements for preventing further humanitarian catastrophe in Iraq emerge from the review of policy … on which we and the US Government are now embarked."

161. Lord Williams asked to see earlier drafts of the letter before responding.[91]

162. The Attorney General concluded that it was still possible on balance to argue that the maintenance of the NFZs was justified, although that argument was now more questionable.

163. Mr Brummell replied to Mr McKane on 12 February, setting out Lord Williams' views.[92] Mr Brummell reiterated a number of points made in previous letters. He also wrote:

---

[91] Letter McKane to Cowper-Coles, 6 February 2001, 'Iraq'.
[92] Letter Brummell to McKane, 12 February 2001, 'Iraq: No Fly Zones (NFZs)'.

"… the Law Officers have previously accepted that a respectable legal argument that force is justified on grounds of overwhelming humanitarian necessity can be made if:

(a) there is convincing evidence, generally accepted by the international community as a whole, of extreme humanitarian distress on a large scale, requiring immediate and urgent relief;

(b) it is objectively clear that there is, in all the circumstances, no practicable alternative to the use of force if lives are to be saved; and

(c) the proposed use of force is both necessary and proportionate to the aim being pursued (i.e. the relief of humanitarian need) and is strictly limited in time and scope to that aim: that is to say, that it is the minimum necessary to achieve that end."

164. Mr Brummell stated that Lord Williams had:

- noted the assessments in the letters from Mr Patey and Mr McKane;
- noted that the assessment in relation to the southern NFZ appeared "weaker than that provided in … January 2000";
- noted the statement in Mr McKane's letter of 8 February, that "if UK and US operations in the No-Fly Zones were to cease, it would be more difficult to sustain the necessary political support for the northern No-Fly Zone", but considered it "questionable whether any weight may be attached to this in considering the legal justification for the southern No-Fly Zone";
- stressed that "every effort must be made to avoid incidental loss of civilian life, injury to civilians and damage to civilian objects". Given the difficulties in assessing casualties, Lord Williams stressed that it was possible for him to take a view on the legal justification of the NFZs only "on the understanding that Ministers are satisfied that every effort is indeed made to avoid civilian casualties"; and
- noted the "significant diminution of international support for the Zones, and indeed in some cases overt criticism … in contrast to the wider consensus in favour of the establishment of the Zones in 1991 and 1992".

165. Mr Brummell continued:

"Having regard to the above points the Attorney considers that it is now more questionable whether a respectable legal argument can be maintained that force is justified on grounds of overwhelming humanitarian necessity. However, on the basis of the assurances set out in your [Mr McKane's] letter of 8 February the Attorney accepts that it is still possible on balance to argue that the maintenance of the No-Fly Zones is justified as a necessary and proportionate use of force to prevent a humanitarian crisis. He stresses that the judgement as to whether such an argument can still be advanced is a very fine one.

> "The Attorney reiterates that such a legal basis for the existence of the Zones cannot justify military action for other, ulterior motives such as action to punish Saddam Hussein, or to enforce other UK or US objectives such as the maintenance of the security of neighbouring states.
> "The Attorney also emphasises that it is vitally important to keep constantly in view the precarious nature of the legal basis for UK and US action in the No-Fly Zones. It was not yet generally accepted that there is a right in international law to prevent or avert a humanitarian catastrophe … there is a considerable body of legal opinion which holds that such a right was not at present clearly established in international law."

166. Mr Brummell stated that Lord Williams "would be grateful for a further update of the situation in the north and south of Iraq, consideration of alternatives to the maintenance of the Zones, and information on any civilian casualties associated with UK and US operations in relation to the Zones", by the end of May 2001.

167. Mr Sawers showed Mr Brummell's letter to Mr Blair, and in a handwritten note which accompanied it he wrote:

> "The Attorney has finally backed down, at least for now … But it is going to be difficult to sustain at least the southern NFZ for much longer – it scarcely meets the criteria."[93]

168. UK and US attacks on targets north of the southern NFZ took place on 16 February. The effect of the attacks is considered later in this Section.

Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush, 23 February 2001

169. On 9 February, the JIC assessed that Iraq was covertly working on long-range missile systems, but would be unable to achieve an operational capability while sanctions remained effective (see Section 4.1).[94]

Cabinet Office advice

170. Following Mr Cook's visit to the US in early February 2001, Mr Sawers wrote to Mr Emyr Jones Parry, FCO Political Director, emphasising the need to have:

> "… an agreed HMG [Her Majesty's Government] approach, approved by the Prime Minister before we go too far down the road of UK/US consultations … we need to have a clear sense of what we want if we are to shape US thinking."[95]

171. There appeared to be three important issues "on which to clear our minds":

- The objective of the policy. Mr Jones Parry's recent talks in Washington had identified "Saddam and weapons of mass destruction as the main issues …

[93] Note (handwritten) Sawers to Prime Minister, [undated], 'Iraq: NFZ'.
[94] JIC Assessment, 9 February 2001, 'Long Range Ballistic Missile Threat'.
[95] Letter Sawers to Jones Parry, 8 February 2001, 'Iraq: UK/US Talks'.

Containing the threat against Iraq's neighbours, seen from here, should be at least as important as the WMD factor. That was the original casus belli …"

- "What do we mean by 'narrower and deeper' sanctions?" Mr Jones Parry's talks appeared to conceive of a two-phase approach, first focusing on enforcing essential sanctions only and then (after the implementation of resolution 1284), the suspension of sanctions. But what sanctions would there be left to suspend if sanctions were narrowed before resolution 1284 was implemented?
- How UNMOVIC inspections fitted into the policy.

172. Mr Sawers stated that the Cabinet Office was in the lead in ensuring that the issues he had raised, and other issues, were "worked through inter-departmentally", and suggested that a paper should be put to Ministers before the end of the month.

173. On 12 February, Mr McKane circulated a draft 'Note by Officials' highlighting the key issues on Iraq that "needed to be settled in the course of the review of Iraq policy".[96]

174. The draft note stated that UK policy objectives and containment strategy remained valid. The UK's main aims were to get the US to accept that:

- Even if we were to conclude that it is preferable not to deploy UNMOVIC, we need to be seen to be working through the UN rather than unilaterally, and with the support of the P5 and the rest of the UNSC [UN Security Council] if possible …
- We need to neutralise the sanctions issue and win back the moral high ground … To achieve this, we need a much more targeted sanctions regime, which does not affect ordinary people. We should move in this direction now, and not wait for Saddam to sign up to UNSCR 1284."

175. Mr Sawers responded to Mr McKane, commenting that the approach set out in the note was:

"… too status-quo oriented. Our shared concern is that the present policy is crumbling, but the only proposal for adjusting it is to restrict the scope of sanctions. The Americans are in the market for something much more radical … to sustain a containment strategy, if necessary for the next eight years."[97]

176. Mr Sawers' view was that Ministers, including Mr Blair, would want to consider a much more radical transformation of Iraqi policy. He suggested focusing on "our three key objectives":

"i) The defence of Kuwait and Iraq's neighbours from Iraqi aggression …

ii) Blocking WMD build-up … either an inspection regime along SCR 1284 lines … or a monitoring regime based outside Iraq …

iii) Humanitarian relief …"

[97] Minute Sawers to McKane, 12 February 2001, 'Iraq'.

177. Such an approach would allow the US and UK "to agree to end purely economic sanctions and to stop patrolling the southern NFZ without the requirement for a quid pro quo from Saddam Hussein". It would give the US and UK (rather than Iraq) sustained control over the policy and address the threat of Iraqi aggression and the plight of the Iraqi people. It was likely to entail some additional costs, possible including the deployment of additional troops to the region.

178. Mr Jon Day, Chief of the Asessments Staff, responded to Mr McKane questioning whether the draft note overstated the Iraqi threat to Kuwait: "The JIC has judged that Iraq would not move against Kuwait while the West maintains substantial forces in the region."[98]

JIC Assessment, 14 February 2001: 'Iraq: Economic Sanctions Eroding'

On 14 February, at the request of the FCO, the JIC provided an updated assessment on the erosion of economic sanctions against Iraq.[99]

The JIC's Key Judgements included:

- Saddam Hussein faced "no economic pressure to accept UNSCR 1284" because he was "successfully undermining the economic sanctions regime".
- Through "abuse of the Oil-for-Food programme and smuggling of oil and other goods", Saddam Hussein would "be able to appropriate in the region of US$1.5bn to US$1.8bn in cash and goods in 2001, slightly up on 2000". There was scope for earning even more "if new surcharges, and commissions [on contracts] became the accepted norm".
- "Iranian interdiction efforts" had "significantly reduced smuggling" in the Gulf but Saddam had "compensated by exploiting land routes".
- The "apparent success of the … border trade agreement" had "encouraged other front-line states to respond to Baghdad's initiatives to improve economic ties". Those states were "in the fore-front of efforts to test the enforceability of the sanction regime".
- "Most countries believe that economic sanctions on Iraq are ineffective, counterproductive and should now be lifted. Without active enforcement, the economic sanctions regime will continue to erode as the front-line states increase their trade links with Iraq and as Saddam's officials devise more ways to capture the revenue from OFF [programme] oil sales."

The JIC assessed that, encouraged by the success of the Iraq/Turkey border agreement, there had been a "significant increase in the erosion of sanctions over the last six months".

The JIC estimated that, in 2001, oil smuggling could generate up to US$650m and abuse of the OFF programme through bribes, surcharges and "commissions" up to US$600m.

[98] Minute Day to McKane, 15 February 2001, 'Iraq'.
[99] JIC Assessment, 14 February 2001, 'Iraq: Economic Sanctions Eroding'.

The Jordan/Iraq trade protocol was worth around US$400m. Smuggling of non-oil goods could produce up to US$150m.

The JIC stated that, since December 2000, OFF programme exports had halved as Baghdad tried to force oil buyers to pay surcharges of up to US$0.5 a barrel into unsupervised accounts. Most oil companies had refused to pay. The surcharge had then been halved and oil sales had increased.

The JIC stated that the Iraqi leadership believed that the new US Administration would be "unable to prevent further deterioration" of the UN embargo.

The JIC stated that there was "broad international consensus to maintain the arms embargo at least as long as he [Saddam Hussein] remains in power". While there had been "some leakage" of air-defence equipment, spares for military equipment and armoured vehicles and dual-use goods, there was "no evidence that major equipment, such as complete weapon systems" had been imported. Saddam Hussein wanted "sanctions lifted because the UN arms embargo has severely limited Iraq's capacity to re-build and re-equip its military".

179. Mr McKane sent a final version of the note to Mr Sawers on 15 February.[100]

180. The note stated that, since the 1991 Gulf Conflict, the UK's policy objectives towards Iraq had been "in the short term to reduce the threat Saddam poses to the region, including by eliminating his WMD programmes; and, in the longer term, to reintegrate a territorially intact Iraq as a law abiding member of the international community". Those objectives remained valid, although the UK "should recognise that we are unlikely to rid Iraq completely of WMD and avoid presenting this as our main aim".

181. The note summarised the key elements of the policy of containment as:

- WMD disarmament, through inspections and monitoring. Since Operation Desert Fox and the withdrawal of UNSCOM, this has been on ice …
- Sanctions, which have become increasingly controversial. There is still widespread support for the arms embargo, and for controls on dual use materials with plausible application to WMD programmes … But there is an increasing sense that economic sanctions are unfair to the Iraqi people, ineffective as a means of pressuring the regime, and indeed counter-productive because Saddam and his cronies benefit disproportionately from the smuggling which undermines the sanctions …
- Controls on Iraq's oil revenues, through the UN escrow account and the Oil-for-Food (OFF) programme. These are important in preventing Saddam from diverting revenue to conventional or WMD re-armament …
- Military containment, including through the No-Fly Zones (NFZs)."

[100] Minute McKane to Sawers, 15 February 2001, 'Iraq', attaching Note Cabinet Office, 15 February 2001, 'Iraq'.

182. On WMD, the note stated that:

> "Neither UNMOVIC nor any other arrangement (including bombing) will provide a guaranteed way of ridding Iraq completely of WMD. A robust UNMOVIC presence in-country would undoubtedly constrain Iraqi WMD activity but not prevent it …
> "… Departments do not agree whether UNMOVIC entry [in]to Iraq would be, on balance, desirable or undesirable."

183. On the outcome of the review of the military need for the NFZs, the note stated that they had become a "target for criticism" and a "double-edged weapon", and that:

> "The humanitarian role for the NFZs remains valid but this is increasingly disputed. The southern NFZ also plays a key role in current contingency plans for the defence of Kuwait, providing tactical intelligence of Iraqi moves and a chance to counter them from the air, buying time to reinforce Kuwait itself … Some are tempted to cease patrolling the NFZs and focus more on other means of deterring Iraq and defending its neighbours. Departments disagree on the implications of this. But the UK and US military assessment is that – if Ministers still wanted to defend Kuwait rather than planning on ejecting an Iraqi force which had succeeded in occupying it – without the southern NFZ, the US and UK collectively would need to station up to three additional armoured brigades in Kuwait, and augment the current land- and sea-based strike capability (i.e. aircraft and cruise missiles)."

184. On the possibility of regime change, the note stated that:

> "Most US officials, to widely varying degrees, believe that their Iraq policy should include the promotion of change in the country's Government …
> "… aggressive rhetoric on this subject tends to be counter-productive in the region, particularly when it cannot be backed up by practical success.
> "But there is a case for including the promotion of change as part of our policy rather than simply assuming an indefinite stalemate. Some movement in this direction is likely to be essential to keep the US on board. We could certainly do more to hold out to the Iraqi people the prospect of a brighter future post-Saddam – a sort of contract with Iraq. This could include a better co-ordinated US/UK information campaign, and more work with the Iraqi opposition in exile (though there is some scepticism over their credibility and usefulness). We could also consider more support for INDICT's campaign[101] to bring Saddam and some of his cronies to justice for war crimes."

---

[101] INDICT was established in 1996 to campaign for the creation of an ad hoc International Criminal Tribunal – similar to those established for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda – to try leading members of Saddam Hussein's regime on charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity, including genocide and torture.

185. The note concluded:

> "Whatever we do, we need to move to 'smarter' (but better enforced) sanctions and recapture the moral high ground. We cannot achieve complete WMD disarmament, but we should aim to contain Iraqi activity: UNMOVIC may be the best way of doing this, but there are downsides to having UNMOVIC in Iraq and, anyway, Saddam is unlikely to agree to their presence on Iraqi territory."

186. Sir John Sawers told the Inquiry that, in relation to regime change:

> "A lot of these ideas were modelled on the successful policy that we had been pursuing in relation to Serbia and President Milosevic. All these elements, a contract with the Serbian people, information flows, indictments of the leader and support for the opposition had brought down President Milosevic a few months earlier, it was successful regime change policy."[102]

187. Mr Cook's Private Office wrote to No.10 on 20 February, advising that Mr Cook agreed with much of the Cabinet Office note of 15 February but that he was "concerned that it reflected military priorities at the expense of broader diplomatic and political issues".[103] In his view, the Iraqi risk to Kuwait if patrolling ceased in the southern NFZ was overstated: "Saddam should be in no doubt that should he move against Kuwait, the US/UK response would be massive." Mr Cook also questioned the suggestion in the note that the alternative to the southern NFZ would be a need to station up to three additional armoured brigades in Kuwait. He believed the UK should strongly discourage the US from more active patrolling and advised that the UK should keep its distance from the US policy of supporting Iraqi opposition groups in exile.

188. Mr Cook concluded: "Ultimately, however robust our military planning, our policy can succeed only if there is a degree of international consensus."

189. Mr Cook also asked to speak to Mr Blair to discuss the line he would take at Camp David.

190. The Inquiry has not seen a record of a conversation between Mr Blair and Mr Cook on Iraq at this time.

No.10's advice

191. Mr Sawers advised Mr Blair on 16 February that there was "one piece of hard policy to discuss with President Bush and Colin Powell": Iraq.[104] The US had started a policy review and wanted to "get a new policy in place in the next month". No decisions were yet needed, but Mr Sawers suggested Mr Blair would want to familiarise himself with the subject as President Bush would ask for his views.

[104] Minute Sawers to Prime Minister, 16 February 2001, 'Iraq: Policy Review'.

192. Mr Sawers set out the main issues and posed a number of questions, including:

- "Do we really want UN inspectors to go back into Iraq while Saddam remains in power?" They might constrain Iraq's WMD programme but their presence would allow Saddam Hussein to provoke regular crises.
- "Could we stop enforcing the southern NFZ?" Military views differed, and it was not just a military judgement.
- "How can we play up the prospects for Iraq once they get rid of Saddam?" Mr Sawers advised that: "A Contract with Iraq (like the one we offered to Serbia) is possible. But I think we have to resist those Americans who want to fund a 1980s Afghanistan-style insurgency, as that will only trigger a humanitarian catastrophe through Iraqi repression."

193. Mr Sawers advised that, in his view, the Security Council should maintain a strong grip on Iraqi oil revenues while moving to substantially lighter sanctions, ease up on the pressure to get inspections back into Iraq, while making it "more explicit" that there would be a military response if Iraq attacked a neighbour or reconstituted its WMD.

Attacks by coalition aircraft north of the southern NFZ, 16 February 2001

194. On 16 February, US and UK aircraft attacked elements of the Iraqi air-defence system. Six targets were engaged; five were north of the boundary of the southern NFZ.

195. The attacks were controversial. Mr Tony Benn, in his capacity as President of Labour Action for Peace, wrote to Mr Blair seeking the recall of Parliament.[105]

196. There was a strong reaction in the Arab world.

Government statements on the 16 February attacks

On 16 February 2001, US and UK aircraft attacked elements of the Iraqi air-defence system. Six targets were engaged; five were north of the boundary of the southern NFZ.

Mr Blair issued a statement on the attacks the following day.[106] He stated that Saddam Hussein was pursuing a policy of "total control" over the people of Iraq, and was "ready to engage in systematic repression", in particular of the Kurds in the north of Iraq and the Shia in the south. The NFZs were part of a wider effort to contain the threat posed by Saddam Hussein. Without them, he would be able to move his troops freely and "repress his own people mercilessly, including by using helicopter gunships as he did in 1991 and 1992". The attack by coalition aircraft had been "a limited operation" with the sole purpose of defending the aircrew patrolling the NFZs.

An MOD press statement on the same day stated that the attacks were conducted in self-defence in response to repeated Iraqi threats to coalition aircraft.[107] Iraqi air defences had been increasing the frequency of their attacks using sophisticated command and control arrangements, posing an increasing threat to coalition aircraft.

Mr Hoon told the House of Commons on 26 February:

> "Since January 1999, Saddam's air defence units have made sustained and concerted efforts to shoot down United Kingdom and United States aircraft. During that period there have been more than 1,200 attempts to target them, using surface-to-air missiles and anti-aircraft artillery. Coalition aircraft are legally authorised to respond to those attacks in self-defence. They do so entirely in accordance with international law, attacking only those military facilities that contribute, as part of the Iraqi integrated air defence system, to the threat to coalition aircraft … Over recent weeks, the Iraqis have significantly increased their efforts, amounting to a qualitative and quantitative increase in the threat. In January, there were more surface-to-air missile attacks than in the whole of 2000. The Iraqis have used new tactics, including the use of radars and command centres located outside the southern zone to cue offensive systems within it. That threat to our Service Personnel is real and present. The operation on the evening of 16 February was therefore planned and carried out against that background. It was a proportionate response in self-defence, taken solely to reduce the risk to our aircrew carrying out routine humanitarian patrols of the southern No-Fly Zone."[108]

197. Mr Sawers advised Mr Blair that as a result of the attacks there was now more attention on Iraq, and that having to defend the NFZs so publicly made it more difficult to move back from them.[109]

198. Mr Sawers proposed developing benchmarks against which to gauge the present policy. Those were:

- Effectiveness, in containing the threat from Iraq against its neighbours; in preventing Saddam building up his WMD; and in preventing a new humanitarian crisis;
- Sustainability, so that we have a policy which we can keep going for as long as Saddam remains in power, if necessary the next six to eight years. That entails having and retaining the support of both the countries of the region and our own public. A new P5 consensus would also help; and
- Control, so that Saddam cannot dictate each step. We have had better control in the last two years than we had before, and we should be careful not to give it up."

199. An internal FCO minute on the 16 February attack, which was produced later that month, stated that the Pentagon's decision to play up the operation was a serious misjudgement that had fuelled international criticism, particularly from key allies such as Turkey and Saudi Arabia:

> "By trailing a full-scale live briefing once the operation was under way, they [the Pentagon] fuelled media hype and speculation that this was a major change in our military posture and, possibly, a repeat of Operation Desert Fox … The Foreign Secretary [Mr Cook] is also concerned that while we have emphasised that the operation had been solely to protect our pilots, President Bush took the line that the primary aim of the attack was to send a message to the Iraqi regime. This is unhelpful from both a presentational and legal point of view."[110]

200. In her memoir, Dr Rice wrote that, although she had been briefed on the operation in advance, she had not appreciated the scale and nature of the attack.[111] The operation had coincided with – and disrupted – President Bush's first meeting with President Vicente Fox of Mexico. Dr Rice wrote that the reaction to the attack in the US media had been positive, including comments that the attacks had "sent a timely signal" to Iraq that the new US Administration would "not shy away from using force to contain any new Iraqi military threat".

201. Mr Webb told the Inquiry:

> "I don't think we [the UK Government] did a very good job of explaining what was going on, in public. We certainly probably didn't help … the new US Administration to do a very good job of explaining it …
> "… what it looked like from the point of view of people … particularly in the region, was that suddenly, we [the US and UK] pushed the campaign north, we were up around Baghdad and it appeared something had happened and was that presaging something they … had been reading about, regime change."[112]

202. Sir William Patey accepted that there was a risk of misinterpretation:

> "I think when the MOD first proposed this operation, there was really the odd frisson in the Foreign Office, not because of its legality … We were worried [that] … the scale of the operation could be misinterpreted. Here we had a new American Administration coming in that at least had a history of a more aggressive stance towards [Iraq] …
> "So I think in the Foreign Office we were worried that this might be misinterpreted as a sort of military assault on Iraq, and that was not the intention."[113]

203. Sir John Sawers told the Inquiry that No.10 had, perhaps, not been as involved as it might have been in discussion of the 16 February attack:

> "This was briefed to the Prime Minister but both we and the White House were a bit surprised … because we weren't fully involved in the discussions of the timing and it happened at short notice on a Friday night … a week or so before the Prime Minister went off to Camp David.
> "The timing was coincidental … It did in many ways serve to underline the difficulty of maintaining the policy on No-Fly Zones."[114]

204. Sir John Sawers agreed with the Inquiry that there had been uproar in the Middle East about the intensity and location of the attacks. He continued:

> "And I think that was very much on Vice President Cheney and President Bush's minds, that there had been a sharp reaction. And in a sense it gave force to the argument that we needed to move to a better targeted policy."

205. Lord Williams of Baglan, a Special Adviser to Mr Cook from 2000 to 2001 (and subsequently to Mr Straw until July 2005), told the Inquiry that Mr Cook had been "concerned that the attack had not merited Ministerial authorisation"; and that he feared "it was the harbinger of a more assertive US stance on Iraq".[115]

Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush at Camp David

206. At his first White House press conference in February 2001, President Bush said that he would "review options as to how to make the sanctions work".[116]

207. On 23 February, before travelling to Camp David, Mr Blair met Vice President Cheney in Washington.[117] Mr Blair argued that the sanctions regime was not perfect, but that it had restrained Saddam Hussein.

208. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that Iraq was not a top priority for his meeting with President Bush at Camp David.[118]

209. Sir Christopher Meyer told the Inquiry that the two foreign policy issues at the top of the agenda were the anti-ballistic missile treaty and nuclear missile defence.[119]

210. Sir John Sawers told the Inquiry that Iraq had been the first subject discussed at Camp David:

> "… not because it was the most important but because Colin Powell … was about to depart for the region and … he [President Bush] wanted to deal with Iraq first so that Colin Powell who was in charge of reviewing policy could be there and take part in discussions. President Bush … was concerned about our policy, that we had sanctions that the regime was evading but which were impacting on Iraqi children. He was concerned about the vulnerability of US pilots monitoring the No-Fly Zones and he wanted to get to a more realistic policy, as he described it. And Colin Powell set out some elements which were very close to our own thinking, that the widespread sanctions should be replaced by controls on weapons, [and] that we should tighten the border monitoring around Iraq with a view to ensuring that those controls we retained were effective. But once we were confident that they were effective … the wider sanctions could be suspended and in due course lifted.

"There was a debate about the No-Fly Zones that he wanted to pursue, and some of the Condoleezza Rice ideas on regime change, i.e. political elements, not military elements, also featured in the discussion, but the fundamental one was to narrow down sanctions to those that were most important.

"… Prime Minister Blair welcomed these thoughts and this approach, agreed that we should retain control on Iraq's oil revenues, but that our broad approach should be to narrow the scope of sanctions to those elements which were really most important to us and at the same time ensure that information about what life would be like – if Saddam were to be removed by the Iraqi people – what would that look like, [was available] …

"So actually that was quite close alignment of thinking between President Bush and Prime Minister Blair. They agreed that the Foreign Ministers should work more closely together … and that they would stay in touch on the development of policy thinking but there was broad common ground established on Iraq at the meeting. There were very few issues of difference at Camp David and that certainly wasn't one of them."[120]

211. Sir John went on to clarify his reference to "controls on weapons":

"… what the Americans were thinking which was in line with our own thinking … was that sanctions should be narrowed to an arms embargo and dual-use goods that could be used in a weapons of mass destruction programme. [Secretary] Powell made clear that he was most concerned about Iraq's activities on chemical and biological weapons and that there was a range of dual use goods here that should be properly controlled and should be subject to sanctions but the wider range of trade sanctions should be removed."[121]

212. The Inquiry asked Sir John whether the policy that developed later, to threaten the use of force to secure entry for UNMOVIC inspection teams, was a "gleam in anybody's eye" at this time. Sir John told the Inquiry:

---

[120] Public hearing, 10 December 2009, pages 13-15.
[121] Public hearing, 10 December 2009, pages 15-16.

> "Not really because there wasn't any great confidence that UNMOVIC would be any more successful than UNSCOM had been … and we didn't think that we could force Saddam through military action to accept an inspections regime."[122]

213. The record of the Camp David meeting, produced by Mr Sawers, stated that the US and UK agreed on the need for a policy on Iraq which was more widely supported in the Middle East region.[123]

214. As a result of the policy of the previous 10 years, Iraq was not as large a threat as it could have been (including to Kuwait); but Saddam Hussein was still pursuing WMD (he had done little on the nuclear side).

215. In Mr Blair's view, the approach should be to:

- refocus sanctions on those items which Saddam Hussein really needed;
- control his money supply but allow him to use it for non-military economic advancement; and
- retain the capacity for military action.

216. Mr Blair stated that we should not say that we were relaxing our policy because sanctions had not worked.

217. Mr Blair concluded that we must improve our public presentation. He suggested that the approach should be presented as a "deal" comprising four elements:

- do the right thing by the Iraqi people, with whom we have no quarrel;
- tighten weapons controls on Saddam Hussein;
- retain financial control on Saddam Hussein; and
- retain our ability to strike.

218. The record also reported a subsequent conversation between Mr Sawers and Dr Rice. Dr Rice had agreed with Mr Sawers' assessment that "we were still a long way from having a new policy on Iraq". Mr Sawers commended the work of INDICT and stated that the UK favoured charging Saddam Hussein and a few others with war crimes; but the indictments should not go too wide as others needed an incentive to move against Saddam Hussein. Mr Sawers also set out Mr Cook's idea of a 'Contract with the Iraqi People', in which there was some interest.

219. On the follow-up to the talks, Mr Sawers suggested:

> "… we need to start doing more detailed work on the sanctions aspects … perhaps we should now produce our own detailed paper on what steps to take … We are likely to receive clear American proposals on the military aspects … We should try to do the work for them on sanctions."

220. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 1 March that the visit had gone well and that a number of issues, including Iraq, had been discussed.[124]

221. Mr Blair gave no detail of the discussion at Camp David in his memoir but he wrote that:

"In the months that followed the visit … I probably thought more about Iraq than he [President Bush] did."[125]

Developing a new policy on Iraq, spring 2001

222. MOD and Cabinet Office officials met on 23 February to probe the assumptions underlying the military assessment of the additional forces required to defend Kuwait in the absence of the southern NFZ.[126]

223. Mr McKane reported the conclusions of the meeting:

"The message for Ministers which comes out of all of this is that, provided US and UK forces remain in theatre, it is unlikely that Saddam would seek to exploit the abolition of the southern No-Fly Zone by attacking Kuwait. However, there remains a slight possibility that Saddam would order an attack and the southern No-Fly Zone plays an important part in our plans for defending Kuwait in such circumstances …

"In judging whether the risk of an attack by Saddam would be so small that we could afford to abolish the southern No-Fly Zone, Ministers would have to keep in mind that, in the absence of the No-Fly Zone, it might be impracticable to maintain our existing air forces in the region."

224. Mr Webb told the Inquiry that the MOD was concerned about the greater cost of alternative methods to protect Kuwait:

"… the No-Fly Zones … had a side benefit of risk reduction. Because we were flying over southern Iraq most of the time, we knew what the military situation was on the ground, and that gave us some time, if there had started to be a build-up of another repeated attack on Kuwait … it would have given us the opportunity to interdict any ground force movements which were the start of an attack on Kuwait and some time to reinforce, but those two things together actually allowed us to be in the rather comfortable position of having a not very expensive military operation … It allowed us to manage without big ground force deployments …" [127]

Defining the new UK policy framework

225. According to published US accounts, on 1 March Secretary Powell was "given the task of devising a plan and strategy to refocus the UN economic sanctions on weapons control" at a meeting of National Security Council "Principals".[128] President Bush also asked for "a better military plan in the event that a pilot was shot down" over Iraq.

The National Security Council and Principals Committee

The US National Security Council (NSC) was established in accordance with the provisions of the National Security Act of 1947 to "advise the President with respect to the integration of domestic, foreign, and military policies relating to the national security so as to enable the military services and the other departments and agencies of the Government to cooperate more effectively in matters involving the national security."[129]

In March 2001, President Bush directed that attendees should include the President, the Vice President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, and the National Security Advisor.[130] The Director of Central Intelligence and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff were required to attend as statutory advisers.

Others who were directed to attend, as required, included: the Chief of Staff to the President; the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy; Counsel to the President; the Attorney General; the Director of the Office of Management and Budget; and the heads and senior officials of other executive departments and agencies.

The NSC Principals Committee was established in 1989 as a forum for consideration of policy issues affecting national security. President Bush directed that its membership should have as regular attendees the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, the Chief of Staff to the President, and the National Security Advisor.

The Chief of Staff and National Security Advisor to the Vice President, the National Security Advisor and the Deputy National Security Advisor were required to attend all meetings of the NSC/PC.

Others who were directed to attend, as required, included: the Director of Central Intelligence; the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; the Attorney General; the Director of the Office of Management and Budget; Counsel to the President; the Secretary of Commerce; the United States Trade Representative; the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy; the Secretary of Agriculture; and the heads and senior officials of other executive departments and agencies.

226. In parallel, the UK began to define a new policy framework for Iraq.

227. The new framework sought to contain more effectively the military threat from Iraq by introducing a revised set of controls focusing on military programmes and oil revenues, while lifting sanctions on civilian trade. It also sought to build a wider consensus for "fundamental change inside Iraq, while respecting Iraq's territorial integrity".

228. The new framework would require a new UN resolution.

229. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry that:

> "The US and the UK … began to revise their policy approach to concentrate on four elements: narrowing and deepening sanctions so that they applied much more directly to weapons systems; making it clear publicly that WMD were the priority and that inspectors needed to return (but with sufficient powers to avoid Iraqi manipulation of them); tightening controls on Iraqi oil revenues; and otherwise ensuring the best possible containment of Iraq through the No-Fly Zones, control of smuggling and eventually the full implementation of SCR 1284."[131]

230. On 7 March, Mr Sawers sent out a revised version of "the proposed new policy framework on Iraq", incorporating comments from the FCO, the MOD and the Cabinet Office.[132] Mr Sawers advised that the paper should be submitted to Mr Cook, Mr Hoon and Mr Blair in advance of discussions between US and UK officials in Washington.

231. Mr Sawers' covering letter highlighted the fact that the paper included a number of "implicit deals":

- sanctions on civilian trade would be ended in return for co-operation from Iraq's neighbours to bring all Iraqi oil revenues under UN control;
- France and Russia would secure more efficient approval procedures, with the Iraqi Government having more freedom to buy civilian goods, in return for agreement on continued UN control of oil revenues;
- civilian flights would be regularised in return for UN inspection of cargoes at the borders;
- assets of "non-regime" Iraqis would be unfrozen and private sector trade permitted in return for targeted sanctions on those around Saddam Hussein;
- a new consensus would be sought on the need for fundamental change inside Iraq, while respecting Iraq's territorial integrity; "pending such change, military measures (including the No-Fly Zones) would have to be at least tolerated"; and
- resolution 1284 would remain part of the policy and "many of the benefits for Iraq would be brought forward without the need for Iraqi compliance".

232. The paper set out a number of "headlines":

> "A revised set of controls would be introduced as soon as possible, focused on Iraq's WMD and military programmes. Purely economic sanctions would cease. In return, Iraq's neighbours would bring an end to illegal oil exports and give practical support to enforce the revised controls. UN control of oil revenues would be retained. SCR 1284 would remain on the table with modest incentives for Iraqi compliance. Meanwhile, UNMOVIC would retain a role outside Iraq.

"The NFZs would continue with patrolling patterns that minimise risk and possibly a smaller area of coverage … We will work for fundamental change in Iraq, and will issue a 'Contract with the Iraqi People'. A renewed effort would be made to secure regional acceptance of this framework."

233. The paper did not repeat the advice in the 15 February version of the paper that departments did not agree on whether UNMOVIC's entry into Iraq would be desirable or undesirable but advised that, if Iraq complied with resolution 1284, UNMOVIC would operate inside Iraq.

234. The paper set out the "New arrangements to be introduced straight away", including:

- "Replace sanctions with controls … to focus on military and dual-use goods, as listed in a revised Controlled Goods List";
- improved border monitoring; and
- Iraqi oil revenues to remain under UN control and illegal trade to be brought within the scheme.

235. Those arrangements would require a new resolution.

236. On "regime change", the paper stated:

"The US and UK would re-make the case against Saddam Hussein. We would issue a Contract with the Iraqi People, setting out our goal of a peaceful law-abiding Iraq, fully reintegrated into the international community, with its people free to live in a society based on the rule of law, respect for human rights and economic freedom, and without threat of repression, torture and arbitrary arrest. The Contract would make clear that the Iraqi regime's record and behaviour made it impossible for Iraq to meet the criteria for rejoining the international community without fundamental change …"

237. On "military measures", the paper stated:

"(i) We would be prepared to reduce the territory covered by the NFZs, e.g. by restricting the Northern NFZ to the Kurdish controlled areas and removing low priority areas from the Southern NFZ;

(ii) Red lines would be set out and if Iraq were in material breach of them, e.g. by reconstituting its military capacity to threaten its neighbours, or developing its WMD/missile capabilities, it would be clear that we would take direct action, at a time of our choosing, once the necessary regional support and legal base were in place."

JIC Assessment, 8 March 2001: 'Impact of Smarter Sanctions'

238. On 8 March, the JIC reviewed existing sanctions on Iraq and assessed the likely impact of "smarter sanctions".[133]

239. The review of existing sanctions covered much the same ground as the February assessment.

240. On smarter sanctions, the JIC's Key Judgements included:

- It was envisaged that smarter sanctions would:
  - focus on military and dual-use items, and allow all civil trade;
  - retain UN control over oil revenue and bring oil smuggling under those controls; and
  - enhance border controls against prohibited trade.
- "By allowing all civil trade, smarter sanctions would give the US and UK the opportunity to shift the political debate away from the humanitarian issue." Iraq argued for "control of revenues as an issue of sovereignty". Saddam Hussein would "still seek to blame sanctions [for humanitarian problems] and popular Arab opinion will remain susceptible to his propaganda. But he will find it harder to persuade Arab governments and the wider international community that smarter sanctions are to blame for the suffering of the Iraqi people."
- "The greatest potential gains in terms of cutting Saddam's illicit revenue would come from curbing oil smuggling." Neighbouring states would be likely to demand compensation for bringing trade under UN control. The income lost could be in excess of US$1bn per year. Unless all routes were closed off, a reduction in oil smuggling via one route was likely to be made up, at least in part, via another.
- Governments in the region were "likely to agree in principle to inspection of border crossings and trade in return for free civil trade". But this would be "hard to sell" and border controls would be difficult to implement effectively.

241. The JIC stated that, if a smarter sanctions policy was adopted, Iraq would still try to smuggle oil, evade the controls on military and dual-use imports, and abuse the OFF programme. The "key battle would be over political perceptions and hence the willingness of regional governments to co-operate with other aspects of a revised policy".

242. The JIC stated that whatever agreements on inspections of border crossings and trade were reached in principle, it was:

> "… unlikely that border controls would be effective in practice. A comprehensive international border monitoring presence would be required … such monitoring would be heavy on manpower and resources, and frontline states would be reluctant to agree an intrusive regime. Moreover as general trade increased, there would be a growing risk that military components and WMD dual-use items would be smuggled to Iraq."

---

[133] JIC Assessment, 8 March 2001, 'Iraq: Impact of Smarter Sanctions'.

243. The arms embargo remained "largely intact". Some dual use goods had "slipped through the net". The introduction of a more widely accepted sanctions regime would enhance the prospects of the arms embargo holding.

244. If Saddam Hussein judged that he could no longer deflect blame for Iraq's humanitarian plight or maintain his sources of income, he might be forced to reassess his policy of non-co-operation with resolution 1284. The JIC judged that "the effect of smart sanctions is likely to fall short of this". There were indications that Russia, France and China would feel obliged to welcome the concept of smarter sanctions, but would take account of Iraqi pressure and other political factors. Rebuilding P5 consensus would be difficult; but a resolution passed with P5 unanimity would significantly increase pressure on Iraq, and help rebuild UK public support for the UK's policy.

245. Saddam Hussein was "more likely for now to use renewed discussions at the UN as a means to delay both progress on UNSCR 1284 and the introduction of smarter sanctions. If Saddam were forced to consider re-admitting UN weapons inspectors, he would still seek to weaken the inspections provisions, an agreed timetable for the lifting of sanctions and abolition of the NFZs."

246. Mr Ricketts wrote to Mr Sawers on 9 March, identifying the "main implications for policy" of the analysis:

- … the arms embargo remains crucial. It has stopped Saddam getting new major weapons systems. We judge that state suppliers will continue to deny Iraq such systems whilst Saddam remains in power … There is some leaking of dual use items and spare parts. This would probably grow if all civil trade was freed up …;
- … ending sanctions on civil trade would give us and the US an opportunity to change perceptions in the Arab world and beyond on humanitarian issues …;
- … bringing the revenues from oil smuggling back under UN control would have the biggest impact on the cash reaching Saddam's pocket …;
- … on inspection of border crossings, we judged that neighbouring states would be likely to agree in principle, although getting them to implement them effectively will be much more difficult; and
- … the neighbours would want guarantees of compensation for income they lost as a result of their co-operation on smuggling/border trade."[134]

[134] Minute Ricketts to Sawers, 9 March 2001, 'Iraq: Impact of Smarter Sanctions'.

247. Mr Blair wrote on the minute from Mr Ricketts: "We must press on."[135]

248. In response to the policy framework circulated by Mr Sawers on 7 March, FCO officials prepared a draft letter for Mr Cook to send to Mr Blair.[136] The draft letter stated: "The key to progress is smarter sanctions, which focus on tougher controls on military and dual-use goods, while improving the scope for normal civilian economic activity." Resolution 1284 would "remain on the table and we can offer some further modest concessions along the lines discussed by officials … should Iraq comply (most unlikely)".

249. Implementation of those measures would require a new resolution: "We should pursue a technical resolution which rebalances the controls on Iraq but does not alter the central provisions of existing SCRs."

250. The draft letter stated that the UK should continue to steer clear of "the various American projects to overthrow Saddam".

251. The letter was not sent by Mr Cook.

252. Senior US and UK officials met in Washington on 12 March to discuss Iraq.[137] Mr Westmacott advised Mr Cook's Private Secretary the following day that the talks had been "pretty discouraging". Mr Westmacott's "tentative conclusions" from the talks were:

- on sanctions, there appeared to be "some backtracking" within the State Department from the "near identity" of views articulated by Secretary Powell and Mr Cook at their recent meeting. On both oil smuggling and border controls, the US appeared to favour "bilateral fixes" with the countries neighbouring Iraq rather than action in the UN;
- the US appeared to be "a good deal more relaxed" than the UK about the need to restore P5 unity; and
- despite showing some interest in the idea of a 'Contract with the Iraqi People', the State Department appeared to be more relaxed than the UK on the presentational aspects of policy.

253. Mr Sawers briefly discussed Iraq with a senior US official on 14 March.[138] Mr Sawers advised that US officials appeared to be retreating from the broad policy goals set out by Secretary Powell. Mr Sawers stated that although negotiations on smarter sanctions in the Security Council would be tricky, "it would be difficult to re-establish political consensus on Iraq without it".

254. Ms Clare Short, the International Development Secretary, and the Department for International Development (DFID), were not included in the policy review and were not sent a copy of Mr Sawers' letter of 7 March.

255. Ms Short's Private Office wrote to Mr Sawers on 15 March recording that Ms Short "regrets that DFID was not included".[139] She welcomed the thrust of the new policy, but remained "concerned that insufficient weight had been given to … humanitarian needs". She also asked that, if the sanctions regime changed, any revised strategy should take into account that: the UK could not "shrug off… responsibility" to relieve the suffering that Saddam Hussein had caused; the UN might continue to have "an important role"; and that provisions should be made for humanitarian assistance for the Kurds.

256. Ms Short wrote to the Prime Minister on 1 April welcoming the review of the "old sanctions policy which is widely discredited and is steadily eroding", the proposed refocusing on military controls, and that the OFF programme should end "except for Kurds in northern Iraq".[140] Ms Short stated that:

> "To counter [the] real risk that Saddam will neglect his people's needs we should promote openness and active role for UN agencies, Red Cross and NGOs [non-governmental organisations] in reporting on humanitarian situation. [The] UK should be ready to play a leading role in holding Saddam to account."

Activity in the No-Fly Zones

257. Following the attacks on 16 February, US and UK aircraft carried out no further attacks in the NFZs until 30 March.

258. Mr Julian Miller, Mr Hoon's Private Secretary from September 1999 to September 2001, wrote to Mr Sawers on 30 March:

> "Although the operation of 16 February helped to reduce the qualitative threat level, coalition aircraft have been threatened by AAA [anti-aircraft artillery] (and less often, SAMs [surface-to-air missiles]) on almost every occasion that they have taken to the air. It was against this background that US aircraft responded to Iraqi AAA this morning. They released two weapons aimed at an air defence site in the southern No-Fly Zone. Both missed their intended targets, landing in open ground without causing collateral damage.
> "The Defence Secretary is satisfied that action remains necessary to ensure that the threat to our aircrew remains acceptable. Given that Saddam's intent to attack our aircraft appears unchanged, we can expect – provided that targets can be identified and that the weather permits their engagement – to see further coalition bombing activity. Any such action will, of course, be conducted within the existing RO framework, with the authority for UK participation – within the carefully defined parameters approved collectively by Ministers – delegated to military commanders.

[140] Letter Short to Prime Minister, 1 April 2001, 'Iraq Policy Review'.

Any proposal for an operation which breached those parameters (which is not currently in the offing) would be subject to the usual Ministerial consideration."[141]

259. Mr Webb told the Inquiry that, with regard to planned action to degrade Iraq's air-defence system:

"… a degree of caution … set in during the spring of 2001 … sensing that there had been this reaction in the region, I think the senior commanders didn't want to propose more of that if they didn't have to. As a result, some of the patrolling reduced; in other words, a decision was taken that if we didn't know where we might face this risk over part of the southern No-Fly Zone, we wouldn't patrol there for a while.

"So the operational commanders reduced the scope of the operation under their discretionary authority and with our support, rather than proposing a repeat of those situations. And that went on for a few months."[142]

Discussions with the US

260. The Cabinet Office took the lead in co-ordinating inter-departmental efforts to define the nature of future sanctions arrangements.

261. Papers were produced on:

- how a more focused sanctions regime could be established ('Iraq: Handling the Sanctions Issue');
- how controls to prevent Iraq re-arming would operate after the suspension of sanctions;[143]
- establishing better border controls;[144] and
- the application of financial sanctions against Iraq.[145]

262. On 16 March, Mr Sawers sent Dr Rice a copy of the UK's draft 'Contract with the Iraqi People' and a paper entitled 'Iraq: Handling the Sanctions Issue'.[146]

263. The paper on sanctions highlighted the danger that the forthcoming resolution on rolling over the OFF programme would "present the friends of Iraq in the P5 with an opportunity to come forward with their own proposals for unilateral easing of sanctions", set out parameters for a new "Controlled Goods List", and described in broad terms the arrangements by which it would be enforced.

264. In his covering letter, Mr Sawers stated that:

- There was common ground between the US and UK on the NFZs.
- The UK had suggested that the question of regime change should be addressed through a 'Contract with the Iraqi People'.
- Efforts to chart a way forward on sanctions at a working level had got "bogged down". Sticking to the present arrangements while loosening some of the holds that the US and UK had placed on OFF programme contracts, combined with a renewed diplomatic effort, would be an advance but would "fall a good way short of the goals the Prime Minister and President agreed". Mr Sawers concluded: "So our strong preference is to be more ambitious, and be prepared to agree changes to the sanctions regime in the Security Council, and put real pressure on Iraq's neighbours to implement the agreed controls vigorously."

265. Mr McKane reported to Mr Sawers on 6 April that useful progress was being made "to put flesh on the bones" of the policy framework attached to Mr Sawers' letter of 7 March.[147] The UK and the US appeared "to be in agreement on the broad direction, but there is still some way to go not least in working out the details of a deal under which Iraq's neighbours would agree to bring all Iraqi oil revenues under UN control".

266. On sanctions, Mr McKane advised that the UK and US agreed on the case for moving towards a single list of goods subject to UN controls (thereby freeing up the import of other goods). Discussions still had to take place on the composition of that list. Further talks with US State Department officials on 17 April would be followed by talks with the French and "in due course" the Russians. The aim was to obtain UN endorsement of a more targeted sanctions package in the OFF roll-over resolution due in June.

267. On bringing illegal Iraqi oil exports under UN control, Mr McKane advised that it was "not yet clear what concessions might have to be offered to the neighbouring states to persuade them to co-operate". Increased investment in border controls would "only make sense if Iraq's neighbours can be persuaded to co-operate – enforcement would be carried out by their customs personnel". The UK paper on border controls had been passed to the US.

268. Mr McKane advised that the UK paper on the controls that should remain in place after the suspension of sanctions had been passed to the US. An essential feature was maintaining the UN escrow account (see Section 1.1) "so that Iraq's oil revenue (or other significant sources of foreign exchange revenue) cannot be used to purchase either conventional or unconventional arms or dual use items".

[147] Minute McKane to Sawers, 6 April 2001, 'Iraq'.

269. Mr McKane reported that there had been several discussions with the US on the NFZs, and that:

> "We are agreed that we need to retain the No-Fly Zones. Not only do they serve a humanitarian purpose, but the southern No-Fly Zone is also necessary for the defence of Kuwait and Saudi Arabia … We think it may be possible to reduce the size of the No-Fly Zones … there has not been a positive US reaction. Defence officials continue to discuss the scope for adjusting the pattern of patrolling but the military advice, which the Defence Secretary has endorsed, is that there is only modest scope to do so without placing our air crew at greater risk. We need to keep the legal position under review (the Attorney General has asked for a further report by the end of May) but any deterrent option which did not rely on the Southern No-Fly Zone would entail a greater risk that Kuwait could be overrun before an effective military response could be put in place."

270. Mr McKane reported that a draft 'Contract with the Iraqi People', which reflected Ms Short's concerns about a continuing key role for international agencies, had been shared with the US.

271. Mr Blair responded that getting a deal under which Iraq's neighbours agreed to bring all Iraqi oil revenues under UN control was the "essential quid pro quo" for better targeted sanctions.[148]

272. In response to a number of diplomatic telegrams which had described the NFZs as necessary for the defence of Kuwait, Mr Iain Macleod, FCO Legal Counsellor, asked colleagues on 6 April to remind diplomatic posts "of the need to ensure that the legal justification for the zones (the prevention of a humanitarian catastrophe) is kept distinct from other policy advantages which they may bring".[149]

273. Reviewing the Treasury/Bank of England paper on the options for amending financial sanctions in early May, Mr McKane concluded that there were options for easing sanctions without legislation, but that should be kept under review "until we have thought through the full implications and seen the effect of other changes under consideration".[150] The possibility of replacing the comprehensive regime with a targeted asset freeze would require amendment to resolution 661(1990). That was not seen as a "near-term option".

274. An Assessment issued on 10 May marked a shift in the JIC's perception of Iraq's intentions and activities in relation to WMD.

[149] Minute Macleod to Patey, 6 April 2001, 'Iraq: No Fly Zones'.
[150] Letter McKane to Goulty, 11 May 2001, 'Iraq: Financial Sanctions'.

275. On 10 May, at the request of the MOD, the JIC assessed "what we know of Iraq's WMD programmes, their future direction, our level of confidence in the intelligence, our confidence in being able to identify the location of Iraq's WMD facilities accurately and the potential impact of direct military action against them".[151] The Assessment is considered in detail in Section 4.1.

276. The JIC stated that its "knowledge of developments" in Iraq's WMD and ballistic missile programmes since December 1998 was "patchy", but judged that "intelligence gives grounds for concern and suggests that Iraq is becoming bolder in conducting activities prohibited by UNSCR 687".

277. The JIC knew most about Iraq's ballistic missile programme, where there had been a step change in progress over the previous two years.

278. The JIC continued to "assess that while sanctions remain in place, Iraq cannot indigenously develop and produce nuclear weapons. Were sanctions lifted, it would take Iraq at least five years to produce a nuclear device and a further two to produce a warhead."

279. The JIC assessed the vulnerability of Iraq's WMD programmes, and judged that:

> "Although some WMD facilities could be destroyed by direct military action, this would be unlikely to have a significant impact on Iraq's WMD programmes …"

280. The JIC stated:

> "… our ability to constrain Iraqi development of its WMD through other means [other than military action] is limited. The development of Iraq's WMD has been helped in recent years by the absence of UN inspectors, the increase in illegal border trade and hard currency available to Iraq. There have been an increasing number of […] reports on orders for illegal imports of missile related components and materials […] Because of the need for raw materials and components from abroad, sanctions remain an obstacle to the development of all Iraq's WMD programmes."

281. Under the heading "Implications", the JIC stated:

> "This assessment underlines the importance of pursuing vigorously work on the proposed UN controlled goods list, which would help sustain effective controls on Iraqi WMD development."

282. Mr Cook reported that there had been good progress in agreeing a proposal for a new sanctions regime with the US, but less on securing an agreement with regional states to reduce oil smuggling.

283. Mr Cook repeated his view that the UK should consider ending patrols of the southern NFZ.

---

[151] JIC Assessment, 10 May 2001, 'Iraqi WMD Programmes: Status and Vulnerability'.

284. On 4 May, Mr Cook wrote to Mr Blair reporting that:

> "We have made good progress on the review of sanctions, with UK/US now in agreement on a new approach with the objective of turning the focus away from sanctions and onto controls on WMD. Work is in hand to tie down the detail and build up support in the region and in the P5, but we need to move quickly if we are to meet our deadline of 4 June, the date of the next 'Oil-for-Food' resolution."[152]

285. Mr Cook reported on the debate within the US Administration.

286. Mr Cook detailed the progress that had been made on sanctions:

> "… we have now persuaded the US that, while the UN will continue to control Iraq's oil revenue, procedures should be adjusted so that only contracts containing items on an agreed list of controlled goods require scrutiny by the Sanctions Committee. This relaxation of UN controls will be balanced by new measures to reduce sanctions-breaking and tighten up on dual-use goods. The new approach will reduce the role of the UN, enable the US to vastly reduce the number of contracts on hold, and allow us to deflect responsibility for the humanitarian situation away from us and on to the Iraqi government. At the same time, by reducing the regime's access to hard cash, it will reduce Iraq's room for manoeuvre."

287. Progress on confirming arrangements with "front-line states" to reduce oil smuggling had been "slow".

288. There had been "less progress" on the US review of operations in the NFZs. Mr Cook advised that:

> "I believe we should look again at options for reducing patrols in the southern NFZ, or even ending them. The legal difficulties remain, and I am also concerned that operations in the southern NFZ will undo the advances we achieve through making changes on sanctions and undermine hard won P5 and regional backing for our new approach."

289. On regime change, Mr Cook reported that: "No one in the [US] Administration believes they can deliver Saddam's overthrow". The UK's 'Contract with the Iraqi People' fell short of calling for Saddam Hussein's departure but set out the steps that the international community would take to restore and rehabilitate Iraq in the event of his departure. As regime change moved up the US agenda, the UK should encourage the US to "sign up to this more credible and defensible approach". There might soon be an opportunity to garner wider international support for the idea of the contract, capitalising on Iraq's mishandling of the recent Arab Summit.

[152] Minute Cook to Prime Minister, 4 May 2001, 'Iraq: US/UK Policy Review'.

290. Mr Hoon responded to Mr Cook's letter on 14 May, stating that the:

> "Proposed strategy [of 7 March] offers best prospect of retaining maximum control over Iraqi revenues, impeding Baghdad's ability to threaten its neighbours, and regaining international support. But need to be realistic about chances of speedy implementation. Difficulties of winning Russian and French support, and that of front line states, very real."[153]

291. Mr Hoon stated that there were only "limited grounds for optimism" that front line states would implement new measures to clamp down on oil smuggling, particularly in the context of regional attitudes to the intifada in the Palestinian Occupied Territories.

292. Mr Hoon recognised Mr Cook's "frustration with the No-Fly Zones", but disagreed with his position. In Mr Hoon's view, the arguments for the NFZs, both humanitarian and defensive, remained powerful and no less risky means of achieving those objectives had been identified:

> "Military commanders are already charged with conducting the mission we have laid upon them with minimum profile and risk. We have made progress over the past two years bearing down on patrolling rates, reducing responses to Iraqi threats, and making increased use of UAVs (Unmanned Aerial Vehicles) for tactical reconnaissance. But I do not think that looking yet again at patrolling, with a view to reducing or even ending it, would be productive. The arguments for maintaining the No-Fly Zones are based on the assessed continued humanitarian requirement, the importance of the southern Zone for the defence of Kuwait, and the desire to avoid handing Saddam a victory which might undermine containment. These remain powerful. While I accept that our view is not universally shared, it remains that the Zones continue to be legally justified. We have asked officials to identify a better (and less risky) means of achieving our objectives. Despite exhaustive scrutiny, they have not found one: their consistent advice is that regular patrols are required both to achieve the task and in order effectively – and safely – to monitor the threat. Decisions about patrolling rates must remain the preserve of the military commander, who must balance risk against exposure to the threat."

293. Mr Hoon expressed his concern that the US Administration might pick up "mixed messages about our commitment to continued military co-operation in this area", which he believed would be "very damaging" to the UK's ability to influence US thinking and "unhelpful" if it encouraged other P5 members to "introduce the future of the Zones into the package".

[153] Letter Hoon to Prime Minister, 14 May 2001, 'Iraq'.

Early negotiations on a smarter sanctions resolution

294. UK officials continued to work on a draft resolution (known informally as the "Smart Sanctions" resolution) to reflect the new policy framework, based on a new Goods Review List.

295. The UK prepared a draft resolution for the P5 Political Directors meeting in New York on 21 May.[154] The UK intended that the draft resolution would:

- allow the export to Iraq of all goods other than WMD and military items through fast-track procedures;
- introduce more tightly focused controls on "Iraq weapons" through agreement on a "Controlled Goods List" of arms and items of WMD concern: the UK was pressing the US not to insist on an "unreasonably long list";
- through agreement with Iraq's neighbours, bring Iraq's illegal oil exports within the OFF programme; and
- introduce strengthened monitoring of Iraq's land, sea and air borders.

296. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry that:

> "The Council remained deeply divided between those states which remained highly suspicious of Iraqi activity, with intelligence showing evidence of continued Iraqi interest in materials for sophisticated weapons programmes (the US, the UK and one or two other western or western-oriented members of the Security Council), and Russia, France, China and many developing world or middle-ground members of the Council, who opposed the continuation of sanctions short of convincing evidence that Iraq was continuing to breach Security Council resolutions in a way which threatened international peace and security."[155]

297. It proved impossible to reach agreement in the Security Council by the deadline of 4 June.

298. Mr Sawers advised Mr Blair at the end of May that there remained "big arguments ahead" on the detail of any new arrangement, within the US Administration, the P5 and the region.[156] It would be surprising if an agreement could be reached in the Security Council by early June. Mr Sawers asked: "Do you anyway want this to come to a head in late May/early June? Wouldn't it be better to let it slip a month or two?"[157]

299. Mr Sawers also reported that there was a difference of view between Mr Cook and the MOD on the utility of the NFZs, and suggested asking the MOD for a considered view on the alternatives.

[157] As the June 2001 UK General Election would have prevented UK Ministers from taking an active role in lobbying for the change.

300. Mr Blair indicated his agreement on both points.[158]

301. Resolution 1352, adopted on 1 June, extended the period for negotiation by a month with the "intention to consider new arrangements for the sale or supply of commodities and products to Iraq … in civilian sectors" while improving "the controls to prevent the sale or supply of items prohibited or unauthorised by the Council".[159]

302. After the General Election of 7 June 2001, Mr Jack Straw was appointed as the Foreign Secretary. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that Iraq was one of the issues flagged up in his initial briefing, but very much as "work in progress".[160] He was briefed on the problems with existing sanctions, on the negotiations already under way to introduce "smarter sanctions", and on the question of what to do about the NFZs.

303. Mr Straw was briefed on progress on Iraq for a Cabinet meeting on 28 June.[161]

304. There was no discussion in Cabinet on this or any other aspect of Iraq policy during 2001.

305. Negotiations on the "Smart Sanctions" resolution, incorporating a revised Goods Review List (GRL), resumed in New York. The UK tabled a revised draft on 8 June.[162]

306. It proved impossible to achieve agreement within the Security Council on a new resolution. In his statement to the Inquiry, Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote:

> "Russia in particular was virulently opposed to the recasting of the sanctions regime lists, more because they were trying to bring the whole sanctions regime to an end, as they believed it was no longer justified, than because they disagreed with the idea of focusing on 'dual-use' items … when this came to a head in June and July, the Russians remained adamant and nothing new was achieved.
> "… the French, who often sided with the Russians on Iraq, were quite constructive in their support for these revisions, with the French Government telling us at a very senior level that they believed that Saddam Hussein was continuing to develop his chemical and biological capabilities (end-June 2001). France and China told the US and the UK at that time that they could agree on the new Goods Review List. This isolated Russia, but Moscow remained defiant. The US, in frustration, began to sound increasingly belligerent about using the No-Fly Zones to deliver sharper attacks on Iraqi military installations. The UK, alongside the US, sought to address the Russian opposition with rational argument about the benefits to the Iraqi people of a narrower list and about the good sense of concentrating on dangerous weaponry. But the Russians, who were in close consultation with the Iraqis throughout this period, believed the Iraqi line that the United States in particular was trying to impose a punishment on Iraq by any means possible, that this continued punishment was unjustified in the absence of clear evidence that WMD programmes were being pursued and that the whole sanctions regime could be knocked aside, under the force of international concern about the humanitarian situation, if the Russians persisted with their tactics."[163]

307. Sir Jeremy told the Inquiry:

"The Russians were just not prepared, I think, in mid-2001 with a new American administration, to be carried along into a recasting of the sanctions regime on Iraq which would extend it without any clear measures, stepping stones, if you like, for how Iraq could get out of the sanctions regime. They regarded it as one-sided in that respect, whereas [resolution] 1284 had been comprehensive."[164]

308. Sir Jeremy continued:

"They [the Russians] held out in July, they held out in November, and we wondered whether we would ever get a sanctions regime."

309. Sir John Sawers told the Inquiry why he thought the Russians had maintained their opposition to a "Smart Sanctions" regime:

"The real reason … conveyed … by senior Russians authoritatively, was that they were concerned about their commercial position in Iraq and the Iraqis actually didn't want any change to the sanctions regime. The Iraqi regime was comfortable … we understood that the Iraqis actually threatened to cut off all Russia's contracts if they agreed to the modification of sanctions, and the Russians were fairly open with us about that."[165]

310. The Inquiry asked Mr Ross if the Russian attitude had affected US policy.[166] He told the Inquiry:

"I think it did … I think it built US suspicions of the Security Council as a place to do business … which undermined at a critical period the US intention to use the Council and to use UNMOVIC as an avenue for its policy of containing Iraq.

"I think they [the US] felt that … even when they were easing sanctions, they hit a Russian blockage in the Security Council and that caused considerable frustration in Washington, but also provided a lot of ammunition to the neo-cons and other people who said, you know, 'You can't do anything through the UN, it is just a kind of joke, that place, just forget it' …"

311. Mr Blair spoke to President Vladimir Putin on 27 June, but without reaching agreement on the UK proposals.[167]

312. Mr Blair spoke separately to Presidents Chirac and Bush on 29 June. The record confirms Sir Jeremy's account of the French position.[168]

313. The UN Security Council adopted resolution 1360 on 3 July 2001, extending the OFF programme by five months.

314. An FCO briefing for Mr Straw stated that the UK would use the time to work on the Russians, who were seen as isolated.[169]

315. In his statement in the Security Council of the UK position after the vote on resolution 1360, Sir Jeremy Greenstock said that there was:

> "… now a wide sense across the United Nations that it is the right time for new arrangements, such as those we have proposed … There is no good reason for delay.
> "… We remain ready to engage in discussion of the implementation of resolution 1284 … But there is as yet no sign of a willingness by Iraq even to begin to co-operate in meeting its obligations under that resolution or, indeed, under other resolutions. Iraq consistently refuses to contemplate the return of United Nations disarmament inspectors. Why, then, delay the adoption of improvements in the humanitarian programme?"[170]

316. The US representative stated that a GRL, which was central to the new approach, had been produced the previous week. It would have been adopted that day "save for the threat of a veto. But a veto would bring our work to a halt and thus would be a victory for Iraq."

317. Syria stated that there was a need to take "a comprehensive approach … leading to a resolution of the humanitarian issues facing Iraq and neighbouring countries".

318. Mr Straw visited Washington from 10 to 11 July.

319. Briefings for the visit from the British Embassy Washington and the FCO reflected concerns that, following the failed attempts to secure a new resolution, the US Administration could shift its policy away from diplomatic containment and towards regime overthrow.[171]

320. The FCO briefing advised that gaining the co-operation of some of Iraq's neighbours, and providing a safety net for others, were important steps in making progress on a new sanctions regime.[172]

321. During his visit, Mr Straw discussed progress on securing "Smart Sanctions" and the importance of winning over the front line states.[173]

322. Sir Peter Ricketts told the Inquiry that he had believed in July 2001 that "a growing majority on the Security Council" could "see that the current sanctions regime was not working … and should be replaced", and that there was momentum behind the policy.[174]

323. Sir Jeremy Greenstock gave the Inquiry a more pessimistic view:

> "The Oil-for-Food regime was … rolled over for six months at the beginning of July 2001 with no prospect of this stalemate being ended even in the following six-month period.
> "… this was quite a low point in the saga of the Security Council's activities on Iraq, since it seemed that there was no way forward on any of the potential tracks.
> "The UK concluded from this experience that it was going to be extremely difficult to end the fundamental stalemate at the Security Council over Iraqi sanctions … with the failure of the Security Council to reach any form of agreement on Iraq's future, we were looking at the prospect of a continued unravelling of the sanctions regime, of growing confidence in Baghdad that they could outwit the international community and of a real prospect that, over time, Iraq would be able to reconstitute some of the programmes which had been destroyed after 1991. In the summer of 2001, we and the Americans had no clear ideas on how we could successfully get out of this logjam."[175]

324. Russia's attitude towards Iraq was discussed on 19 July during President Bush's visit to the UK. Mr Blair highlighted the need to persuade President Putin to engage on Iraq.[176]

325. Mr Blair's memoir recorded that President Putin had joked that he was "all in favour" of sanctions "provided we compensated him for the US$8bn that Iraq owed Russia".[177]

326. The record of Mr Blair's discussions with President Putin in the margins of the G8 meeting in Genoa on 21 July verifies Mr Blair's and Mr Sawers' accounts.[178] The priority was to stop Iraq acquiring nuclear weapons. Mr Blair observed that Iraq had rejected proposals to allow UN observers to return as a first step to lifting sanctions, and that the proposals on the table were to move to interim arrangements before UN inspectors returned and sanctions were lifted. In addition, the issue of whether an "outside enemy" led to people "rallying round and allowed Saddam to justify his strict internal regime" was raised. Mr Blair was concerned about the humanitarian impact of sanctions; and that the situation in Iraq made stabilising the Middle East more difficult. Mr Sawers concluded that Russia was looking for a way out of the impasse.

JIC Assessment, 25 July 2001

327. On 25 May, the JIC assessed Saddam Hussein's strategy and "the continuing erosion of sanctions".[179] That Assessment is addressed in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 25 July 2001: 'Iraq: Continuing Erosion of Sanctions'

The JIC assumed, for the purposes of its Assessment, that there would be no change to the existing sanctions regime until the end of the year. It did not assess the prospects for achieving P5 unity and the UK's "new approach" in that timescale.

The JIC's Key Judgements included:

- "Most Governments around the world still respect UN sanctions. Around 80 percent of Iraq's overall revenues are controlled through [the] Oil-for-Food [programme] … There is broad international consensus to maintain the arms embargo at least as long as Saddam [Hussein] remains in power. This severely limits Iraq's ability to re-build its military threat."
- "Nevertheless, the effectiveness of sanctions continues to erode … Iraq's illicit earnings are likely to exceed US$3bn this year …"
- Syria, Jordan and Turkey benefited "from cheap Iraqi oil and associated trade with Iraq. In the absence of compensation or P5 unity, they will remain reluctant to support revised sanctions or allow closer monitoring of trade." Regional support for revising sanctions would be "increasingly difficult to achieve" as Iraq extended "trade benefits to more Arab states" and the Palestinian crisis continued.
- "… Russia blocked a revised UN sanctions regime because it believed its trade prospects would be severely curtailed. But Russia may not feel able to stand in the way of a further resolution on sanctions."
- "Iraq's isolation has diminished … Wider Arab sympathy for Iraq is bolstered by Saddam's championing of Palestinian rights, the widespread Arab perception that the US is compromised by its support for Israel, and false propaganda about incidents in the No-Fly Zones."

[178] Letter Sawers to McDonald, 21 July 2001, 'Prime Minister's bilateral with President Putin, Genoa, 21 July – Iraq'.

- "Saddam would only accept the return of UN weapons inspectors if it were accompanied by the immediate suspension of sanctions, with a clear timetable for their lift. He would also demand access to oil revenues and try to obtain abolition of the No-Fly Zones."
- "For now, Saddam will avoid measures that would unite the wider Arab world against him and undermine his efforts to build regional economic ties. This will further reduce the risk of military threats to Kuwait or Saudi Arabia. But he will seek to shoot down coalition aircraft in the No-Fly Zones."

The JIC stated that while Iraq's illegal income was increasing, its income under the OFF programme was likely to fall from US$17bn in 2000 to US$14bn in 2001, largely as a result of Iraq's temporary suspension of oil deliveries under the OFF programme.

Syria was now "the largest purchaser of illicit Iraqi oil" and was "becoming a more favoured route for the supply of military spare parts, telecommunications equipment and chemicals to Iraq". There was "scope for the illegal trade … to grow further … in the medium term there are plans for a new pipeline and additional road and rail links".

Most of those who dealt with Iraq had not changed their minds about Saddam Hussein. He had "no friends in Saudi Arabia or Kuwait" and he distrusted "both King Abdullah of Jordan and President Bashar [al-Assad] of Syria". But his strategy was "to place Syria and Jordan under greater obligation than the west or Gulf States will be willing to buy out".

The "widespread renewal of Iraq's diplomatic contacts" in 2000 had been extended in 2001 "by a variety of bilateral and multilateral meetings mainly to develop economic relations". International flights were continuing with Iraq-based civil aircraft flying between Baghdad and Damascus "three or four times a week" with "a similar number of foreign aircraft" flying "into Baghdad mainly from Russia, Turkey and other Arab countries". "Three ferries a week" operated "between the UAE, Bahrain and Iraq" which were "largely unregulated".

The JIC stated that:

> "The regime feels stronger for having an external enemy and the elite is profiting. All of Saddam's close associates have become $ millionaires through sanctions breaking trade …
> "… Saddam judges his position to be the strongest since the Gulf War. Although much of this is based on regional dependence on illicit oil, the regime is secure …"

328. Iranian support for the British position provided the opportunity for Mr Blair to maintain contacts with President Mohammad Khatami of Iran.[180]

329. Mr Blair wrote to President Khatami on 30 July, thanking him for Iran's public support for the UK proposals which Mr Blair "… firmly believe[d] … are necessary to contain the threat that Iraq poses to its neighbours … while at the same time addressing the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people".[181]

Continuing concerns about the NFZs

330. On 12 February 2001, Mr Brummell had written to Mr McKane:

- confirming that Lord Williams accepted "that it is still possible on balance to argue that the maintenance of the No-Fly Zones is justified as a necessary and proportionate use of force to prevent a humanitarian crisis";
- emphasising "that it is vitally important to keep constantly in view the precarious nature of the legal basis for UK and US action in the No-Fly Zones"; and
- asking for an "update of the situation in the north and south of Iraq, consideration of alternatives to the maintenance of the Zones, and information on any civilian casualties associated with UK and US operations in relation to the Zones", by the end of May 2001.

331. That letter is described earlier in this Section.

332. The production of the update was delayed by the UK General Election in June 2001. After the election, Lord Goldsmith of Allerton became the Attorney General.

333. Mr McKane wrote to Mr Brummell on 28 June, to provide the update.[182] He advised that there was no evidence that would entail a revision of the assessment that he had provided on 8 February (and which had been endorsed by Mr Cook and Mr Straw), but offered an update on the points made in that letter:

> "Although we cannot predict with absolute certainty how Saddam would react in the event of a cessation of coalition operations in the southern No-Fly Zone, our judgement remains that he would revert to the use of air power against the Shia population …
> "… more effective persecution of the Shia would add to their misery and would risk provoking another cycle of uprising and brutal repression. A grave humanitarian crisis would result …
> "There is no reason to call into question the JIC judgement … that abolition of the northern No-Fly Zone would be likely to lead to a refugee crisis at least comparable to 1996 (nor that, in the event that Saddam faced widespread opposition to an assault to recover the north, a humanitarian refugee crisis similar to that in 1991 would follow).

[181] Letter Prime Minister to Khatami, 30 July 2001, [untitled].
[182] Letter McKane to Brummell, 28 June 2001, 'Iraq'.

> "Our judgement in February was that a decision to move away from patrolling the south would make it more difficult to sustain the necessary political support for the northern No-Fly Zone. That remains our view.
> "Overall, our continued collective judgement is that there remains an unacceptably high risk that, in the event that we ceased patrolling the southern No-Fly Zone, extreme humanitarian distress would result on a scale comparable to that which led to a grave humanitarian crisis and the establishment of the Zones in 1991 and 1992."

334. Addressing Lord Williams' request that officials "should continue to seek to establish whether alternatives methods [to the NFZs] to achieve our objectives could be identified", Mr McKane stated:

> "… the MOD has conducted a comprehensive review to inform the policy dialogue we have been engaged in with the new US Administration. After our own careful and detailed scrutiny, no other arrangements that would obviate the need to conduct regular patrols over Iraqi territory have been identified."

335. Mr McKane confirmed that the need "to avoid incidental loss of civilian life, injury to civilians and damage to civilian objects" remained a key concern for coalition commanders in the planning and implementation of attacks.

336. Mr Brummell responded on 25 July.[183] Noting that there was no change to the assessment of 8 June, he wrote:

> "As discussed, the new Attorney General will wish to consider in the near future the issues relating to the legal basis for the conduct of operations in the NFZs, having regard in particular to your update … I shall revert to you as soon as he has done so."

337. The following day, Mr Hoon received advice on a possible large-scale attack by US forces on the Iraqi air-defence system, in response to continuing Iraqi attacks on coalition aircraft in the NFZs.[184] The advice stated that the MOD was not yet in a position to consult Law Officers, but "there were strong grounds for believing that they would have difficulty with an attack of this scale". A manuscript comment to Mr Hoon from his Private Office in the margin of the advice stated that the FCO and No.10 were "both in the picture".

338. It is not clear whether Mr Brummell was aware that the US was considering those strikes when he wrote to Mr McKane.

339. Reports of a "planned large-scale military response to recent events in the southern No-Fly Zone", "sourced to the Pentagon", appeared in the media on 27 July.[185]

340. Mr McKane wrote to No.10 on 1 August, advising that military planners within the Pentagon and the MOD had discussed options. The Pentagon option was for a raid involving attacks on 30 targets, two-thirds of which were north of the southern No-Fly Zone and within 20 miles of Baghdad. The UK preference was to attack 20 targets, 12 of which lay within 20 miles of Baghdad. Each of the proposed targets was connected with the Iraqi air-defence system though two were in the vicinity of the civilian airports at Baghdad and Basra which had civilian as well as military roles.[186]

341. Lord Goldsmith was provided with written briefing on the US proposals and met MOD officials on 1 and 8 August.[187]

342. An official in Mr Hoon's Private Office wrote to No.10 on 2 August setting out the issues:

> "Whilst coalition aircraft have continued to come under regular attack by the Iraqi air defences, the military assessment was until very recently that the overall risk remained manageable. Events over recent weeks have, however, brought this into question, with July seeing an alarming increase in the number of occasions on which coalition aircraft have narrowly avoided being shot down (ten separate incidents in the south alone, compared to eleven in the previous four months combined)."[188]

343. The increased risk reflected greater Iraqi capability and "coalition restraint over the past three months".

344. Decisions on the operation were likely to be delayed by US concern about the reaction of "moderate Arab governments" which were "already under pressure as a result of developments in Israel and Palestine", and by the US appreciation of the likely propaganda benefits to Saddam Hussein from such attacks. The debate within the US Administration on how to respond to the attacks on coalition aircraft had broadened into a wider one about the direction of US policy, "with advocates of hitting Saddam harder using this as an opportunity to move the argument in that direction".

345. Mr Hoon's Private Office concluded:

> "The Defence Secretary is convinced of the need, in the face of the substantially increased threat, to take action to reduce the risk to the Service Personnel conducting this task [patrolling the Zones]. Whilst he understands the political and presentational arguments for delay, his preference would have been for a substantial operation designed to achieve this (indeed, he has asked for the views of the Attorney General on a UK-prepared plan to attack 21 targets). He accepts the military advice that only by conducting such an operation, including against targets north of the 33rd parallel, can we expect to reduce the threat substantially in the medium term. But he accepts that, just as in the US, time will be required to afford collective consideration of such a proposal. He believes that this is an issue to which we will need to return in the future.

"In the meantime, he is clear that the status quo is not an option, and that a robust return to the existing agreed concept of operations is essential … to enable the coalition to manage the enhanced risk in the immediate term."

346. Mr Patey reported on 3 August that the US had decided not to carry out the proposed operation, pending consideration of its wider implications.[189] He described it as "welcome news".

347. The MOD proposed to return to the level of operations within the NFZs before the constraints imposed following the February attack. That would raise the profile of the NFZs, but the FCO believed that the UK should be able to portray that as a legitimate and proportionate response to the increased threat to air crew.

348. Mr Straw's Private Office wrote to No.10 later that day, acknowledging the increase in the threat and that military commanders should use their delegated authority to take actions within the NFZs to minimise the risk to air crews.[190] Mr Straw was concerned that a major attack should not be initiated:

"… without considering carefully the implications for our wider interests.

"… A more substantial operation … would bring into stark relief arguments about double standards and inflame Arab public opinion. We might face attacks on UK … Embassies and other interests in the region. We owe a duty of care to our staff and to British citizens in the region, as well as to our aircrews.

"Politically, a major operation north of the southern NFZ would play straight into Saddam's hands … UK domestic and international reaction following the February attacks was hostile …

"Such an operation could also prove fatal to our current Iraq policy … a major operation would be interpreted as a get-tough policy by the US in frustration at the failure to get our revised sanctions approach agreed … The collapse of our current policy, which has been carefully considered and agreed in Whitehall and with the US, would leave us in a policy vacuum in which we would risk getting sucked into adopting a more militaristic posture.

[189] Minute Patey to PS [FCO], 3 August 2001, 'Iraq: NFZs'.
[190] Letter Sedwill to Tatham, 3 August 2001, 'Iraq: RO4'.

"… the balance of advantage to maintaining the NFZs would require the most careful consideration."

349. On 3 August, an official in the British Embassy Washington reported that one senior US official had said that the debate over the proposed attacks had "given greater impetus" to the need to develop the overall US strategy on Iraq; and that substantive outcomes were "unlikely in days, but possible in weeks".[191]

350. Mr Brummell wrote to the MOD on 9 August, setting out Lord Goldsmith's views.[192] Lord Goldsmith had concluded "that proportionate attacks by UK forces on the … two targets could be justified in the context of Allied operations in the southern No-Fly Zone".

351. Mr Brummell also set out Lord Goldsmith's views on proposed attacks by US forces. Referring to earlier correspondence with the FCO, Mr Brummell noted the UK's "potential international legal responsibility" for attacks carried out by the US in the NFZs, and, with regard to the planned action, "the assurances provided by the US that, in relation to all three proposed targets, no civilian casualties may be expected to result from the attacks and that there may be expected no more than minor damage to civilian buildings and facilities". On that basis, the Attorney General had advised: "Provided the responsible senior Ministers are satisfied that these US projections are reliable, and that the US Government are satisfied as to the lawfulness of the proposed attacks", he saw no reason to question that "proportionate attacks by US forces on the … targets … could be justified in the context of Allied operations in the southern No-Fly Zone".

352. A number of attacks were carried out on 10 August, including an attack by the US on a target previously assigned to UK forces. That attack was carried out during daylight hours.

353. Mr Brummell wrote to the MOD on 15 August referring to the concerns the Attorney General had expressed in giving his consent, regarding the importance he had attached to the MOD's assurance that the attack would be carried out at night to avoid the risk of harm to people working in the vicinity of the buildings.[193] MOD officials had also made clear that any change in circumstances would be brought to the Attorney General's attention. Mr Brummell recorded that Lord Goldsmith had asked that the written report on the attacks should address the points he had raised; and that his concerns should be drawn to Mr Hoon's attention.

354. Mr Hoon's Private Office replied to Mr Brummell on 3 September.[194] The letter stressed the importance that Mr Hoon attached to the Law Officers' advice and that he was fully aware of the need to ensure that the actions of coalition partners were "governed by similar principles". Mr Hoon was "confident that US commanders are very much aware of their obligation to minimise the risk of civilian casualties and collateral damage". US assessments in respect of targets were based "on more sophisticated modelling and have the benefit of a much greater range of weaponeering solutions than assessments made by the UK targeting staff in respect of RAF targets". The letter concluded that: "In circumstances … where there is … no clear reason to challenge US targeting judgements, he [Mr Hoon] takes the view that we should take on trust assurances provided by … our closest ally."

Lord Goldsmith's review

355. Mr Brummell wrote to Mr McKane on 24 August informing him that Lord Goldsmith intended to carry out his review of the legal justification for the maintenance of the NFZs during September; and that he had asked whether there was any additional information which departments wished to draw to his attention, and whether there were any developments subsequent to Mr McKane's update of 28 June.[195] Copies of the letter were sent to the MOD, the FCO and No.10 officials.

356. Mr Brummell also asked for clarification on a number of specific points:

- Whether departments could "expand on the assessment that a decision to move away from patrolling the south would make it more difficult to sustain the necessary political support for the northern No-Fly Zone".
- Whether it was possible to expand the assessment of the "likelihood" of a "grave humanitarian crisis" occurring as a result of persecution of the Shia.
- Whether departments could direct him "to the precise materials and/or passages" in "the MOD's comprehensive review of the Zones" on which the conclusion that "no other arrangements have been identified which would obviate the need to conduct regular patrols over Iraqi territory" had been based.
- Whether the assessment in Mr Patey's letter of 29 January that there might be "scope for adjustment" in relation to the northern NFZ remained valid, and if it did whether it affected "the assessment of whether there are any practical alternatives to patrolling the northern No-Fly Zone if lives are to be saved".

357. Mr McKane forwarded a copy of the letter to Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser, with the comment:

> "You need to be aware of this correspondence. I've got the matter in hand – I'll probably ask the MOD to produce a draft reply for discussion with them and FCO – but I may need to ask you to weigh in if the Attorney is unconvinced by our arguments."[196]

358. Copies of the letter were circulated widely within the MOD, and to Mr Hoon.

Discussions on a new contingency plan for the loss of an aircraft in Iraq

360. Mr Webb told the Inquiry that, in the event of a coalition plane being shot down in the NFZs:

> "We had a contingency plan … which was run from the joint headquarters in Saudi Arabia. The objective would have been the safety of the air crew … to basically go and get them back if wounded on the ground inside Iraq, whether or not the Iraqis tried to stop us doing it … it is called 'combat search and rescue' … it was on stand by all the time these [NFZ] operations were being flown and it didn't need Ministerial authorisation to go out and do that, and, as I'm implying, as well as just getting in there and picking up the air crew and looking after them medically, if necessary, we would have kept the Iraqi forces away … there was a debate to be had … of what's necessary to keep the – if I might put it like this – Iraqi forces' head[s] down while we went and recovered the crew, as opposed to also signalling that we wished they would not do it again."[197]

361. In late summer 2001, reports on US contingency planning for the loss of aircraft caused concern within the UK Government.

362. On 29 August, Mr Webb advised Mr Robert Cooper, Head of the Overseas and Defence Secretariat in the Cabinet Office, that the US Central Command (CENTCOM) had reviewed its contingency plans for the loss of a coalition aircraft in the NFZs.[198] The revised plan, understood to have been endorsed in principle, "provides for a major offensive operation, distinct from measures taken to recover downed aircrew, against a wide range of targets across Iraq within four hours of a shoot-down being confirmed".

363. Mr Webb described the US proposals as "of a piece with DoD [US Department of Defense] ideas on future responses to Iraqi threats ('more savage, less often')". The main legal concern was the breadth of the list of targets within Baghdad included in the revised plan.

364. In a manuscript note on his copy of Mr Webb's letter, Mr Stephen Wright, FCO Deputy Under Secretary of State (Defence and Intelligence), asked Mr Patey for advice, adding:

> "On the substance, I think we should strongly advise the US against their proposed strategy: it is politically and legally all wrong for both the US and the UK."[199]

365. Mr Wright responded to Mr Webb's letter on 5 September, emphasising the importance of understanding how any operation "might impact not only on our Iraq policy but on the region as a whole".[200]

366. Discussions between the UK and US on the proposed contingency plans continued for some months, and at the highest levels. The UK's objective was to moderate the US proposals.

367. The matter was not resolved until July 2002.

368. Mr Hoon's Private Secretary reported to Sir David Manning on 22 July 2002 that Lord Goldsmith had agreed to UK participation in attacking the target set, with the exception of three regime targets which would be attacked by the US.[201] In the event of a legal challenge, the Attorney General had advised that there would be a need for the UK to disassociate itself from that part of the action. That could damage US/UK bilateral relations. Mr Hoon proposed that the UK should agree a joint US/UK plan on that basis.

369. Mr Blair agreed.[202]

370. The circumstances in which the plan needed to be implemented did not arise.

Developments in the US

371. In early August, the British Embassy Washington reported that it appeared that a debate was heating up in Washington on the balance between different strands of US policy (sanctions, military containment and regime change).[203]

372. In a discussion with Mr Webb in mid-August, a senior Pentagon official stated that regime change was needed to prevent Iraq from acquiring a credible WMD capacity and becoming the dominant regional power.[204]

373. In early September, a senior State Department official advised the British Embassy Washington that activity on ideas for regime change was "much ado about nothing".[205]

374. Published American accounts described this debate. On 1 August, a paper entitled 'A Liberation Strategy' was presented to the National Security Council.[206] It proposed phased pressure on Saddam Hussein and support for the Iraqi opposition; no policy recommendation was made to the President.

375. Mr George Tenet, the Director of Central Intelligence, described in his memoir how a CIA analysis before 9/11 concluded that it would be difficult to remove Saddam Hussein because of the layers of security around him and that: "Even if we had managed to take Saddam out, the beneficiary was likely to have been another Sunni general no better than the man he replaced."[207]

376. General Tommy Franks, Commander in Chief CENTCOM, told the 9/11 Commission that in the summer before 9/11 he had been pushing to do more robust planning on military responses in Iraq, but that President Bush had denied his request, arguing that the time was not right.[208] Gen Franks also told the Commission that CENTCOM had begun to dust off plans for a full invasion of Iraq.

377. The then Head of Policy Planning in the US State Department, Mr Richard Haass, recorded that he submitted a memo to Secretary Powell arguing that "Saddam Hussein was a nuisance, not a mortal threat", and that the only sure way of ousting him would be through prolonged military occupation and nation-building.[209]

378. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised on 6 September that "our goals are to contain Iraqi military/WMD potential and constrict Baghdad's financial flexibility, without excessively harming the Iraqi people".[210] He argued that the issue needed to be given a higher priority in the US/Russian agenda and noted that Mr Goulty was due to hold talks in Moscow later that month.

379. The talks took place on 11 September 2001. Just after they had finished, the news reached Moscow of the terrorist attacks in the US.

380. The Inquiry asked Sir Peter Ricketts if the failure to secure agreement to a new resolution in July changed US policy. He told the Inquiry:

> "Yes, I think it probably did. I don't think it helped Colin Powell's position in Washington, frankly, that he had … not been able to give this containment policy a refresh through the sanctions resolution. I don't think it led to an immediate shift in American policy because I remember, as 9/11 happened, we and the Americans were still working on further pushes with the Russians to see whether we could get a Goods Review List resolution through in the autumn, but I think it didn't help the cause of the State Department that the flagship of this strengthened containment policy had not succeeded by July."[211]

381. Sir Christopher Meyer told the Inquiry that the Bush Administration had focused most of its political energy on domestic issues and that, by early September, appeared to be “running out of steam” on a range of issues including Iraq.[212] The US inter-agency review of Iraq had not produced any conclusions.

Introduction

1. This Section addresses:

- the cost of the UK's involvement in Iraq;
- the main sources of funding for the UK's involvement, the different arrangements for funding military operations and civilian activities, and how those arrangements changed;
- the estimates of the cost of military operations and civilian activities that were made before the invasion, and the extent to which those estimates influenced key decisions;
- the imposition of controls over the MOD's management of its resources by the Treasury in September 2003;
- the allocations for civilian activities that were made before, during and after the conflict; and
- how expenditure was scrutinised.

2. This Section does not address how departments used the resources available to them. Specifically:

- The provision of military equipment is considered in Sections 6.3 and 14.
- The UK's support for reconstruction is considered in Section 10.
- The UK's support for Security Sector Reform is considered in Section 12.

The cost of the UK's intervention in Iraq

3. The direct cost to the UK Government of its intervention in Iraq between the UK financial years 2002/03 and 2009/10 was at least £9.2bn in cash terms[1] (£11.83bn in 2016 prices).[2] That comprised:

Category	£bn	Percentage
Military operations	8.20	89
Humanitarian and development assistance[3]	0.58	6
Diplomatic representation[4]	0.30	3
Inter-departmental Pools and peacekeeping	0.16	2
Total	9.24	100

[1] The Government has confirmed that the expenditure figures for DFID and the FCO that were provided by Sir Nicholas Macpherson, Director General in charge of Public Expenditure from 2001 to 2005 and then Permanent Secretary at the Treasury, in his statement to the Inquiry of 15 January 2010, were inaccurate. That statement was published by the Inquiry on 22 January 2010.
[2] 2016 price equivalent calculated using Consumer Price Inflation Time Series Dataset December 2015, Office for National Statistics.
[3] Includes the imputed share of UK contributions to multilateral organisations.
[4] Includes support provided by the FCO to UK secondees to the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA).

4. In addition, the UK provided £0.95bn in debt relief to Iraq.

5. The figures above do not include expenditure by departments other than the MOD, the FCO and DFID. Although other departments made important contributions to the UK effort, in particular in the post-conflict period, their expenditure was relatively small. The Inquiry has made no estimate of the opportunity cost of the UK's involvement in Iraq.

6. The chart below shows the direct cost of military operations and civilian activities by financial year. A more detailed breakdown of direct costs is provided at the end of this Section.

7. The Inquiry asked Sir Nicholas Macpherson, Director General in charge of Public Expenditure from 2001 to 2005 and then Permanent Secretary at the Treasury, about additional, or indirect, costs such as continuing disability and medical costs for veterans.[5] Sir Nicholas confirmed that such costs were not captured in the information provided to the Inquiry by the Government.

8. In October 2002, the Treasury estimated that the indirect cost of a conflict could more than double the direct cost.[6]

9. Several estimates have been made of the total (direct and indirect) cost of the Iraq War. In their 2007 book, The Three Trillion Dollar War, Professor Joseph Stiglitz and Ms Linda Bilmes estimated that the total cost of US involvement in Iraq could be double the direct cost to the US Government.[7] The total cost included: veterans' future costs

(medical, disability and social security); other social costs; military cost adjustments; interest on debt incurred; and other macroeconomic costs.

10. Indirect costs include the costs of the inquiries that have been established to investigate aspects of the UK's intervention in Iraq. Those include:

- The Al-Sweady Public Inquiry, which reported in December 2014, cost £25m.[8]
- The Baha Mousa Public Inquiry, which reported in September 2011, cost £13m.[9]
- The cost of the Iraq Inquiry, which is published on the Inquiry's website.
- The Iraq Historic Allegations Team (IHAT), which was established in 2010, has a budget of £57.2m up to the end of 2019.[10]

11. The US Congress appropriated US$686bn for operations in Iraq between the US fiscal years 2002[11] and 2009.[12] That comprised:

- US$646bn (94 percent) for the US Department of Defense;
- US$36bn (five percent) for the US Department of State and the US Agency for International Development (USAID); and
- US$4bn (one percent) for the Department of Veterans Administration (DVA).

12. US Department of Defense figures included costs associated with the Commanders Emergency Response Program (CERPs) and the Iraq Security Forces Fund (ISFF). US Department of State and USAID figures included the cost of reconstruction, foreign aid programmes, and embassy operation and construction. DVA costs included medical programmes for Operation Iraqi Freedom veterans.

How the UK's intervention in Iraq was funded

13. There were three main sources of UK funding for the UK's operations in Iraq:

- departments' baseline spending settlements;
- the Reserve (including the Special Reserve); and
- inter-departmental funds (the Global Conflict Prevention Pool, the Conflict Pool and the Stabilisation Aid Fund).[13]

14. A department's budget comprises Departmental Expenditure Limits (DEL) and Annually Managed Expenditure (AME).

15. In general, DEL covers running costs and all programmed expenditure. It is split into Resource DEL (RDEL) (operating costs) and Capital DEL (CDEL) (new investment). From 2002/03, when full Resource Accounting and Budgeting was introduced, RDEL included 'non-cash' costs. The introduction of Resource Accounting and Budgeting is considered later in this Section.

16. Non-cash costs are costs which are not reflected by cash transactions, for example depreciation and provisions for bad debts.[14] They are included in budgets to ensure that the budgets reflect the full economic cost of activities.

17. AME relates to expenditure that is demand-led (for example, for the MOD, the payment of War Pensions) and therefore cannot be controlled by departments and accommodated within a structured budget process.

18. In the period covered by the Inquiry, the Treasury allowed departments to carry forward unspent funds from one financial year to the next under the End-Year Flexibility (EYF) system. Unspent funds would otherwise have to be returned to the Treasury.

19. The EYF system was replaced in 2011/12 by the Budget Exchange system.[15]

The roles of the Treasury and the Chancellor, and the Ministerial Code

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has overall responsibility for the work of the Treasury and is the Government's Finance Minister.[16]

The Treasury is the UK's economic and finance ministry, setting the direction of the UK's economic and fiscal policy. The finance ministry side of the department is responsible for overall fiscal policy, including control of public expenditure and strategic oversight of the UK tax system. The Treasury's economic ministry role includes responsibility for growth, infrastructure, productivity and oversight of the financial services sector. The Treasury is also responsible for the UK's overall macroeconomic strategy, including the setting of the monetary policy framework.

In his statement to the Inquiry, Sir Nicholas Macpherson, Permanent Secretary at the Treasury from 2005, stated that the Treasury had two principal roles in relation to Iraq:

- as an economics ministry, to help ensure the potential economic impacts of war in Iraq were taken into account in economic forecasting and policy-making, help plan the economic reconstruction of Iraq, and provide economic expertise to support the UK's post-conflict reconstruction efforts; and [15] Treasury, 2011 Budget, 23 March 2011.

[16] The Inquiry has drawn on a number of official sources to develop a statement of the responsibilities of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

- as a finance ministry, to ensure an appropriate level of funding was provided to achieve the UK's objectives in Iraq and that it was used cost-effectively.[17]

This Section describes the Treasury's involvement on Iraq in relation to both those roles. The Treasury's involvement in planning for and supporting Iraq's post-conflict economic reconstruction is described in Sections 6.4, 6.5 and 10.

The version of the Ministerial Code that was current in 2003 stated that the cost of a proposal should be calculated and discussed with the Treasury before that proposal was submitted for discussion at Cabinet level:

> "It is the responsibility of the initiating department to ensure that proposals have been discussed with other departments and the results of these discussions reflected in the memorandum submitted to Cabinet or a Ministerial Committee. Proposals involving expenditure or affecting general financial policy should be discussed with the Treasury before being submitted to the Cabinet or a Ministerial Committee. The result of the discussion together with an estimate of the cost to the Exchequer (or estimates, including the Treasury's estimate, if the department and the Treasury disagree) should be included, along with an indication of how the cost would be met (e.g. by offsetting savings). The estimate of the cost should identify any impact on other departments."[18]

20. Sir Nicholas Macpherson told the Inquiry that departmental settlements were the main source of funding for FCO activity in Iraq, including the UK's diplomatic presence in Baghdad and Basra, and for DFID's contribution to the humanitarian and reconstruction effort.[19] Before the invasion, the Treasury worked with departments to produce estimates of the potential cost of intervention and to ensure that, where appropriate, sufficient funding had been set aside within their existing budgets.

21. If departments were unable to fund activities from their departmental settlements, they could bid to the Treasury for additional funding from the Reserve.

22. The table below shows the departmental settlements for the MOD, the FCO and DFID from 2002/03 to 2009/10 (under the 2002, 2004 and 2007 Comprehensive Spending Reviews).[20]

DFID	3.9	4.0	4.0	4.9	5.3	5.5	5.7	6.6

23. The Reserve is a fund held by the Treasury intended for genuinely unforeseen contingencies which departments cannot manage from their own resources.[21]

24. Sir Nicholas Macpherson told the Inquiry that the MOD was funded through its departmental settlement to be ready for war, but not to go to war.[22] The costs of going to war – the net additional costs of military operations, or NACMO – were reclaimed by the MOD from the Reserve.

25. Sir Nicholas also told the Inquiry that the main call on the Reserve in relation to Iraq had been from the MOD, to pay for NACMO.[23] The Treasury had also accepted "small claims" against the Reserve from DFID and the FCO in relation to expenditure on Iraq that could not be met from their own resources or interdepartmental budgets.

26. NACMO included expenditure on Urgent Operational Requirements (UORs). UORs are urgent requirements for military equipment that arise due to the particular demands of a specific operational threat and may need to be delivered within a shorter period of time than is normal for defence procurement.[24]

27. The table below shows the size of the Reserve from 2002/03 to 2008/09, the percentage spent on the UK's intervention in Iraq, and the size of the Special Reserve.[25] The creation of the Special Reserve in November 2002 is described later in this Section.

28. The Global Conflict Prevention Pool (GCPP) and the Africa Conflict Prevention Pool (ACPP) were established in the 2001 Spending Review to fund peacekeeping and peace enforcement operations and conflict prevention programmes.[26]

29. The two Pools were financed by transfers of existing budgets (and activities) from the MOD, the FCO and DFID and the provision of additional funds by the Treasury.[27] The three departments took decisions collectively on allocations from the Pools.

30. The GCPP and ACPP budgets had two elements: programme spending and peacekeeping costs.[28] The peacekeeping budget was used to pay UK contributions to peace support operations mandated by multi-national or inter-governmental organisations. It also covered the costs of deploying UK personnel in both UN and non-UN peace support operations and the UK contribution to international criminal courts. The budget covered both assessed and non-assessed (or voluntary) contributions.

31. Sir Nicholas Macpherson told the Inquiry that the Government had intended that the Pools should promote a more co-ordinated approach across departments.[29]

32. The budget for the GCPP for 2003/04 was £483m, of which £378m was allocated to fund the UK's contributions to peacekeeping and peace enforcement operations and £105m was allocated for conflict prevention programmes.[30]

33. The ACPP and the GCPP were merged in April 2008 to form the Conflict Prevention Pool. A separate funding mechanism, the Stabilisation Aid Fund (SAF), was established in the same year to support stabilisation activity in Iraq and Afghanistan. The SAF was merged into the Conflict Prevention Pool in 2009.

34. The UK military also had access to significant amounts of US funding from CERPs, to spend on urgent relief and reconstruction needs.

35. The US Congress appropriated US$3.6bn for CERPs between 2004 and 30 June 2009, to be used by military commanders to address urgent relief and reconstruction needs in their areas of responsibility.[31] Of that, almost US$3.2bn was spent.

36. The US Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction (SIGIR) reported in July 2009 that, by April 2009, the US had spent or allocated to ongoing projects

US$351m from CERPs in the four Iraqi provinces comprising Multi-National Division (South-East) (MND(SE)).[32]

37. In comparison, between the UK financial years 2003/04 and 2008/09, DFID spent at least £100m in MND(SE)[33] and UK forces spent £38m from UK funds on Quick Impact Projects (QIPs).[34]

38. The UK Government has not been able to provide the Inquiry with information on the total amount of CERPs funding available to and used by UK military commanders, but has provided documents that show available CERPs funding in some financial years.[35]

39. MOD briefing provided for an October 2005 Parliamentary Question advised that US$74m of CERPs funding had been "received and expended" by MND(SE) in the financial years 2004/05 and 2005/06.[36]

40. MOD briefing for an October 2006 Parliamentary Question advised that US$66.2m of CERPs funding had been allocated to MND(SE) in the US fiscal year 2005/06.[37]

41. In comparison, in the UK financial year 2005/06, DFID spent some £35m on infrastructure and job creation in MND(SE)[38] and UK forces spent £3m from UK funds on QIPs.[39]

Estimates and arrangements for funding military operations

42. Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, wrote to Mr Blair on 31 May 2002 setting out the "preliminary conclusions" from the MOD's contingency planning for Iraq.[40] A copy of his minute was sent to Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

43. Mr Hoon described three options for UK military deployment:

- With three months' notice, the UK could deploy a medium-scale force comprising air and naval assets and a land force of 15,000 personnel. The cost of preparing that force to the required standard of readiness, including essential work to meet equipment shortfalls, would be between £500m and £800m.

- With six months' notice, the UK could deploy a large-scale force comprising air and naval assets and a land force of 35,000 personnel. The cost of preparing that force would be between £800m and £1.1bn.
- With nine months' notice, the UK could deploy the large-scale force at less risk. The cost of preparing that force would be between £900m and £1.2bn.

44. The costs of deployment and campaigning were additional to the cost of preparing those forces.

45. Mr William Nye, Head of the Treasury Defence, Diplomacy and Intelligence Team, provided Mr Brown with "some wider context" on 7 June.[41] Mr Nye advised that there would be four elements in the cost of military operations against Iraq:

- preparing for the operation;
- deployment;
- the campaign; and
- any follow-up operation, "e.g. a sustained peacekeeping deployment if part of Iraq was occupied".

46. Mr Nye advised that Mr Hoon's minute covered only the first of those elements. The MOD estimated the cost of deploying a large-scale force at £100m, plus a similar amount for bringing it back. Estimating the cost of a campaign was "impossible" in the absence of any concept of operations, but would be "several £100 millions". The MOD had "understandably" given no thought to costs "after the war", but:

> "… there must at least be the possibility of some medium-term deployment for peacekeeping or occupation. If on the scale of the Balkans, it would cost several £100 millions a year."

47. Mr Nye advised that, while a smaller military contribution would reduce costs, the MOD was "strongly in favour of the more expensive large-scale land contribution … Ostensibly this is for reasons of strategic influence." Another way to reduce costs would be to provide a more specialised contribution; for example, a land component, or an air component, but not both. The MOD argued that it was premature to close off any option until the US had a clear concept of operations.

48. Mr Nye stated that he assumed Mr Brown would not want to comment on Mr Hoon's minute on paper, but that he might want to factor those points into his discussions with Mr Blair.

[41] Minute Nye to Chancellor, 7 June 2002, 'Iraq: Potential Costs'.

49. Mr Brown told the Inquiry:

> "I think Mr Hoon wrote [to] me in June – I think the Treasury did a paper in June about these very issues. I was then advised … to talk to Mr Blair. I told him [Mr Blair] that I would not … try to rule out any military option on the grounds of cost. Quite the opposite … we understood that some options were more expensive than others, but we should accept the option that was right for our country."[42]

50. Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser, replied to Mr Hoon's minute of 31 May on 25 June, stating:

> "The Prime Minister has asked for further advice on precisely what steps would have to be taken now, including financial commitments, in order to keep open the possibility of deploying a large-scale force by the end of this year …"[43]

51. Mr Peter Watkins, Mr Hoon's Private Secretary, replied to Sir David on 26 June, providing an update on the MOD's understanding of US plans.[44] Mr Watkins stated that Mr Hoon believed that, before committing UK forces, Ministers would want to be clear on four issues including "whether the prospective outcome looks worth the risk, costs and losses". A key issue, which would determine the need to commit resources, would be whether the UK could "secure adequate influence for a large-scale contribution".

52. On 5 July, prompted by updates on US planning circulated by the MOD, Mr Nye advised Mr Mark Bowman, Mr Brown's Private Secretary, that Mr Brown should write to the MOD to propose that all options for UK participation in military operations (including smaller and more specialised options) should be costed, so that the Government could assess how much it wished to devote – in terms of risk to UK troops, the opportunity cost of withdrawing from other operations, and the financial cost – to securing a degree of influence over US policy and operations.[45] Mr Nye concluded:

> "No.10, MOD, and FCO officials are likely to take as read that the UK should participate if the US decides to go ahead, and on a large scale. Actually, we have some choices …"

53. The Treasury informed the Inquiry that Mr Brown decided not to write to the MOD.[46]

54. Mr Blair discussed Iraq with Mr Jack Straw (the Foreign Secretary), Mr Hoon, Lord Goldsmith (the Attorney General), Mr Alastair Campbell (Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy), Admiral Sir Michael Boyce (Chief of the Defence Staff) and other senior military officers and officials on 23 July.[47] Mr Brown was not present.

55. In a paper prepared for the meeting, the Cabinet Office invited Ministers to "note the potentially long lead times involved in equipping UK Armed Forces to undertake operations in the Iraqi theatre and agree that MOD should bring forward proposals for the procurement of Urgent Operational Requirements".[48]

56. The record of the meeting produced by Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, included the conclusions that:

- We should work on the assumption that the UK would take part in any military action. But we needed a fuller picture of US planning before we could take any firm decisions …
- The Prime Minister would revert on the question of whether funds could be spent in preparation for this operation."[49]

57. Mr Rycroft's record of the meeting was sent to the participants only.

58. Mr Campbell described the meeting in his diaries.[50] He recalled that Mr Blair had said that "he did not want any discussions with any other departments at this stage … He meant the Treasury."

59. Mr Rycroft told the Inquiry that Mr Blair followed up the question of funding for preparing for an operation through "separate contacts" with Mr Brown.[51] Mr Rycroft agreed with the Inquiry that, due to the nature of the relationship between Mr Blair and Mr Brown, matters involving Mr Brown were usually handled personally by Mr Blair, rather than through a letter or note to the Treasury. Mr Rycroft told the Inquiry that the use of that personal channel did not imply that Mr Brown was not aligned with UK policy.

60. The MOD provided No.10 with advice on options for a UK contribution to US-led military operations in Iraq on 26 July (see Section 6.1).[52]

61. The advice defined three options:

- Package 1 – an "in-place support package" using forces already in the region;
- Package 2 – an "enhanced support package" comprising Package 1 with additional air and maritime forces; and
- Package 3 – a "discrete UK package" based on deployment of an armoured division, in addition to the forces in Package 2.

62. Those three options provided the broad framework for discussions within the UK Government until the end of 2002.

63. An MOD official advised Mr Watkins on 30 July that in order to respond to a Ministerial decision on operations in Iraq, the MOD would need to submit a "strategic estimate" of additional costs to the Treasury "as soon as practicably possible".[53]

64. Mr Watkins forwarded that advice to Mr Hoon with the comment:

> "In principle, it would be sensible to do more staff work to refine costs … but, pending the PM/Chancellor discussion, it cannot involve financial commitments."[54]

65. Mr Watkins replied to the MOD official the following day, confirming that Mr Hoon had seen the advice and reporting:

> "The question of whether funds could be expended in preparation for an operation in Iraq is being considered separately elsewhere. In the meantime, no costs should be incurred … No estimates should be submitted to Treasury officials. I will minute further once the funding position is clearer."[55]

66. The MOD told the Inquiry that neither Mr Watkins nor any other official wrote to provide further advice on the funding position.[56]

67. On 4 September, in advance of a planned meeting between Mr Hoon and Mr Brown, Mr Nye briefed Mr Brown that the MOD officials had done little work to refine their cost estimates for preparing a medium and large-scale force, as they were under no pressure from Ministers to do so.[57] Neither had the MOD done any work to assess the cost of campaign itself. Mr Nye said that it would be useful for Mr Brown to emphasise that the Treasury needed to be involved in some of the discussions on military planning, to enable it "to be kept informed of the context of financial and strategic decisions".

68. The Treasury informed the Inquiry that the meeting between Mr Brown and Mr Hoon was one-to-one and no record was taken.[58]

69. Mr Watkins recorded the following day that Mr Hoon had, again, explained to Mr Brown the three options being considered by the UK and alerted him to the likely broad order costs of Package 2.[59]

70. A further minute from Mr Watkins stated that, at their 5 September meeting, Mr Hoon and Mr Brown had agreed to "meet periodically … so that Mr Hoon could keep Mr Brown in touch with our emerging thinking on the options for UK involvement in any military action and the implications for UORs".[60]

71. On 6 September, a Treasury official sent Mr Brown a paper on the global, regional and local (Iraqi) economic impact of war in Iraq.[61] The paper advised that, globally, a conflict could lead to a rise in the oil price of US$10 a barrel and a consequent reduction in global growth by 0.5 percentage points and a rise in inflation of between 0.4 and 0.8 percentage points. The paper did not consider the impact of a war on the UK economy.

72. The paper also considered Iraq's post-war needs. That analysis is described later in this Section.

73. The Inquiry has seen no indication that Mr Brown responded to the paper.

74. On 16 September, a Treasury official produced an analysis for Mr Ed Balls (Special Adviser to Mr Brown), at Mr Balls' request, on the implications of military action in Iraq for UK public spending.[62] The official suggested that a "central estimate" of the cost of "military action" might be £2.5bn, although that could rise considerably if the campaign was protracted or a large-scale occupation was required. The official also suggested that the cost of reconstruction was likely to be in the order of US$9bn, in addition to International Monetary Fund (IMF) and peacekeeping costs.

75. The official continued:

> "… the wider economic impact of conflict could be very significant … [R]educed economic growth would hit … revenues … and would feed through to higher AME forecasts.
>
> "… this year's Reserve is already heavily overcommitted. There is a very real risk that we will breach the DEL limit …
> "In summary … military action is very likely to constrain our TME [Total Managed Expenditure] and fiscal flexibility over this and possibly the next financial year."

76. The analysis was also sent to the Private Offices of Mr Brown and Mr Paul Boateng, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury.

77. Sir Nicholas Macpherson told the Inquiry:

> "I don't think at a macro level this intervention [Iraq] has had a significant effect on spending elsewhere … I think the peak year of spending was 2003/04, which was about £1.6bn. When you [the Government] are spending £500bn, £1.6bn is significant and it bears a lot of attention and focus, but it is not going to divert fiscal policy in a massive sense."[63]

78. Mr Brown told the Inquiry:

> "I think we managed to meet the requirements of Iraq and Afghanistan without having to cut other services …
> "… it did make my life more difficult, because we had to find £17bn over a period of time, but we thought and believed that these [costs] were manageable, given the priority that we attached to doing the things that we did."[64]

79. The £17bn referred to by Mr Brown represented the NACMO in Iraq and Afghanistan.

80. Mr Boateng told the Inquiry that the Treasury's analyses of the impact of war on the UK's public finances were not conducted with the intention of "second-guessing" Ministers, but to enable the Treasury to contribute to planning and policy discussions.[65]

81. The Treasury provided a more detailed analysis on the potential impact of intervention in Iraq on UK public finances for Mr Brown on 22 October.

Agreement on arrangements for funding Urgent Operational Requirements

82. Section 6.3 describes the increasing concern within the MOD over possible delays in procuring and delivering UORs for operations against Iraq arising from the decision in July not to engage the Treasury in military contingency planning.

83. On 19 September, in the context of discussions within the MOD on how to secure funding for a number of critical UORs relating to potential UK Special Forces operations in Iraq, the Private Office of Sir Kevin Tebbit, MOD Permanent Under Secretary, advised that Sir Kevin believed that Mr Hoon should discuss the issue of funding for UORs with Mr Brown "as soon as possible", which would be at their meeting scheduled for 23 September.[66]

84. Mr Watkins wrote to Sir David Manning on 20 September, advising that two issues needed to be addressed quickly:

- what potential UK force contribution should be presented to the forthcoming US Central Command (CENTCOM) planning conference the following week; and
- whether to replace army units already allocated to Operation FRESCO[67] so that they would be available if a land force contribution was approved.[68]

85. Mr Watkins advised that Mr Hoon believed that Package 2 (the air and maritime package, plus Special Forces) should be presented to the conference as a potential UK contribution.

86. Providing a land contribution in addition to Package 2 was "more complicated". The option required further development.

87. Mr Watkins wrote that Mr Hoon felt it would be "premature" to offer a land contribution on the same basis as Package 2:

> "… we should indicate to CENTCOM that we are still considering this option and that they should model two plans in parallel, one including the UK land force contribution and one without it."

88. Mr Blair discussed the contribution that might be offered to the US with Mr Hoon on 23 September (see Section 6.1). Mr Blair agreed with Mr Hoon that Package 2 could be offered as a potential UK contribution but there was a misunderstanding over whether the US should be informed that the UK was still considering a land option (Package 3).

89. Following the meeting, Mr Watkins informed officials in the MOD that:

> "The Prime Minister is content for us to proceed broadly as set out in my letter of 20 September. The Prime Minister remains very cautious about the viability of Package 3, not least because of its implications for our ability to meet other contingencies and the significant cost premium entailed."[69]

90. In his diaries, Mr Campbell described a meeting between Mr Brown and Mr Blair on 23 September.[70] Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had reported that Mr Brown "was basically just saying we could not afford a military conflict and making clear he had to be consulted on every piece of spending". Mr Campbell also described the very difficult relationship between Mr Blair and Mr Brown at this time.

91. There is no official note of the meeting and none of the witnesses referred to it in their evidence to the Inquiry.

92. Mr Brown and Mr Hoon met separately on 23 September to agree the process for funding UORs for Iraq.[71]

93. Before the meeting, Mr Hoon was advised by Mr Guy Lester, MOD Director Defence Resources and Plans, that it would make sense to use the arrangements in place for Afghanistan: Ministers would agree a "ceiling" on UOR expenditure, within which Treasury officials could authorise expenditure on individual requests without seeking approval from Treasury Ministers.[72] The MOD expected the first and most urgent tranche of UORs to cost £150m.

94. Mr Watkins commented on that advice:

> "We are told that Treasury officials are happy [to use the Afghanistan model], but Mr Brown may want to clear them [UOR requests] individually himself. This would create a major bureaucratic bottleneck."[73]

95. Mr Watkins' record of the 23 September meeting stated that Mr Brown's "initial line" was that he should approve each UOR individually, but "Mr Hoon persuaded him that this would not be practical or sensible".[74]

96. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Brown on 25 September, to confirm their agreement that the MOD would adopt a similar approach to managing Iraq UORs to that already in place for Afghanistan UORs, with an initial ceiling of £150m.[75] MOD and Treasury officials were tasked to work out the detailed arrangements.

97. In response to a request from Mr Brown on "how to handle future requests for Iraq UOR funding", a Treasury official wrote to Mr Bowman on 8 October 2002, describing how a UOR arrangement might operate and how the Treasury might "reduce the UOR bill" by arguing that UORs were in fact generic enhancements of military capability, and by ensuring that the MOD had not already planned to procure items presented as UORs.[76]

98. The Inquiry has seen no evidence that Mr Brown had asked for advice on the specific question of how to reduce the UOR bill.

99. Mr Brown told the Inquiry that all the MOD's claims for UORs had been met.[77] He also explained that the "ceiling" was not a limit on UOR expenditure, but an estimate of likely expenditure:

> "At all times we said, 'Here is the money … Once you have spent that, then we are prepared – and always were ready to and actually did – deliver more.'"

100. Mr Tom McKane, MOD Director General Resources and Plans from September 2002 to January 2006, who was responsible for establishing the arrangements for securing funding for UORs in the period leading up to the invasion, told the Inquiry that he was satisfied with the Treasury's response to the MOD's requests for UORs:

> "Inevitably … there is an anxiety and a concern on the part of the Ministry of Defence to get on with things … and it did take a month or so after my first engagement in this for the agreements [on UORs] to be reached … But thereafter, the process operated smoothly.
> "There were some, I think, who were probably frustrated at the fact … that we were given tranches of money … we would get quite quickly to the point where we had exhausted the first tranche and were then involved in the preparation of ministerial correspondence to secure the release of the next tranche …
> "… but I don't remember it [the use of tranches] being a major obstacle to the preparations."[78]

101. The provision of military equipment, including UORs, is described in Sections 6.3 and 14.

102. Mr Nye advised Mr Brown on 11 October that Mr Hoon was expected to write to Mr Blair shortly, setting out the military forces required for a campaign.[79] The Treasury had now established good communications with the MOD, and MOD officials had assured the Treasury that Mr Blair would be presented with "cost information".

103. While there were still huge uncertainties involved in forecasting costs, the MOD had provided the Treasury with "some indicative breakdowns" which the Treasury was scrutinising. The MOD estimated that Package 2 (predominantly air and maritime forces) was likely to cost up to £1bn, and Package 3 (Package 2 plus ground forces) between £1.5bn and £2bn.

104. Mr Nye invited Mr Brown to "consider whether the extra political impact for the UK of Package 3 merits the additional £0.5bn to £1bn cost (and of course the additional risk to British troops)".

[78] Public hearing, 2 July 2010, pages 35-36.
[79] Minute Nye to Chancellor, 11 October 2002, 'Iraq: Decisions Nearing'.

105. Mr Nye also identified the need to consider long-term, post-conflict military costs. The US appeared to envisage a "quite lengthy occupation/reconstruction effort". Mr Nye commented:

> "Although some in the MOD hope that British participation in the original conflict would exempt us from having to play a large role in the subsequent peacekeeping … this is not realistic … the UK may well face a situation like Kosovo, having to be involved in policing an occupied country post conflict: possibly £0.5 billion a year … for several years."

106. Mr Nye concluded: "If you want to influence the Prime Minister [Mr Blair] in considering the scale of the UK commitment, you should talk to him next week."

107. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 15 October, seeking a decision that week on whether the US should be offered Package 3 on the same basis as Package 2, as a possible UK contribution to a conflict.[80] Mr Hoon stated that Package 2 was likely to cost up to £1bn and Package 3 between £1.5bn and £2bn.

108. An MOD paper attached to Mr Hoon's minute stated that the larger the UK's contribution to military action in the war-fighting phase, the "more plausibly we will be able to argue that we have done our bit". It also stated that the MOD could not yet estimate the cost of all the components of a campaign: the cost estimates provided in the paper were therefore "ball-park figures".

109. Copies of the letter and attached paper were sent to Mr Brown, Mr Straw and Sir Andrew Turnbull, the Cabinet Secretary.

110. The following day, Sir David Manning sent Mr Blair his comments on Mr Hoon's minute.[81] Sir David described some of the arguments in the minute as "pretty dubious", including:

> "… if we help with the war fighting, we shall be spared the post-conflict washing up. It didn't work like that in Afghanistan. Experience shows that once you're in, you're in deep, without queues of grateful countries waiting to take over when the shooting stops."

111. Sir David suggested that Mr Blair might explore a number of questions with Mr Hoon, including: "Can we afford Package 3?"

112. Mr Blair, Mr Straw, Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce met on 17 October to discuss military options.[82] Mr Rycroft recorded that Mr Blair acknowledged the arguments in favour of Package 3, but:

> "… remained concerned about costs. He concluded that he wanted to keep open the option of Package 3. But we must not commit to it at this stage."

113. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that at that meeting, Mr Blair said "it was not no, but it was not yet yes, and he wanted more work done analysing the cost".[83]

114. On 22 October Mr Jon Cunliffe, Treasury Managing Director for Macroeconomic Policy and International Finance, sent Mr Brown a paper on the risks to the Treasury's objectives arising from a war in Iraq.[84] Mr Cunliffe identified nine main risks and assessed the likelihood and impact of each in four scenarios: no war; a short war; a protracted war; and a war involving weapons of mass destruction (WMD).

115. The nine main risks were:

- a substantial rise in public spending;
- lower growth, higher inflation and unemployment;
- negative productivity shock;
- public finances less sound;
- inflation deviates from target;
- loss of insurance capacity/risk of insurance failures;
- more IMF lending leading to higher UK gross debt;
- revival of popular pressure for lower fuel taxes; and
- developing countries knocked by oil prices, leading to lower growth.

116. On public spending, Mr Cunliffe assessed that indirect costs could more than double the direct costs. In the protracted war and WMD scenarios, the impact of a worsening economy on AME could match the military costs.

117. In his covering minute, Mr Cunliffe advised that the Treasury's main concern related to its "ability to maintain sound public finances, especially in the more pessimistic cases". There would be some risk to the "Golden Rule" in all three war scenarios; the risk would be much greater if a war involved WMD. Mr Cunliffe concluded by suggesting that Mr Brown might want to warn colleagues about the risk to public finances.

118. Section 6.1 describes the growing pressure from the MOD to offer Package 3 to the US for planning purposes.

119. On 31 October, Mr Blair, Mr Straw, Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce discussed the MOD's wish to offer Package 3 to the US for planning purposes.[85] Mr Blair asked about the additional costs associated with Package 3 and whether they had been discussed with the Treasury. Adm Boyce said that he believed that:

> "… if we [the UK] made a major financial contribution to the campaign through Package 3, we would be under less pressure to finance a big share of the post-conflict reconstruction effort."

120. The record of the meeting does not indicate whether Mr Blair's question about the costs of Package 3, and whether they had been discussed with the Treasury, was answered.

121. Mr Blair concluded that the MOD should tell the US that the UK was prepared to "put Package 3 on the same basis as Package 2 for planning purposes".

122. A copy of the record of the meeting was sent to Mr Bowman.

123. Mr John Dodds, who had replaced Mr Nye as Head of the Treasury Defence, Diplomacy and Intelligence Team, advised Mr Brown on 8 November 2002 that the Treasury's "instinct" was that Package 3 would cost £2.5bn, rather than the £1.5bn to £2bn estimated by the MOD.[86] That did not include any "follow-on" cost, such as peacekeeping or reconstruction.

124. Mr Brown received advice from a Treasury official on 17 November on whether to create an allocation in the Pre-Budget Report (PBR) to cover the cost of military action in Iraq.[87] The main advantage would be to enable the Treasury to set out, in a transparent way, the exceptional additional costs of military action, above the underlying state of public finances.

125. The allocation would cover the cost of military action in Iraq and the further costs of military occupation and/or a contribution to a stabilisation force. The official added that if Mr Brown was attracted to the idea of making such an allocation, it might be expanded to cover some of the existing costs relating to the war against terror.

126. The official also advised that, based on informal discussions with MOD officials, the military costs relating to "occupation and/or a stabilisation force" could be up to £1bn in the first year and up to £500m a year thereafter. The official commented:

> "From this it's clear that any future decision on a UK role in post-conflict Iraq should properly factor in the potential costs."

[87] Minute Treasury [junior official] to Chancellor, 17 November 2002, 'A PBR Allocation for Iraq?'

127. Mr Brown telephoned Mr Hoon on 27 November, to inform him that he would be making an allocation of £1bn in his PBR for "Defence issues".[88] Mr Brown reassured Mr Hoon that this was not an upper limit on expenditure, but rather a "purely nominal figure: it was neither an upper or lower limit". The usual process for securing funding from the Reserve would stand.

128. Mr Brown announced to Parliament later that day that the Government had "set aside to meet our international defence responsibilities a provision of £1 billion to be drawn on if necessary".[89]

129. Sir Nicholas Macpherson told the Inquiry that the decision to create a Special Reserve was driven by a Treasury assessment that the existing Reserve would not be sufficient to cover other Government contingencies while paying for the costs of Iraq.[90]

130. In late November, in the context of a submission to Mr Hoon on UORs, Mr McKane reported that the Treasury had asked the MOD for an estimate of the cost of post-conflict deployments.[91] Mr McKane advised Mr Hoon that, based on experience in the Balkans, the cost might be in the region of £1bn for the first year, and £400m for the following 18 months.

Agreement on arrangements for reclaiming NACMO

131. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Brown on 28 November to request an increase in the UOR ceiling from £150m to £300m and to secure agreement that the MOD should begin to capture all non-UOR additional costs (the net additional costs of military operations – NACMO), with a view to repayment from the Reserve in due course.[92]

132. Mr Brown replied on 9 December, agreeing to increase the ceiling for UORs to £300m and that the MOD should begin to capture NACMO, but adding that those costs should be contained within the UOR ceiling "until any [military] operation is initiated".[93]

133. Mr Blair agreed on 9 December that the MOD should plan on the basis of a possible decision to commit land forces, as early as 15 February 2003.[94] A copy of the letter recording Mr Blair's decision was sent to Mr Bowman.

134. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Brown on 13 December, warning him that Mr Blair's decision of 9 December would increase the rate at which the MOD incurred additional costs.[95] Mr Hoon requested an additional £200m for UORs, and also asked that Mr Brown reconsider his position that non-UOR NACMO should be contained within the UOR ceiling.

135. Mr Hoon attached a spreadsheet showing the MOD's actual and estimated costs (to April 2003) for "Iraq contingency planning", which totalled £1.65bn.

136. Copies of Mr Hoon's letter were sent to Mr Blair and Mr Straw.

137. A Treasury official advised Mr Brown on 17 December that he should agree both of Mr Hoon's requests.[96] On UOR costs, the official advised:

> "Some of this [UOR] spending is arguably for equipment that would have been bought anyway later … We should stress that in such cases we will claim back by either docking MOD's EYF, or reducing their Estimates accordingly next year."

138. On non-UOR NACMO, the official advised that if preparations were to move forward on the track agreed by Mr Hoon and Mr Blair, access to the Reserve was necessary. Preparing a force would cost about £650m and maintaining it at a state of readiness about £200m a month, whether the UK went to war or not. The official advised Mr Brown that the Treasury should put in place arrangements "that keep the costs clearly on the agenda", and that Mr Brown should ask Mr Hoon for monthly reports on current and planned activities. Those reports would provide the basis for "ongoing joint consideration of the costs of the strategy".

139. The official also advised that the £1.65bn figure represented the cost if the military operation was "cancelled end of March, clear up and go home in April". The costs of war-fighting, missiles and ammunition, and "post-conflict stabilisation" would be additional.

140. Mr Hoon telephoned Mr Boateng on 23 December to discuss access to the Reserve.[97] Mr Hoon's Private Secretary reported to MOD officials that Mr Boateng had said that any system needed to meet the MOD's needs, take account of "broader financial implications", and enable the Treasury to identify clearly that costs were genuinely additional.

141. Mr Boateng wrote to Mr Hoon later that day.[98] Mr Boateng agreed to increase the ceiling for UORs by £200m, to £500m. With regard to non-UOR NACMO, Mr Boateng stated that access to the Reserve was usually only granted once an operation had been "declared". In the current "preparatory phase", he offered to create a "distinct envelope for build-up costs", with four specific Heads of Expenditure (operation-specific training; air/sea charter; spares, maintenance and logistics; and other infrastructure elements), with an initial allocation of £500m. The Treasury would authorise and monitor expenditure within those Heads of Expenditure, rather than as a single block.

142. Mr Boateng asked that Mr Hoon provide fortnightly forecasts of UOR and non-UOR NACMO. The MOD would provide the first forecast on 16 January 2003.

143. Mr Boateng concluded: "Where further decisions are taken – for example over the call up of reserves or the deployment of significant numbers of troops to theatre – Gordon and I will of course stand ready to discuss funding issues."

144. Mr Watkins described that arrangement to MOD officials as "generally acceptable", and passed on Mr Hoon's thanks for negotiating it.[99]

145. Mr Boateng's Private Secretary wrote to Mr Watkins on 13 January, to "record the circumstances in which we have agreed that decisions should be cleared with Treasury Ministers".[100] Expenditure outside the four specific Heads of Expenditure within the non-UOR NACMO envelope, and "any policy decisions that will lead to future costs", would require Treasury approval.

146. Mr Watkins wrote against the proposal that the Treasury should be consulted on any policy decision with cost implications:

> "This is a try-on which we will correct in the reply."

147. Mr Boateng agreed an MOD request for "some flexibility" to transfer resources between the four Heads of Expenditure on 15 January.[101]

148. Mr Hoon's Private Secretary replied to the Treasury's letters of 23 December and 13 January on 16 January.[102] He stated that Mr Hoon "would, of course, continue to include the Chancellor in correspondence on major policy decisions which have expenditure implications".

149. The letter also provided the MOD's first detailed forecasts of expenditure on UOR and non-UOR NACMO, covering the period up to April 2003.

150. The MOD provided its first report on actual expenditure on UORs and non-UOR NACMO to the Treasury on 5 March.[103]

151. Section 6.5 describes discussions within the UK Government on whether the UK should take responsibility, in the post-conflict period, for a geographical sector in Iraq.

152. On 13 February, Mr McKane wrote to Mr Dodds setting out the MOD's assessments of the costs of military operations and the aftermath.[104]

153. Mr McKane advised that the cost of military combat operations, including "repairs, replenishment and reconfiguration", could be between £2.5bn and £3bn.

154. Mr McKane also provided the MOD's "outline 'first thoughts' projection" of the cost of maintaining a military presence in post-conflict Iraq. Mr McKane advised that the MOD had not yet been assigned "firm tasks" for the post-conflict period and that the size and type of forces required would depend on US plans. With that caveat, the MOD estimated that UK forces might be required for 30 months at a cost of £2.3bn (including a six-month deployment of HQ Allied Rapid Reaction Corps (ARRC), but excluding UORs related to military post-conflict tasks).

155. On 19 February, in advance of meetings with Mr John Snow, the US Secretary of the Treasury, and other G7 finance Ministers, Mr Brown received a number of papers on Iraq.[105]

156. A paper by Mr Dodds and a junior Treasury official provided the first comprehensive estimate of the cost of the UK's intervention in Iraq (including military and non-military, conflict and post-conflict costs).[106] The advice on non-military costs is described later in this Section.

157. The officials advised that the Treasury's best estimate of the cost of UK military combat operations was now £3bn over the three financial years from 2002/03, with an associated £400m in RAB costs over the three financial years from 2003/04. The MOD's estimate remained lower: the Treasury doubted that the MOD had shared with it the full cost of replacing and restocking armaments and equipment used in a conflict.

158. The officials advised that the Treasury was "now starting to get some sense" from the MOD on the cost of post-conflict peacekeeping/stabilisation. While no decision had yet been taken on whether to contribute UK forces after a conflict:

> "In practice once we are on the ground, unless contributions from other nations are available the political pressure to stay will be intense."

159. There were a number of ways that an "occupation … force" might be organised. The "biggest commitment, and hence the most expensive" would be if the UK became responsible for a particular geographical sector. The Treasury's estimate reflected that commitment.

160. The MOD had not yet provided firm estimates for how much such an occupation force (including responsibility for a geographical sector) might cost. Internal Treasury work suggested £500m in 2003/04 and £1bn in 2004/05 (in addition to the cost of military combat operations).

[106] Minute Treasury [junior official] to Chancellor, 19 February 2003, 'Update on Iraq' attaching Paper Treasury, 19 February 2003, 'Iraq Conflict – Public Expenditure Impact'.

161. Mr Brown also received a minute from Mr Dodds which highlighted the potential implications of the UK taking overall responsibility for a geographical sector in Iraq:

> "This is a decision that will have substantial public expenditure implications. If there were a UK sector we would find ourselves locked into the management of the aftermath for a substantial period (perhaps as long as five years) rather than allowing other countries – who will not have borne any costs of the conflict itself – to make their contribution. The net additional cost to the UK is difficult to quantify but would certainly be hundreds of millions of pounds a year."[107]

162. Mr Dodds added that there were other reasons why a UK sector would be unattractive. The need to bring in expertise from the widest possible range of sources and to avoid the perception that the UK was occupying "part of the Arab world" argued for a more internationalist approach.

163. Mr Dodds advised that Treasury officials were taking every opportunity to stress to FCO and MOD colleagues that Mr Brown would want to have an input to any decision on sectorisation, and recommended that Mr Brown underline that point himself with Mr Blair, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon.

164. Mr Brown and Mr Boateng received a further update on military costs from a Treasury official the following day.[108] The official reported that the Treasury now had the MOD's first estimates of the likely total cost of conflict in Iraq "if a decision is made to stay … and provide a medium term stabilisation/peace keeping force". The upper limit, based on what was feasible in military terms, was a two-year commitment at a total cost of £1.6bn. The official commented:

> "The extent to which any of this is optional is unclear. We think that, because of our Geneva convention obligations, it will be impossible to resist keeping a substantial force in theatre for at least six months post the end of fighting … In practice the emerging politics of a post-conflict Iraq point to a much more substantial commitment both in terms of size and length of stay."

165. On 6 March, Mr Blair chaired a meeting on post-conflict issues with Mr Brown, Mr Hoon, Ms Clare Short (the International Development Secretary), Baroness Symons (joint FCO/DTI Minister of State for International Trade and Investment, representing Mr Straw), Sir Michael Jay (FCO Permanent Under Secretary) and "other officials".[109]

166. In an annotated agenda for the meeting, the Iraq Planning Unit (IPU) invited Ministers to take a view on a number of key post-conflict issues, including whether to seek "general UK responsibility for the administration of any geographic area of Iraq in the medium term".[110]

167. Mr Dominick Chilcott, the Head of the IPU from February 2003 to June 2004, told the Inquiry that there was:

> "… a great deal of hesitancy within Whitehall about the concept of a British sector mainly because of the resources that would be involved in making a success of it … the Treasury and DFID both expressing, for slightly different reasons, hesitancy about the assumption that there would be a British sector."[111]

168. Mr Brown received a number of papers from Treasury officials before the meeting.

169. A paper produced by Mr Dodds highlighted the financial implications of the assumption in "US/UK military planning" that UK forces would take responsibility for an area of Iraq after the conflict.[112]

170. Mr Dodds advised that the Chiefs of Staff had estimated that the UK could sustain a brigade and headquarters (around 10,000 troops) in Iraq indefinitely, and that this force would be sufficient to fulfil the UK responsibilities for Basra Province.

171. Mr Dodds advised that the cost of such an ongoing operation was likely to be about £1bn a year. It was a reasonable assumption that the UK's commitment would last "at least two years and possibly significantly longer". He continued:

> "We have pressed MOD on how these costs might be reduced. The options are: > a. to tell the US that we feel we have played our part after Phase IVA [immediate post-conflict stabilisation] and that other coalition partners must be found to take on our role …;
> b. to give up the leadership role and to contribute a small component to the leadership of others;
> c. to lead a sector … with a range of forces drawn from other countries.
> To keep cost to a minimum, we should scale down our commitments as rapidly as possible."

172. Mr Dodds summarised his arguments:

> "• On public finance grounds there is a strong case for stepping back from military leadership in the aftermath and allowing other countries to take on this role.
> • If Ministers want Britain to continue to be in a leadership position there will be significant costs …

- There are risks that our taking on military leadership will result in our being sucked into wider responsibilities for reconstruction with even higher costs."

173. Mr Dodds told the Inquiry why he had written that paper:

> "… I think we had a specific request … from the Chancellor's Office for a piece of advice on the aftermath and I think what had happened was that it had become clear, quite suddenly really, to the Chancellor … to the Treasury, that there was a set of options being considered for the role that the UK [military] might play … in Phase IV …"[113]

174. Mr Dodds told the Inquiry that the Treasury's earlier work had focused on the major conflict phase of operations, using a three-year planning framework. However:

> "… it suddenly became clear to us … if we had been wiser, we might have kind of anticipated this, but it was a bit of a surprise … that there were discussions going on between parts of the UK Government and others around the role that the UK might play, which had the potential to see us in Iraq for significantly longer than we had been initially supposing.
> "… the Treasury wasn't in the loop before early … March, around this thinking, and …. when this thinking emerged, there … appeared to have been an assumption on behalf of some other parts of government that this was another thing where … the Treasury would just sign the cheques … without being involved in the strategic decision."

175. Mr Brown also received a paper from a Treasury official on the potential impact of all military and non-military expenditure in Iraq on public expenditure.[114] The best estimate of the cost of UK military combat operations was £3.1bn. Maintaining a "medium-term stabilisation/peace-keeping force" might cost up to £1bn a year for two years. The official advised that:

> "… whilst the costs of the actual fighting are now pretty inescapable we still have a window of opportunity to exert some influence over the scale of this post-conflict commitment."

176. The 6 March meeting is described in detail later in this Section.

177. The 14 March meeting of the Ad Hoc Group on Iraq (AHGI)[115] was advised that the IPU was considering how best to approach other donors for support on reconstruction, and that the FCO was considering whether there was scope to approach other countries to contribute to UK military campaign costs (though the prospects were not good).[116]

Cash contributions to Operation GRANBY

There was precedent for approaching other governments to contribute to UK military costs. Other governments pledged over £2bn to the UK to cover the costs incurred on Operation GRANBY, the UK contribution to the international response to Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in 1990.[117] The cost of Op GRANBY was some £2.5bn.

178. Treasury officials advised Mr Boateng on 14 March that the MOD's estimate for infrastructure costs within the NACMO envelope included £10m for:

> "CIMIC – Civilian-Military co-operation. This spend is for force protection with the goal of pacifying local, potentially aggressive populations … This is an integral part of military operations and is still within agreed control totals – due to over-forecasting in other areas …"[118]

179. The MOD subsequently referred to that allocation as being for QIPs.[119]

180. On 17 March, Cabinet took collective responsibility for the conclusion that:

> "… the diplomatic process was now at an end. Saddam Hussein would be given an ultimatum to leave Iraq; and the House of Commons would be asked to endorse the use of military action against Iraq to enforce compliance, if necessary."[120]

181. Mr Brown told the Inquiry how he had responded to advice from Treasury officials that he should raise the issue of the cost of the military options being considered by the Government:

> "I … made it clear that the military option had to be one that was best for the military, and that the Treasury would not in any way interfere and suggest that there were cost grounds for choosing one option against another. That was not our job. The Treasury was there to advise on how we could deal with the financial issues that arose from the military decisions and the political decisions that were made.
> "So there was no time from June [2002] when the Treasury said, 'This is a better military option because it is cheaper or less costly'. At every point, I made it clear that we would support whatever option the military decided upon with the Prime Minister and the Cabinet and that there would be no financial barrier to us doing what was necessary to be done.[121]

182. Mr Blair described the Government's planning for a post-Saddam Iraq in his 14 January 2011 statement to the Inquiry. He wrote that, on funding:

> "… the Chancellor [Mr Brown] had throughout made it clear resources would not be an obstacle. The Treasury had made certain calculations of the cost both of the initial action and the aftermath. The Chancellor was present at Cabinet meetings in the run-up to the conflict. Throughout he made it clear resource was not a constraint. Subsequently he was part of the War Cabinet. Of course the Treasury queried and questioned costings. They always did. But at no point did anyone say to me: the Treasury are stopping us doing what need. So I see in evidence to the Inquiry that resource issues were being raised with some frustration by officials. I can only say that had such frustrations been raised with me, I would have acted on them and I believe the Chancellor would have been fully supportive."[122]

Estimates and allocations for non-military activities

Humanitarian assistance and reconstruction

183. A Treasury official sent Mr Brown a paper on the global, regional and local (Iraqi) economic impact of "war" in Iraq on 6 September 2002.[123] The official's analysis of the global economic impact of war is described earlier in this Section.

184. As part of his analysis of the local (Iraqi) economic impact, the official assessed the contribution that the IMF, the World Bank, bilateral donors, the UN and the Paris Club (through debt relief) had made to meeting the "post-war challenge" in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY), East Timor and Afghanistan, under five headings: reconstruction; institution-building; economic stabilisation; economic transition; and peacekeeping.

185. The official concluded that the cost of "putting a country back on its feet" could be high. The FRY had already received US$10bn in support (excluding IMF support). Iraq could be "even more expensive", given:

- the possibility that a conflict could cause significant damage, and the existing poor state of Iraq's infrastructure;
- the need to stabilise the economy, including by addressing Iraq's huge external debt;

- the need for a large peace-keeping force "to keep a lid on the ethnic and religious tensions that Saddam's dictatorship has hidden for so long"; and
- the pressure for a "generous [reconstruction] package, given the perception in the region that invading Iraq is of dubious legality and worth".

186. On who would pay for that generous package, the official assessed that:

> "… the US might expect Iraq to pick up the bill after a short 'bridging' period, especially as – with investment – oil revenues could quickly exceed US$20 billion per year.
> "But it is more likely that strong pressure will come to bear on the US and its allies to pay the lion's share, given their role in the war …"

187. The official did not consider what the UK's contribution to meeting post-war costs might be.

188. The Inquiry has seen no evidence that Mr Brown responded to this analysis, or that it was circulated outside the Treasury.

189. Mr Brown told the Inquiry that the Treasury was among the first to consider the challenges involved in reconstruction.[124]

190. From 20 September 2002, the Ad Hoc Group on Iraq (AHGI) co-ordinated all non-military cross-government work on post-conflict issues (see Section 6.4). The AHGI was chaired by the Cabinet Office.

191. Mr Alistair Fernie, Head of DFID's Middle East and North Africa Department, circulated a draft paper on the potential humanitarian implications of conflict in Iraq to members of the AHGI on 11 October, with the caveat that the paper had not yet been seen by Ms Short or other departments.[125]

192. The draft paper stated that:

> "Any large-scale UK humanitarian response would require additional funding from the Central Reserve. DFID's existing small (£6m) humanitarian programme in Iraq is fully committed; available humanitarian funds within CHAD [DFID's Conflict and Humanitarian Affairs Department] are likely to be grossly insufficient and most of DFID's Contingency Reserve has already been allocated."

193. On 4 November, Mr Fernie invited Ms Short to agree that a revised version of the paper should be shared with the US as a work in progress.[126] He advised that the revised paper incorporated her comments on an earlier draft. On funding, in place of the statement above, the paper stated:

> "A large-scale regional response … would certainly test the already stretched human resource and monetary capacity of many agencies and donors."

194. Mr Fernie's minute was copied to the Private Office of Mr Suma Chakrabarti, DFID Permanent Secretary.

195. Ms Short agreed that the paper could be shared with the US, subject to the inclusion of an explicit reference to DFID's lack of financial resources to cover the humanitarian contingencies considered in the paper.[127]

196. Ms Short held a meeting with DFID officials on 18 November to discuss Iraq.[128] Ms Anna Bewes, Ms Short's Private Secretary, recorded that the meeting had agreed that it would be important to cost each military option, including both military and "realistic humanitarian" costs. Ms Short was concerned that not only was no money set aside for humanitarian activity, but the issue was not even being considered.

197. Mr Fernie set out his understanding of Ms Short's concern in an email to DFID colleagues the following week:

> "… HMT [the Treasury] have been talking to MOD only about the military costs without taking into account the costs to the international community of any humanitarian response, post-Saddam transitional administration and/or reconstruction … The SoS [Ms Short] is particularly keen to make clear that DFID cannot find substantial funds for any such work from our existing budgets."
> "We [DFID] are trying to cobble together some figures of possible costs – all a bit speculative … but the point at this stage is to get others in Whitehall thinking about it."[129]

198. On 3 December, Mr Fernie reported to Dr Nicola Brewer, DFID Director General Regional Programmes, that there had been no progress in interesting the Cabinet Office or the Treasury in costing "various scenarios".[130] Mr Jim Drummond, Assistant Head (Foreign Affairs) of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), and the AHGI had both given a "clearly negative response". The "Cabinet Office line" was that if DFID thought it would incur unaffordable extra costs, it should bid to the Treasury. Mr Dodds had expressed some concern over international burden-sharing, but had shown "little interest" in Ms Short's concerns and had thought that there would be "no appetite" in the Treasury for producing "Whitehall-wide" costings. DFID's Conflict and Humanitarian Affairs Department (CHAD) was working up preliminary costings, but had "no consumer for this product".

199. Mr Fernie asked Dr Brewer for her advice on how to proceed:

> "Do we need to take this up at a higher level in CO [the Cabinet Office] or HMT [the Treasury]? Or do as CO says and start circulating some large-ish figures around Whitehall?"

200. Dr Brewer replied on 5 December.[131] She advised that she had spoken to Mr Peter Ricketts, the FCO Political Director, who had been:

> "… slightly more willing to acknowledge that the likely costs … should be factored into the decision-making process. But I got no sense at all that the FCO would either push for this or support us in doing so. Their sense is that the Prime Minister's mind will be made up by other factors."

201. Dr Brewer suggested that the issue could be raised by Mr Chakrabarti with Sir David Manning and Permanent Secretaries, or by Ms Short at Cabinet.

202. DFID officials reported the lack of progress to Ms Short on 10 December.[132] Ms Short agreed that officials should raise US and DFID cost estimates at the next AHGI, and directed that DFID officials should intensify discussions with the Treasury on costings.

203. There is no reference to a discussion on this issue in the records of the 13 December 2002 and 10 January 2003 meetings of the AHGI.[133]

204. The Inquiry has seen no indications that DFID raised this issue again.

205. In mid-December 2002, a DFID official advised Ms Short that the MOD did not seem to have recognised that, for a period after any conflict, the UK military would "find themselves in the frontline in caring for injured and vulnerable civilian populations".[134] The military would need to be resourced to fulfil this responsibility. Dr Brewer said that she would speak to the MOD.

206. At the end of December 2002, the focus of the Chiefs of Staff and UK military planners switched from northern to southern Iraq, creating a contingent liability that the UK would be responsible for the post-conflict occupation and administration of a UK Area of Responsibility (AOR) in the region around Basra.

207. The Cabinet discussed Iraq on 16 January 2003.[135]

208. Ms Short said that work on post-conflict issues needed to be taken forward urgently and emphasised the need for extra resources, the potential effect of chemical and biological weapons on civilians and the importance of involving the UN.

209. Summarising the discussion, Mr Blair said that the "priorities for the immediate future" included preparatory work on planning the aftermath of any military action.

210. On 21 January, at Ms Short's request, Mr Fernie provided advice on "how to maximise the chances of securing additional funding from the Treasury to cover the costs of [a] DFID humanitarian response".[136]

211. Mr Fernie recommended that Ms Short should speak, rather than write, to Mr Brown. A letter would invite a formal response, and Treasury officials were likely to caution Mr Brown against providing any broad assurance on funding and might recommend that DFID "unpick" its 2003/04 spending plan, to be agreed shortly, in order to provide more funding for Iraq.

212. Mr Fernie continued:

> "Mr [Mark] Lowcock's [DFID Director Finance and Corporate Performance] advice is that the best time to extract maximum funds from the central Reserve is when the political pressure is at its height. We might guess that such a time will come in a month or so – by which time budgets for our existing programmes would be more secure, with our 2003/04 framework finalised and on its way to publication."

213. Ms Short commented: No – I don't want to ring Ch X [the Chancellor of the Exchequer] … I wanted to put humanitarian considerations into Gov[ernment] mind not just to squeeze some money."[137] Rather than write or speak to Mr Brown, she would write to Mr Blair. That letter was sent on 5 February.

214. Ms Short described DFID's preparations to respond to a humanitarian crisis in Iraq in the House of Commons on 30 January.

215. Ms Short's briefing for the debate included, at her request, a figure for the UK's "responsibility within the international system" for contributing to humanitarian relief efforts.[138] The briefing stated that the UK's Gross National Income (GNI) was 5.5 percent of the total GNI of members of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) in 2000. The UK would not expect to contribute much more than that percentage to any international humanitarian relief effort.

216. During the debate, Ms Short reported that the US had committed to fund in full the recent UN appeal for US$137m to enable UN agencies to prepare their responses to a humanitarian crisis.[139]

217. In response to a question from Mr Crispin Blunt about the resources available to DFID, Ms Short stated that:

> "… the UK's contribution to any humanitarian crisis throughout the world, as determined by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, is just over 5 percent – that is all."

Ms Short continued:

> "… my department's budget has virtually doubled since 1997, but is under strain … We have a Contingency Reserve and Iraq would be prioritised. However, I have just been in Africa, where there is a real fear about resources being taken away from southern Africa, the horn of Africa, the Afghan people, the West Bank and Gaza – that would be wrong and we would not contemplate it. We will play our part in the international system, but the department is not flush with resources – I must frankly warn the House that they are short."

218. On 31 January, a DFID official provided advice to Ms Short, at her request, on how much the UK might be expected to contribute to "humanitarian relief/reconstruction" in Iraq in the event of military action.[140]

219. The official provided a draft DFID paper which considered in detail Iraq's possible post-war needs under a number of scenarios. The paper used current Oil-for-Food (OFF) programme expenditure plans as a "benchmark" for a future humanitarian and reconstruction programme, and then considered how those plans would be affected by a number of factors including the nature of any conflict, the availability of Iraqi oil revenues, and how Iraq's external debt and reparation claims would be resolved.

220. The official advised that FCO and Treasury officials had seen an earlier draft of the paper, and that the Treasury was using roughly similar figures in assessing the total cost to the UK of military engagement in Iraq (an issue in which there was increased Ministerial interest).

221. In her covering minute, the official summarised the main conclusions of the paper:

- Total humanitarian costs could reach US$12bn in the first year after any conflict, if the OFF programme collapsed.

- Reconstruction could cost between US$2bn and US$10bn a year over a two to three-year period, depending on the impact of the military conflict, the level of forgiveness secured on debt and other claims, and oil revenues.
- If the UK provided 5.6 percent[141] of the total humanitarian/reconstruction costs (in line with the UK's share of OECD GNI), the UK's contribution to "total humanitarian/reconstruction costs" could reach US$640m (£400m) a year for the next three years, under a "high case military/low case oil revenue scenario".

222. The draft paper stated that DFID had, ''traditionally' (Balkans/Afghanistan)", contributed between eight and 10 percent of total relief/reconstruction costs. On that basis, under a high case military/low oil revenue scenario, the UK contribution could be in excess of US$1bn a year.

223. The official also provided advice on how to raise awareness across the UK Government about the potential costs of a major humanitarian operation, "without committing DFID's budget at this stage or jeopardising other programmes".

224. The official recommended that DFID should continue to discuss funding with other departments at official level, but seek to postpone discussions on the detailed financial implications for DFID until its 2003/04 spending plans had been agreed. DFID's Iraq team and DFID's Finance Department would continue to work closely together "on tactics to avoid early discussion about the implications [of a UK contribution] for DFID's budget, bearing in mind Mr Lowcock's earlier advice". The Treasury would be keen to share the burden across the international community, to minimise the UK contribution.

225. Ms Short commented on that advice:

> "Let us be clear … we have [a] Contingency Reserve of £100 mill[ion] and all our systems strained [we] cannot take money from other poor countries. We are not asking for or promising money. DFID prob[ably] has no more than £50 mill[ion]. If HMG wants to provide more – so be it but DFID limited."[142]

226. Ms Short wrote to Mr Blair on 5 February to provide an update on humanitarian planning.[143] In that context, she advised that a "fair share" for the UK of a major humanitarian/reconstruction operation would be around 5.6 percent, equal to the UK's share of OECD GNI. Under one scenario, that could equate to £440m a year for three years.

227. The letter did not describe that scenario or provide a cost for any others.

228. Ms Short also advised that DFID's resources and those of the international system were already under severe strain.

229. Ms Short concluded:

> "The immediate question is how big a part the UK should play in humanitarian preparations. It would be helpful to know whether you think the UK should remain modest or aim higher in terms of our humanitarian contribution to resolving the Iraq crisis. If you want the UK to take more of a lead … then I would be willing to do that. But it would need to be an effort on behalf of the whole Government, not just my department.
> "I think the way in which you could best help is to make clear across the system that you want humanitarian considerations to be given more weight. In addition it would help if we could settle the financial questions."

230. Ms Short announced in Parliament on 10 February that she had provided £3.5m to support UN humanitarian contingency planning.[144]

231. On 11 February, a Treasury official invited Mr Brown's comments on officials' "first thoughts" on Treasury policies in a post-Saddam Hussein Iraq.[145] The official identified the Treasury's "two main finance ministry interests" in Iraq as ensuring its prosperity and stability while fairly sharing the costs of achieving this. The costs of ensuring Iraq's prosperity and stability were "potentially massive", and comprised peacekeeping costs (the UK contribution to peacekeeping in the FRY had peaked at £325m in 1999/2000), humanitarian assistance, environmental costs, reconstruction and economic stabilisation (including IMF lending). An "emerging policy position" would be to:

- maximise the Iraqi contribution, initially by maintaining the OFF programme;
- push for debt rescheduling, to ensure that Iraqi contributions were not knocked off course by having to resume crippling debt service. The cost would "conveniently fall to probable non-combatant countries";
- maximise contributions from development banks;
- push for bilateral contributions "to take into account military contributions", assuming that the UK military contribution was significant; and
- ensure a finance ministry/international financial institution (IFI) lead on financing issues, with a clear understanding that no money was committed until needs were properly understood.

232. The Treasury told the Inquiry that Mr Brown did not comment.[146]

233. Mr Blair convened the first Ministerial meeting on humanitarian issues with Mr Straw, Mr Hoon, Ms Short, Adm Boyce and No.10 officials in the margins of Cabinet on 13 February.[147] Sir Michael Jay, Sir Kevin Tebbit and Mr Chakrabarti were not present.

234. In advance of the meeting, Mr Desmond Bowen, Deputy Head of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat, advised Sir David Manning that:

> "The Prime Minister will … want to seek Clare [Short]'s engagement in the potential humanitarian relief operation and reconstruction – which will need funding and the commitment of human resources as a priority."[148]

235. IPU briefing for Mr Straw set out three objectives for the meeting, including:

- encourage Ms Short to engage fully in planning;
- persuade Ms Short that she should allow DFID money to finance small scale [reconstruction] projects in the area administered by a UK commander."[149]

236. At the meeting, in response to a question from Mr Blair about whether the UK should "take the lead on humanitarian action in the southern zone", Ms Short said that she was in favour.[150] The UK could do an "exemplary job" in the zone on both the military and humanitarian fronts.

237. Mr Blair concluded that the UK should seek to take the lead on humanitarian issues in the southern zone of Iraq.

238. Ms Short wrote to Mr Blair the following day, 14 February, to provide an update on humanitarian preparations and the role of the UN.[151] Ms Short confirmed that, within an agreed international framework set out in a second resolution, there was a "great opportunity" for the UK to play an exemplary humanitarian role in the South:

> "But as I made clear in my letter of 5 February, my department has tight budgetary constraints … Without some understanding on finance, I cannot responsibly commit DFID to the exemplary partnership with MOD which we discussed."

239. Mr Blair wrote on his copy of the letter: "We must get the US to accept the UN role."[152]

240. On 17 February, a DFID official sought Ms Short's views on the implications of the decision that "the UK should take the lead on humanitarian issues in the southern zone of Iraq, and do an exemplary job on both the military and humanitarian front", and in particular how it should balance its limited human and financial resources between playing an exemplary role in the South and supporting the UN and wider international effort across the country and the region.[153]

241. The official recommended that DFID prepare for four roles:

- Support humanitarian needs nationally and in the region, primarily through the UN and Red Cross/Red Crescent movement;
- Work alongside and influence humanitarian action by US DART [Disaster Assistance Relief Teams];
- Work alongside the UK military;
- Undertake DFID bilateral humanitarian action."

242. The official identified a number of "further pre-deployment steps which we need to initiate now to be adequately prepared to play these roles effectively":

- Establish a forward base in Kuwait to allow DFID to build its capacity for deployment into Iraq as humanitarian needs arose and security allowed. A forward base would give DFID an "immediate response capability".
- Deploy a Humanitarian Adviser to Jordan to liaise and work with humanitarian partners.
- Undertake regional assessment missions, including to Cyprus, Egypt, Turkey and Iran.
- Deploy a civil-military Humanitarian Adviser to 1 (UK) Div in Kuwait, and undertake regular visits to CENTCOM in Qatar.
- Second consultants and provide equipment to support humanitarian co-ordination, initially to the UN Humanitarian Information Centre (HIC) in Cyprus.

243. The official warned:

> "If we do not have people and assets in place and ready in time, we will not be able to respond quickly and as may be needed. Once conflict has begun logistical constraints will make it extremely difficult to respond unless we have put the preparations in place."

244. The official concluded by considering resource constraints. Until DFID received any indication from the Treasury or No.10 that further funds would be forthcoming in the event of conflict, it was planning on the basis that it could access a substantial share of DFID's Contingency Reserve to supplement its CHAD emergency funds and its Iraq programme funds.

[153] Minute DFID [junior official] to PS/Secretary of State [DFID], 17 February 2003, 'Iraq – Contingency Planning: Deployment Plan'.

245. If a total of £60m was available from those sources in 2003/04, DFID planned initially to commit £35m to meet immediate relief needs. Exactly how that amount should be allocated would depend on the nature of the conflict and other factors, but an indicative allocation might be:

- £20m to support the work of UN agencies, the Red Cross and NGOs across Iraq;
- £5m to fund QIPs delivered by the UK military, to help generate stability within communities; and
- £10m for DFID's own rapid response capacity.

246. The official commented:

> "Under many scenarios, £35 million is unlikely to be perceived as an adequate UK contribution to any immediate relief effort, particularly if OFF collapses. Leaving £25 million for further humanitarian need, medium-term rehabilitation and reconstruction could also look very sparse. Action in response to the Secretary of State's previous two letters [Ms Short's letters of 5 and 14 February] to the Prime Minister on this rests with No.10."

247. The official also advised:

> "If the military is involved in the direct delivery of humanitarian assistance, there will be an issue about who pays. MOD claim to be financially stretched and are keen for DFID to pay."

248. Ms Short held a meeting the following day to discuss that advice, attended by Dr Brewer, Mr Fernie and other DFID officials.[154] Mr Chakrabarti did not attend, but a copy of the record of the meeting was sent to his Private Office.

249. Ms Short said that she was concerned that much of what was proposed in the submission "pre-supposed the financial comfort we had so far failed to receive from the Treasury". She was "unwilling, without a clear financial package, to plan to do more than support the UN, key international agencies, and perhaps provide some funding to the UK military for QIPs". She had repeatedly made it clear (to Mr Blair in person and in writing, and in the House of Commons) that DFID did not have the financial resources to play a major role.

250. Within those constraints, Ms Short was content for officials:

- to start discussions about possible support to non-governmental organisations (NGOs) not yet involved in Iraq that had specific technical expertise in areas such as water and sanitation;

---

[154] Minute Bewes to DFID [junior official], 19 February 2003, 'Iraq Contingency Planning: Update'.

- to work closely with the US on a humanitarian response, but only if there was an overarching UN mandate and financial cover; and
- "in principle", to make money available to the UK military for QIPs, to be re-examined if there was no UN mandate and the UK military was "working under a US lead".

251. Ms Short did not agree to establish a forward base in Kuwait on the grounds that it would imply that military action was a certainty. DFID could make scoping visits to the region and arrange for vehicles to be ready for transportation, but the equipment should not be pre-positioned in the region. Ms Short "accepted that this would mean that DFID would not be prepared for an immediate response in the event of military action or a humanitarian crisis on the ground". She suggested that DFID consider providing more funds to the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), which was undertaking similar preparations to those recommended by DFID officials.

252. Ms Short also rejected the deployment of DFID staff to Jordan and the HIC in Cyprus, on the grounds that it pre-supposed a significant role for DFID, which it was as yet unable to promise.

253. The meeting agreed that DFID:

> "… should work through the range of different scenarios within which we might have to act and in each case consider how we would respond in terms of financial support and the channels through which it could be provided."

254. In the context of discussion on those scenarios, Ms Short stated that without additional resources, DFID "would not be able to take up the exemplary role, working with the UK military, that the PM had asked us to".

255. Dr Brewer told the 19 February Chiefs of Staff meeting that Ms Short, while working towards full commitment through the UN, would not be seeking additional resources beyond DFID's £100m Contingency Reserve.[155]

THE FIRST COMPREHENSIVE ESTIMATE OF COSTS, 19 FEBRUARY 2003

256. On 19 February, in advance of meetings with Mr Snow and other G7 finance Ministers, Mr Brown received a number of papers on Iraq.[156]

257. In a covering minute to those papers, a Treasury official warned that on reconstruction:

> "Our sense is that momentum … is developing very fast, and there is a risk that the financing agenda could be set by policy decisions taken in Foreign and Defence Ministries. Sharing ideas with Mr Snow may be a useful way to begin to redress this balance. An additional approach would be to write round Whitehall colleagues sharing your concerns (for instance, about the economic and financing implications of foreign and defence policy decisions)."

258. A paper by Treasury officials identified three "pitfalls" to putting Iraq "on a path to stability and prosperity whilst fairly sharing the financing burden for this".[157] Those pitfalls were:

- UN cover. Without this, the UK would have to contribute more to the reconstruction effort, IFIs would find it hard to engage, and the international community would be unable to resolve crucial financing issues such as debt rescheduling.
- Being realistic about the decisions a transitional Iraqi Government could take. It could be illegitimate and destabilising for the transitional Government to take decisions on Iraqi economic policy.
- The implications of establishing administrative sectors in Iraq: "If the UK takes on one, the cost – in terms of money and administrative burden – could rocket, and our stay lengthen."

259. A paper by Mr Dodds and a junior Treasury official provided the first comprehensive estimate of the cost of the UK's intervention in Iraq (including military and non-military, conflict and post-conflict costs).[158] The advice on military costs is described earlier in this Section.

260. The officials advised that the best estimate of the cost of military (combat and post-conflict) operations was now more than £5bn. In addition:

- The UK might spend between £100m and £250m on humanitarian aid in the first year after any conflict (based on a "typical" UK contribution of 10 percent of total international aid).
- The UK might spend between £100m and £500m on reconstruction in the first year after any conflict (again, based on 10 percent of total international aid).
- It was impossible to estimate costs falling to the Export Credit Guarantee Department (ECGD), including through claims or losses arising from political and economic instability, and from any decisions to write off debt for political reasons.
- Mr Boateng had already agreed to provide an additional £5m to the FCO from the Reserve for a "flat-pack" Embassy. There might be other costs, though the Treasury was pressing the FCO to absorb those within its budget.

[158] Minute Treasury [junior official] to Chancellor, 19 February 2003, 'Update on Iraq' attaching Paper Treasury, 19 February 2003, 'Iraq Conflict – Public Expenditure Impact'.

- There might be further indirect costs, including in relation to an increase in people seeking asylum.

261. The officials summarised the "big numbers" in a table which is reproduced in full below.

Table 3: The Treasury's estimate of the direct cost of conflict, February 2003 (£bn)

	2002/03	2003/04	2004/05	2005/06
Military costs – war and immediate aftermath	1.0	1.5	0.5	–
Military – RAB costs	–	0.1	0.15	0.15
Military – aftermath	–	0.5	1.0	?
Humanitarian aid	–	0.1-0.25	?	?
Reconstruction aid	–	0.1-0.5	?	?
ECGD	–	?	?	?
Total	1.0	2.3-c3.0	1.7+	**?

262. The officials advised that any DFID contribution to humanitarian and reconstruction costs would be constrained by DFID's commitment to spend 90 percent of its bilateral resources in low-income countries. Ms Short had already written to Mr Blair (on 5 February) asking for advice on the approach that DFID should take and the potential for extra resources. It was "quite credible to imagine DFID putting [in] a bid for several hundred million pounds".

263. Mr Brown and Mr Boateng received a further update on military post-conflict costs from a Treasury official the following day.[159] In that context, the official commented that the Treasury would also need to take account of the costs of humanitarian assistance and reconstruction:

> "Our line to date has been that departments (mainly DFID) should meet these [costs] through budget reprioritisation. We would welcome your steer on this but, based on past conflicts, we suspect it is unlikely to be a sustainable line in the long term."

264. The US inter-agency Rock Drill from 21 to 22 February confirmed the scale of the shortcomings in US post-conflict planning, including the deficiencies of the US Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance (ORHA) and the continuing gap between UK and US positions on the role of the UN (see Section 6.5).

265. Ms Short held a meeting on Iraq with DFID officials, including Dr Brewer and Mr Fernie, on 24 February.[160] The meeting identified the "increased recognition across Whitehall of the likely scale of post-conflict activity, and the essential nature of UN involvement and authority if this was to be effectively addressed".

266. The meeting also reviewed ORHA's state of preparedness in the light of the Rock Drill:

- Humanitarian plans were the most advanced, but ORHA did not yet have sufficient funds, staff or capacity to deliver them.
- Reconstruction plans were "not nearly as well advanced as they should have been at this point".
- Civil administration plans were the least advanced, and "would not be ready by the six week deadline they had been set".

267. The meeting concluded that ORHA's state of preparedness was "extremely worrying".

268. The meeting also considered financial issues. The MOD and FCO appeared to be more aware of DFID's financial constraints, but DFID had not yet received a "clear response to the issue of the limitation of DFID's engagement imposed on it by our financial situation". Ms Short told the meeting that Mr Brown "had indicated to her, in a private conversation, that he 'would do what he could to help'".

269. Dr Brewer wrote to Mr Bowen on the same day to summarise Ms Short's position; copies of the letter were sent to the MOD, FCO and Treasury.[161] The letter reflected the conclusions of Ms Short's meeting with DFID officials on 18 February and Dr Brewer's presentation to the Chiefs of Staff on 19 February. Dr Brewer stated that:

> "Although [Ms Short] would be keen for DFID to support an exemplary humanitarian effort in any UK-controlled sector, our [DFID's] role will be constrained by the extent of the UN mandate and the financial resources available to us. We have a strong commitment to the UN agencies, and would want to allocate significant funding to them under most scenarios. Drawing heavily on our Contingency Reserve and existing humanitarian aid and Iraq budget lines is unlikely to release more than £60-70m for humanitarian assistance to Iraq in 2003/04. Given our predictions of the humanitarian needs, with this level of funding we would not be able to play the exemplary role [in the South] the Prime Minister has asked for, and it would be irresponsible of us to plan to do so."

270. Mr Jeremy Heywood, Mr Blair's Principal Private Secretary, sent Mr Bowman a paper on financing Iraqi reconstruction on 24 February.[162] Mr Heywood said that Mr Blair wanted to share the paper, prepared by the No.10 Policy Directorate, with the US as soon as possible. The letter was copied to the FCO, DFID, the DTI and the Cabinet Office.

271. The No.10 paper stated that the cost of "reconstruction and nation building" in Iraq would be between US$30bn and US$105bn, excluding the direct cost of conflict and post-conflict peacekeeping. Only an administration enjoying the legitimacy provided by the UN would be free to engage with the financial markets to secure funding for Iraq's long-term future.

272. Mr Bowman replied on 25 February, stating that the Treasury "fully supports the main message of the paper, that, in the absence of a UN mandate, the financing costs of reconstructing Iraq will be significantly higher".[163] Mr Bowman offered detailed comments on the text and advised that the Treasury was already involved in complementary work alongside the IPU and in liaison with the US and Australia.

273. A revised draft was prepared, but not shared with the US.[164]

274. Mr David Johnson, Head of the MOD Iraq Secretariat, wrote to Mr Hoon's Private Office on 26 February about humanitarian assistance during the early stages of a military conflict.[165] The MOD and DFID believed US plans for humanitarian assistance were inadequate, in particular because they relied on delivery by NGOs, who would not be on the ground in Iraq in numbers early on. The UK military would therefore need:

> "… immediate access to sufficient expertise and resources to … make good the deficiencies in the US plans. In particular … DFID experts deployed in theatre, who can advise what is actually required … (as opposed to soldiers making it up as they go along) … There are lead-times associated with this … Waiting till after a second SCR [resolution] is leaving it too late. We know DFID haven't got any money. That is why they need to ask for some, now."

275. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 27 February that he would continue to push for a second Security Council resolution.[166]

276. Ms Short said that a UN legal mandate was "essential" for the humanitarian and reconstruction tasks that lay ahead; without that, "proper preparation was impossible". She also advised that it would be "difficult" to accommodate action in Iraq within DFID's Contingency Reserve: "Greater resources were likely to be needed."

277. After that meeting, Mr Boateng asked Treasury officials for a note on progress towards financing Iraq's reconstruction.[167] Mr Boateng commented:

[167] Manuscript comment Boateng on Letter Bewes to Heywood, 25 February 2003, 'Iraq: Reconstruction – Letter to Mark Bowman (HM Treasury), 24 February 2003'.

> "Clare [Short] asked for more resources in Cabinet ('I can't take resources away from Ethiopia') and the PM looked at me with one of his smiles – what does she want/need – and what might we offer?"

278. Mr Hoon's Private Office sent Sir David Manning an update on military planning on 28 February.[168]

279. The section on "Day After" planning identified five UK concerns, including funding for reconstruction. US planning assumed the rest of the world would pick up 75 percent of the bill for reconstruction. That was "possibly hopelessly optimistic". As an Occupying Power, the UK would be at the front of the queue of countries the US would approach to make up any deficit.

280. Copies of the paper were sent to the FCO, Treasury and Cabinet Office, but not to DFID.

281. A Treasury official advised Mr Boateng on 5 March that, with little clarity on the scale of the humanitarian response that would be required and on the UK's contribution to it and no actual bid for resources from DFID, it was difficult to respond substantively to the concerns expressed by Ms Short in her 5 February and 14 February letters to Mr Blair.[169]

282. The official recommended that Mr Boateng write to Ms Short, setting out the Treasury's two main concerns:

- that funding for reconstruction should be an international effort; and
- that Ministers should be aware that the Reserve was "not in a position to fund large amounts of new expenditure".

283. The Treasury has informed the Inquiry that it has no record of Mr Boateng writing to Ms Short as a result of that advice.[170]

284. Ms Short held a meeting with DFID officials on 5 March to discuss Iraq and in particular the legality of "reconstruction work" without a covering UN mandate.[171] Ms Short concluded that without a clear mandate for reconstruction, DFID could only legally fund or undertake humanitarian work. DFID would not undertake reconstruction work, or fund others to do so. DFID "should move away" from any expectation that it would undertake an exemplary role, or that it would focus on any one area.

285. On funding, Ms Short agreed that if DFID was involved in humanitarian work only, it would draw on its Contingency Reserve. In the event that a "wider DFID role" was possible, "should we [DFID] be asked by No.10 or others how much funding DFID would need, we should mention an initial sum of £100 million".

286. Ms Short wrote to Mr Blair on the same day:

> "You must … be aware that without resources larger than my whole Contingency Reserve – just under £100m … it would be impossible for DFID to take a leading role in humanitarian delivery in the South–East about which we spoke."[172]

Copies of Ms Short's letter were sent to Mr Brown, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon.

MR BLAIR'S 6 MARCH 2003 MEETING ON POST-CONFLICT ISSUES

287. On 6 March, Mr Blair chaired a meeting on post-conflict issues with Mr Brown, Mr Hoon, Ms Short, Baroness Symons, Sir Michael Jay and "other officials".[173] The meeting is described in detail in Section 6.5.

288. Mr Brown received a number of papers from Treasury officials before the meeting. Mr Dodds' advice on military operations in the post-conflict period is described earlier in this Section.

289. A Treasury official provided Mr Brown with a draft "DFID paper rewritten by the Treasury" on humanitarian relief and reconstruction costs.[174] The draft paper stated that it was a "first attempt at charting the likely costs of the first three years of the Iraqi reconstruction". It adopted a different methodology from the draft DFID paper submitted to Ms Short on 31 January, but reached broadly similar conclusions.

290. The draft paper stated that cost estimates would remain "very rough" until the IFIs had completed a full needs assessment. However, an analysis of international precedents indicated that:

- In the first year after a conflict, humanitarian costs could be between US$2bn and US$12bn, depending on the scale of the humanitarian crisis and the extent to which oil exports were disrupted (the estimates assumed that the OFF programme would continue).
- In the second and third years after a conflict, total reconstruction costs (before Iraq's oil revenues were taken into account) could be between US$2bn and US$15bn per year. The upper limit was not based on an analysis of international precedents, but reflected the potential for "political pressure to spend as much as the OFF [programme] does now (if not more)".

[174] Email Dodds to Private Office [Treasury], 4 March 2003, 'Iraq: Ministerial Meeting on Thursday Morning' attaching Paper DFID, March 2003, 'Draft: Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Costs: an Overview'.

- Oil revenues could pay for most of Iraq's reconstruction – but only if oil production levels and prices were favourable, Iraq did not have to repay its debts, and the rehabilitation of Iraq's oil infrastructure was "cheap".

291. The draft paper stated that sources of financing for relief and reconstruction remained uncertain. Significant assistance from the international community including the IFIs would be extremely unlikely without a UN mandate.

292. A slightly revised version of that paper was sent to Mr Boateng the following day.[175]

293. Mr Brown also received advice from a Treasury official on the potential impact of all military and non-military expenditure in Iraq on public expenditure.[176] The official's advice on military expenditure is described earlier in this Section.

294. The official advised that it remained difficult to assess the scale of the humanitarian and reconstruction response that would be needed. However, based on a "typical" UK contribution of 10 percent of total aid, the UK might spend up to £1.35bn on humanitarian assistance and reconstruction in the two years after a conflict.

295. The official concluded:

> "DFID have yet to make any formal approach to us on these costs but, if you're minded to, the [6 March Ministerial] meeting might be a good opportunity to dampen their expectations.
> "… we have said that departments should meet new costs through re-prioritisation. It is not clear though how long this position will hold."

296. The IPU prepared an annotated agenda for the meeting, in consultation with other departments.[177]

297. With the invasion possibly only weeks away, the IPU stated that US and UK planning assumed that, in the "medium term after the conflict", Coalition Forces would be "re-deployed into six or seven geographical sectors in order to provide a secure environment for the civil transitional administration to conduct humanitarian assistance and reconstruction work". The US expected the UK Division in Iraq to be responsible for a geographical sector. That would be "very expensive and could have wider resource implications". The IPU concluded that: "Ministers need urgently to take a view on this before the military planning assumptions become a fait accompli."

[177] Paper IPU, 5 March 2003, 'Planning for the UK's Role in Iraq after Saddam'.

298. The IPU asked Ministers a number of specific questions, including:

- Whether they agreed "that the UK does not have the resources to make an 'exemplary' effort in providing for basic humanitarian needs in the area controlled by the UK Division". The cost of making a "significant difference" in a UK Area of Operation (AO) was estimated at between US$400m and US$2.4bn for the first year.[178] That was well beyond the financial and implementing capacity of DFID and the MOD, and could become a significant medium-term commitment if the local population became dependent on UK assistance. The alternative to an exemplary effort was to give UK assistance to UN agencies and NGOs, supplemented by support for QIPs in the UK's AO.
- To choose between options for a post-conflict military presence in the medium term. The cost of maintaining a military force to provide security in a geographic area (which might be based on Basra) would be in the order of £1bn a year.
- Whether to follow the US plan to administer Iraq as a whole and not seek general UK responsibility for the administration of any geographic area in the medium term. In any area where the UK took responsibility for security, it could, with a UN mandate, also take on wider responsibility for reconstruction (including humanitarian assistance and aspects of civil administration), but that would "very likely be beyond the resources of the UK alone and have implications for domestic departments".

299. At the 6 March meeting:

- Ms Short said that the "DFID contingency fund" would prioritise Iraq. The funding available to DFID would not, however, provide for a humanitarian response on the scale of Kosovo. Ms Short also repeated her view that a UN mandate was essential for post-conflict humanitarian and reconstruction operations, both to provide legal cover for reconstruction and to encourage other countries and international organisations to participate.
- Mr Brown said that the military operation would be "very costly". Estimates for a major humanitarian operation were running at US$1.9bn to US$4bn. The burden of reconstruction should not be borne by the US and UK alone; other countries and Iraqi oil revenues should be tapped. In the longer term, Iraqi oil should fund the country's reconstruction. Mr Brown said that he was particularly concerned that UK funds should not be used to repay Iraq's substantial debts to Germany, France and Russia.
- Mr Hoon referred to the importance of humanitarian action in the immediate wake of the arrival of UK forces. Ms Short said that DFID had £70m available "for rapid disbursement" on humanitarian activities.[179]

---

[178] The paper assumed that the UK's AO would comprise Basra province and that Basra province contained around 20 percent of Iraq's population. The figures represented 20 percent of estimated total humanitarian costs in the first year after a conflict (US$2bn to US$12bn)
[179] Letter Cannon to Owen, 7 March 2003, 'Iraq: Post-Conflict Issues'.

300. Mr Blair concluded that:

> "(a) DFID and MOD should draw up a plan for immediate humanitarian action in the area of operations of British forces.
> (b) Planning for medium-term post-conflict action should continue on the assumption that a UN mandate (the 'third/fourth resolutions') would be forthcoming … The FCO should prepare a Phase IV plan with other departments, including the key decisions for Ministers to take.
> (c) The Chancellor should draw up a funding plan, including securing funding from wider international sources, in particular the IFIs.
> (d) The Prime Minister was prepared to pursue with President Bush our need for a UN mandate for a post-conflict administration."[180]

301. Mr Blair stated that the issue of "sectorisation" (whether to seek general responsibility for the administration of a geographic area of Iraq) would need to be addressed and should be covered in the Phase IV plan.

302. The record of the meeting did not report any discussion on whether the UK had the resource to make an exemplary effort in providing for basic humanitarian needs in the area controlled by the UK Division.

303. The 'UK overall plan for Phase IV' was shown to Mr Blair on 7 March.[181] Much of the plan, prepared by the IPU, was drawn from the annotated agenda prepared for the meeting on 6 March.

304. The plan stated that, "very soon" after the start of hostilities, the UK needed "to agree what our medium-term contribution to Iraq should be (say from the autumn onwards). For this will shape our conduct in the short term."

305. The Inquiry has seen no response to the Phase IV plan.

306. On 14 March, in response to Mr Blair's request for a funding plan, Mr Bowman sent No.10 a Treasury paper on financing reconstruction.[182] The paper was copied to the Cabinet Office, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the MOD, the FCO and DFID.

307. The Treasury advised that the total cost of humanitarian relief and reconstruction in Iraq could be up to US$45bn over the first three years. Iraqi oil might only pay for a fraction of that. The UK's approach should be to spread the burden as widely as possible.

308. An effective burden-sharing arrangement required the "political legitimacy" that would follow UN endorsement of the transitional arrangement for governing Iraq. If the UN was involved, the burden-sharing arrangement should comprise:

- other bilateral donors, with non-combatant nations showing "disproportionate generosity";
- maximising contributions from the IMF, the World Bank, other IFIs and the EU;
- preventing Iraqi revenues being "side-tracked" into paying debt and compensation claims; and
- maximising Iraq's own contribution from oil revenues.

309. If the UN did not endorse the transitional arrangements, many of those approaches would be more difficult, and there would be pressure on the UK to contribute more.

310. The Treasury advised:

> "A substantial UK financial contribution to the reconstruction efforts is unlikely to be affordable within existing spending plans unless the [UK] Government chose to divert spending from other domestic programmes. In the first instance DFID's unallocated departmental provision (£88m for 2003/04) should provide for immediate requirements. The UK will, however, come under considerable pressure to contribute much more as its share of immediate humanitarian and reconstruction costs, let alone what would be required as part of an 'exceptional response'. Substantial further support from central funds though is unlikely to be affordable: the costs of military activity in Iraq and elsewhere have already fully committed the 2003/04 Reserve; and the overall deterioration in the fiscal position severely limits the Government's discretion to make additional spending allocations."

311. The 14 March meeting of the AHGI was informed that the IPU was considering how best to approach other donors for support on reconstruction, and that the FCO was considering whether there was scope to approach other countries to contribute to UK military campaign costs (though the prospects were not good).[183]

HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE IN THE UK'S AREA OF OPERATIONS

312. A junior official in the Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ) wrote to the MOD on 5 March to alert it to PJHQ's concerns over the provision of humanitarian assistance in the UK AO in the immediate aftermath of any conflict.[184] PJHQ had planned to "piggy-back" on US arrangements for the provision of humanitarian relief. It was now apparent, however, that the US plan depended heavily on international organisations and NGOs, which were unlikely to be present in the first weeks after any conflict.

[184] Minute PJHQ [junior official] to MOD Sec(O) 4, 5 March 2003, 'Op TELIC: Resourcing of Humanitarian Assistance'.

313. PJHQ had also assumed that DFID would be responsible for providing "national humanitarian assistance". It was now clear that the UK military would be unable to rely on "DFID support for UK troops". Dr Brewer's letter of 24 February to Mr Bowen had implied that DFID would not provide funding to the UK military for humanitarian operations without a second UN resolution. Even if there was a second resolution, DFID's commitment to supporting UN agencies at a national level would constrain what DFID would do in the UK's AO with the UK military and other partners. DFID's view was that the most effective way to distribute humanitarian assistance was through international organisations and NGOs, and DFID intended to focus its resources on areas of greatest need (rather than necessarily on the UK's AO).

314. PJHQ estimated that between £30m and £50m a month for two months would be required to cover the provision of humanitarian assistance in the UK's AO in the immediate aftermath of any conflict.

315. An MOD official submitted advice on the issue to Mr Hoon on 7 March.[185] The official rehearsed the background set out in PJHQ's note of 5 March, but suggested that only £10m a month would be required:

> "… DFID have only just engaged on this issue in detail, [and] it has not been possible to get their expert advice on what might be required … That said, the current working assumption is that there will be a particular requirement for supplies of drinkable water, medical supplies and fuel … It has been suggested that the total requirement could amount to as much as £10m a month …"

316. Two camps for internally displaced persons might also be required, at a "one-off" cost of £10m each.

317. The official provided a draft letter for Mr Hoon to send to Ms Short, seeking her agreement "to channel aid – funds – through our forces". That agreement was needed urgently to ensure supplies could be procured and delivered on time.

318. Mr Hoon wrote to Ms Short on the same day, seeking her agreement that "an approach is made to the Chief Secretary" for funding as a matter of urgency.[186]

319. Ms Short replied on 12 March, agreeing that Mr Hoon should urgently discuss funding with the Treasury.[187] She added that DFID would not be able to inherit the "indefinite obligation" to spend £10m a month from the military without adequate finance to cover it. Copies of Mr Hoon's and Ms Short's letters were sent to Mr Brown.

320. Ms Short wrote to Mr Blair on the same day, setting out her misgivings about the state of humanitarian planning; copies of her letter were sent to Mr Hoon, Mr Straw,

Mr Brown and Sir Andrew Turnbull.[188] DFID preparations were well in hand; those of the UN humanitarian agencies and US and UK military were not. Ms Short stated that "UK Armed Forces are not configured or supplied to provide substantial humanitarian relief".

321. Ms Short identified the three "critical steps" which would help joint DFID/MOD planning for humanitarian action. Those included "clarity over the scale of resources my department will have to support the provision of humanitarian and reconstruction assistance in Iraq"; DFID had earmarked £65m for humanitarian relief and reconstruction.

322. Treasury officials advised Mr Boateng on 14 March that DFID should cover any "early humanitarian" costs, given its responsibility for humanitarian issues and to incentivise it to become more engaged in planning and delivery of immediate post-conflict humanitarian assistance.[189] The Treasury's "option B" was that the MOD claimed its expenditure on humanitarian relief from the Reserve, as part of NACMO.

323. Mr Boateng commented on the advice: "Option B is my strong preference in the current climate."[190]

324. Mr Boateng wrote to Mr Hoon on 17 March, two days before the invasion, agreeing that the MOD could spend up to £20m to assist displaced persons and up to £10m to provide humanitarian assistance for one month.[191] The arrangement would be reviewed after that period.

325. The military's preparedness to deliver humanitarian assistance in the UK's AO is considered in Section 6.5.

DFID SECURES ADDITIONAL FUNDING FROM THE RESERVE

326. Ms Short told the House of Commons on 13 March that she had provided a further £6.5m to support humanitarian contingency planning by UN agencies and NGOs, in addition to the £3.5m for UN humanitarian contingency planning announced on 10 February.[192]

327. £3.5m of the £6.5m was provided to UN agencies, bringing the total amount provided by DFID to UN agencies to £7m.[193] A DFID official advised Ms Short that £7m represented 8.5 percent of the UN's updated funding requirements for humanitarian preparedness (as set out in their 14 February appeal for US$123.5m).

328. On 17 March, at Ms Short's request, DFID officials prepared a paper on shortcomings in humanitarian preparations and steps needed to address them.[194]

329. Officials identified seven problems:

- UN funding needs insufficiently met. Preparedness incomplete …
- Red Cross Movement preparing but requires substantial funding support …
- NGOs beginning to establish presence but not fully prepared …
- US preparedness for response lacks local experience and based on optimistic assumptions …
- How to maintain the Oil-for-Food (OFF) programme …
- How to support humanitarian agencies [to] gain early access to Iraq …
- How Coalition Forces can provide effective humanitarian response …"

330. The proposed solution for the first three problems was provision of "immediate additional funds to DFID".

331. Ms Short sent the paper to Mr Blair on 17 March with the comment:
"This summarises what needs to be done to improve humanitarian preparedness. Perhaps we could really focus on this next week."[195]

332. The military role in providing humanitarian assistance was summarised in a joint minute from Mr Straw and Mr Hoon to Mr Blair on 19 March.[196] Mr Straw and Mr Hoon advised:

> "The military task will be to facilitate a secure environment … to enable immediate humanitarian relief to be conducted. To help UK forces win hearts and minds, HMT [the Treasury] have allocated them £30m for humanitarian purposes in the first month as well as £10m for quick win projects. (Clare [Short] has allocated £20m for UN agencies' preparations and earmarked another £60m from DFID's Contingency Reserve for humanitarian operations. But this is a drop in the ocean; in the worse case, if the Oil-for-Food programme ground to a halt, Iraq could need as much as a billion dollars a month for humanitarian aid)."

333. The Coalition began military action against Iraq on the night of 19/20 March.

334. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies (IFRC) launched humanitarian appeals on 20 March, each for approximately US$80m.[197]

335. Ms Short wrote to Mr Boateng the following day to request an additional £120m from the Reserve for humanitarian assistance for Iraq.[198]

336. Ms Short advised that she could provide £80m for humanitarian assistance from DFID's core budget in 2003/04 (£75m from its Contingency Reserve of £90m and £5m from the existing Iraq programme). That was in addition to the £10m already provided from DFID's 2002/03 budget to UN agencies and NGOs. From the £80m available, she had:

- earmarked £65m for the UN's forthcoming initial Flash Appeal, which was expected to seek US$1.9bn to cover the first six months of the crisis; and
- agreed to provide £10m to support further preparations by the World Food Programme, the Red Cross and NGOs.

337. Ms Short stated that with only £5m left, and with demand for funding expected to accelerate fast as humanitarian agencies moved from preparing to delivering, she now needed an extra £120m from the Reserve:

- £35m for the Red Cross appeals launched on 20 March;
- £20m for NGO programmes;
- £15m for DFID's bilateral effort, to deliver direct emergency support to fill gaps in the international response and to second UK relief professionals to UN agencies; and
- a further £50m for the UN initial Flash Appeal: "Given the UK's role in the Iraq crisis, we cannot conceivably avoid meeting less than a 10 percent share of the UN humanitarian appeal. My initial contribution of US$100million [£65 million] will need quickly to be followed up to get us closer to a 10 percent share."

338. Ms Short added that her bid did not include any funds for reconstruction: that would need to be considered "in the longer term".

339. A Treasury official advised Mr Boateng on 25 March that Ms Short's letter "does not really make a case in terms of actual humanitarian impact … DFID's argument is in essence about the need to be seen to commit funds".[199] There was little detail on how the money would be spent.

[199] Minute Treasury [junior official] to Chief Secretary, 25 March 2003, 'Iraq Humanitarian Funding: Reserve Claim'.

340. The official recommended two options, depending on "political and presentational requirements":

- agree the claim subject to further detail on how and when the money would be spent; or
- provide £55m to cover immediate needs. That figure comprised the amounts requested for NGOs and for DFID's bilateral effort (both of which would be "politically difficult" to resist), and £20m for the UN Flash Appeal.

341. Mr Bowman advised the Treasury official on 26 March that Mr Brown's view was that the Treasury should agree to provide £100m to DFID. He asked the official for a revised draft reply for Mr Boateng to send to Ms Short justifying that as a reasonable figure.[200]

342. Later that day, Mr Bowman advised the Treasury official that Mr Brown had, after further reflection, decided to provide the full amount requested by Ms Short (£120m).[201]

343. Mr Boateng replied to Ms Short on 27 March, agreeing her bid in full, subject to further detail on how and when the money would be spent.[202]

344. By 27 March, the UK Government had earmarked £240m for humanitarian relief:

- £30m for the UK military to provide humanitarian relief in the UK's AO, from the Reserve;
- £90m from DFID's own resources; and
- £120m for DFID from the Reserve.

345. The Inquiry asked Ms Short and Sir Suma Chakrabarti whether DFID had had the resources to deliver, with the MOD, an exemplary humanitarian effort in the South.

346. Ms Short told the Inquiry:

> "… I had written a number of letters saying, 'All we [DFID] have got is our Contingency Reserve and I'm supposed to keep that for other emergencies in the world … if we mean this [the exemplary approach in the South], there has got to be some money on the table', and what we were getting from the Treasury was no answer, nothing and it was this period of stand-off. Gordon Brown was pushed out and marginalised at the time …
> "So after a lot of delay and a number of efforts, the Treasury … came with a letter saying, 'There is no money. Money is very tight, and, therefore, we have got to have a UN Resolution so we can get the World Bank and the IMF and all the others in'.

> "That was a Treasury response, and we only got any extra money from the Treasury, I think, after the invasion had started. So how you can plan an exemplary role when it is that late …"[203]

347. The Inquiry concludes that the Treasury letter referred to by Ms Short was Mr Bowman's letter of 14 March to No.10.

348. Sir Suma told the Inquiry:

> "We [DFID] were very concerned about the resource position. This was one of the biggest constraints on planning because we didn't know what our financial envelope would be in the end. We first raised the resource issues with the Treasury at official level in December 2002 and then it was raised in various letters from Clare Short to the Prime Minister."[204]

349. Mr Brown rejected those criticisms. He told the Inquiry that the Treasury's concern had been to ensure that DFID used its Contingency Reserve before it secured additional funding from the Reserve.[205]

350. The UN launched a 'Flash Appeal' for Iraq on 28 March, seeking US$2.22bn to provide six months of food and non-food aid for Iraq.[206]

351. DFID committed £65m to support the UN Flash Appeal on 1 April.[207]

352. The UN reported in June 2003, in the context of launching its revised humanitarian appeal for Iraq, that almost US$2bn of the requested US$2.22bn had been made available to UN agencies since the launch of the Flash Appeal.[208] That comprised US$1.1bn in resources available within the OFF programme and US$870m in donor contributions and pledges. The major donors were:

- the US (who had provided US$483m, some 56 percent of total donor contributions);
- the UK (US$108m – 12 percent); and
- Japan (US$87m – 10 percent).

Funding for a British Embassy and security

353. Contingency planning in the FCO, including for the procurement of armoured vehicles, portable accommodation and equipment to support the re-opening of a UK Office in Baghdad, had begun by September 2002.[209]

354. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Boateng on 17 February 2003, seeking £6.3m from the Reserve to cover costs incurred in preparing for possible conflict or regime change in Iraq.[210] That comprised:

- £3m for a 'container' Embassy in Baghdad;
- £1.2m for Chemical Biological Warfare (CBW) suits and air monitors;
- £740,000 for armoured cars, and for additional guards and security across the region;
- £668,000 for communications equipment for Baghdad;
- £380,000 for additional staffing costs in London; and
- £316,000 for an increased public diplomacy and information campaign.

355. Mr Straw stated that, in the event of a conflict, the FCO would have to make a further claim.

356. Mr Boateng replied two days later, agreeing the bids for the Embassy, CBW suits and air monitors, armoured cars and additional security, and communications equipment (a total of £5.62 million).[211] He rejected the bids for additional staffing in London and the public diplomacy and information campaign, arguing that "these were of a size and nature that we would expect the FCO to absorb".

Accuracy of pre-conflict estimates of costs

357. Sir Nicholas Macpherson told the Inquiry:

> "Forecasts for the overall net additional costs of military operations, as well as estimates for UOR expenditure, were produced by the Ministry of Defence in consultation with the Treasury. The estimates were based on historical data coupled with assumptions on the anticipated operational tempo, activity and conditions for the forthcoming 12 months."[212]

358. Addressing the accuracy of those estimates, Sir Nicholas Macpherson told the Inquiry:

> "We [the Treasury] were making estimates through the autumn of 2002. The Treasury doesn't always get forecasts right, and it didn't get this forecast totally right, but it wasn't that far off. We started from looking at the previous Iraq war. My recollection of it was the British intervention was on a larger scale, but obviously there had been quite a lot of inflation since then and I think we always assumed that the actual conflict itself would cost around £2.5 billion, and that estimate proved pretty accurate."[213]

359. Sir Nicholas explained:

"This wasn't some private Treasury estimate, we had an interest of working very closely with the Ministry of Defence, the Foreign Office, the International Development Department [DFID] … at that time we could see a scenario where the war would cost something like 6 billion [pounds] and that was looking to the end of … 2005/06, and, again, that's not hugely wide of the mark."[214]

360. Mr Trevor Woolley, MOD Director General Resources and Plans from July 1998 to August 2002 and subsequently MOD Finance Director, told the Inquiry:

"What we tended to do was to look at what the expected force level in theatre was and to focus the forecast round the numbers of people who were going to be out there [in Iraq] … But, of course, the reality was sometimes that the force levels were different from those at the time of forecast and, therefore, the costs would be different and, of course, there were some costs that were either greater or less than one might have expected with that level of force level anyway."[215]

361. The estimates of military conflict and post-conflict and non-military costs which the Treasury provided to Mr Brown on 19 February were reasonably accurate, given the major uncertainties at that point.

362. Military costs relating to the conflict totalled some £2.2bn, against an estimate of £3.0bn (not including RAB costs).

363. Military post-conflict costs in 2004/05 were £0.9bn, against an estimate of £1.0bn.

364. The UK allocated £210m and spent £110m on humanitarian assistance in 2003/04, against the £100m to £250m range of likely expenditure identified by the Treasury.

365. The UK spent £99m on reconstruction in 2003/04, less than the £100m to £500m range identified by the Treasury. The £99m included a contribution of £70m to the UN and World Bank Trust Funds, which would only be disbursed by the UN and World Bank in subsequent years.

Funding for military operations in the post-conflict period

Cost of the UK's post-conflict military presence

366. Most of the issues raised at Mr Blair's meeting on 6 March, including the role of the UN, sectorisation and the nature of the UK's post-conflict contribution in Iraq, remained unresolved as the invasion began (see Section 6.5).

367. Mr Hoon and Mr Straw sent Mr Blair a joint minute on the UK military contribution to post-conflict Iraq on 19 March.[216] The minute, copies of which were sent to Mr Brown, Ms Short and Sir David Manning, invited agreement to five propositions including:

> "In broad terms the MOD will need to draw down its scale of effort to nearer a third of its commitment by the autumn."

368. That reduced commitment would equate to "a maximum of around one brigade, a two star headquarters and possibly a contribution to higher level command and control, air and maritime components, and support enablers".

369. The joint minute gave little detail of what UK forces would be required to do immediately after the invasion:

> "The expectation is that UK forces would be responsible for a task focused on Basra and other key military objectives in the south east of Iraq … This task is broadly proportionate to the size of the UK's contribution to overall Coalition land forces …"

370. The joint minute stated that US planning remained "sensibly flexible" once the initial phase was over and "a major part of Iraq has been stabilised". It would be premature to take a view on the merits of sectorisation for that stage.

371. Mr Rycroft informed the FCO and the MOD on 21 March that Mr Blair agreed to the Straw/Hoon recommendations, subject to further urgent advice on the size of any UK sector, the duration of the UK commitment and the exit strategy.[217]

372. Mr Dodds provided advice to Mr Brown on the joint minute on 24 March.[218] Mr Dodds reported that the picture looked "rather different to that presented in the correspondence":

> "The Defence Chiefs say that a 'medium size' deployment (ie 10,000-15,000) is the most we could sustain in the medium term without lasting damage to our forces. MOD officials tell us they had intended the submission [the joint minute] to pose the question 'do you want us to do as much as we can (ie this medium size deployment) > or as little as we can get away with (ie less)?' The question is not posed in that form and hence is not answered. The choice is essentially political, but it is essential to note that the cost of a deployment on this medium scale is about £1bn a year."

373. Mr Dodds also reported that the MOD understood that the US now intended to create four, two-star (Divisional) commands in Iraq; the MOD's "ambition" was to secure one of those commands. However:

> "… we should not be too ready to take on a 'two-star command' without the necessary guarantees. The military will baulk at this – a '2-Star command' would provide a seat at the top table in the aftermath. But the risks that it brings of costs that we cannot afford both militarily and financially mean that it comes at potentially a high price."

374. Mr Dodds advised that, given that this was an issue on which the Treasury and the MOD differed, Mr Brown's input "could be invaluable".

375. Mr Dodds also advised that Mr Brown might have a view on "whether to press for a smaller commitment than the £1bn 'medium' scale deployment that MOD/FCO have offered".

376. Mr Dodds concluded by stating that it would be useful if Mr Brown could "urge caution at Cabinet in taking on post-conflict commitments without assurances from the US on a further UN resolution and about military support to any UK-led post-conflict command".

377. Section 8 describes how the UK took responsibility for a sector of Iraq, which would become Multi-National Division (South-East) (MND(SE)).

378. At the 27 March meeting of Cabinet, Mr Brown reported that he was making available an additional £120m for humanitarian relief and raising the allocation of funds for the conflict from £1.75bn to £3bn.[219]

379. In his 9 April Budget statement to the House of Commons, Mr Brown announced that he had set aside £3bn in a "Special Reserve" available to the MOD, so that UK troops could be properly equipped and resourced.[220]

380. Mr Brown told the Inquiry that represented £1bn a year for three years.[221]

381. £1bn was the cost of a medium-scale military commitment in the post-conflict period, as estimated by Mr Dodds in his 24 March minute to Mr Brown.

382. Mr McKane directed MOD colleagues on 15 April to start turning their "broad estimates" of post-conflict and recuperation costs into a more detailed claim to the Treasury.[222]

383. Two weeks later, on 30 April, the MOD reported to the Treasury that:

- actual and forecast expenditure relating to Phase I (preparation of military forces) and Phase II (deployment) was £807m;
- actual and forecast expenditure to 30 April relating to Phase III (war-fighting) was £681m;
- forecast expenditure relating to Phase IV (post-conflict) for 2003/04 was £982m; and
- forecast expenditure for Phase V (recuperation) for 2003/04 was £400m.[223]

384. The MOD advised that the figures for Phases III, IV and V were their "first forecast" and "necessarily imprecise at this stage". The MOD also confirmed that the overall cost of Op TELIC would remain within the £3bn announced by Mr Brown on 9 April.

Impact on operations of the MOD's financial position, 2002 to 2004

385. In the light of the publicity surrounding the funding and management of the defence programme in 2003 and 2004, the Inquiry examined two related questions:

- the size of the MOD's core budget and whether it imposed constraints on operations in Iraq; and
- whether the imposition of controls on the MOD's management of its resources by the Treasury in September 2003 had an impact on operations in Iraq.

386. The 1998 Strategic Defence Review (SDR) signified a major shift towards expeditionary armed forces, involving the rapid deployment of sustainable military force often over long distances.[224] The SDR recognised that while the collapse of the Warsaw Pact had removed a direct military threat to the UK, indirect threats still persisted. Countering those threats would require more mobile, responsive and flexible armed forces.

387. Section 6.3 describes progress in implementing the shift in military capability required by the 1998 SDR.

388. Speaking to The Independent on Sunday in 2007, Lord Guthrie, Chief of the Defence Staff from 1997 to 2001, said that he came close to resigning during the negotiations over the 1998 SDR:

> "We had taken the Treasury by the hand through it all and thought we were home and dry … Then at the last moment [Mr] Brown tried to take a lot more money out of it. If he had, the whole thing would have unravelled."[225]

389. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that when he arrived at the MOD, in October 1999, there was "quite a strong feeling that it [the MOD programme implementing the 1998 SDR] was not fully funded".[226]

390. Sir Kevin Tebbit, MOD Permanent Under Secretary from July 1998 to November 2005, told the Inquiry that when he arrived at the MOD he estimated that the department was "about half a billion short" of being able to implement the SDR, although his colleagues did not agree the shortfall was that large.[227] The MOD had tried but failed to "recover the position" in the 2000 Spending Review.

391. Sir Kevin told the Inquiry that the MOD's resource position in 2002 had not affected the decision to mount a large-scale operation in Iraq:

> "While I think the core budget was insufficiently funded to deliver the SDR force structure, that doesn't mean to say that I felt that the funding wasn't there to conduct the [Iraq] operation, or indeed to sustain our objectives in Iraq, on the basis that we were planning to hand over, on the basis that we were not intending to stay … beyond a certain period …"[228]

392. Mr Woolley told the Inquiry that the SDR set out a high-level strategy, and it was a question of judgement whether a particular level of funding was sufficient to deliver that strategy.[229]

393. Mr Woolley identified three factors which, in his view, caused the "budgetary pressure" that the MOD faced in 2002:

- the year-on-year efficiency savings that the 2000 Spending Review had required;
- the cost of salaries, fuel and equipment rising faster than inflation; and
- exchange rate fluctuations.

394. The SDR New Chapter, published in July 2002, continued the shift towards expeditionary capability.[230]

395. In early 2002, Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Brown to request an additional £500m for 2002/03 above the MOD's 2000 Spending Review settlement.[231] He argued that the inadequate size of the MOD's 2000 Spending Review settlement, and the cost of expeditionary warfare, had produced a £770m hole in the MOD's budget. The MOD was prepared to absorb £270m of that.

396. No.10 wrote to the Treasury on 19 March 2002 to record that the MOD and Treasury had reached agreement that the bid would be considered sympathetically within the context of the 2002 Spending Review (which was already under way).[232]

397. Mr Blair attended a meeting with the Chiefs of Staff, Mr Hoon and Sir Kevin Tebbit on 21 May, to discuss current operations and resources.[233] Adm Boyce said that the Armed Forces had "been under-resourced since the SDR" and they "could not continue to make do".

398. Mr Boateng wrote to Mr Hoon on 10 July, confirming the MOD's settlement in the 2002 Spending Review.[234] Mr Boateng stated that the settlement represented 1.2 percent annual average real growth in the MOD's total DEL, and 1.7 percent annual average real growth in the MOD's near-cash DEL (the previous budgeting basis), and that it would permit the phased implementation of the SDR New Chapter. The table below summarises the settlement.

	2002/03	2003/04	2004/05	2005/06
Total DEL[235]	29.3	30.9	31.8	32.8

399. The settlement also provided an additional £500m in 2002/03 to "sustain activity levels and retention levels, and help offset the wider impact of the rate of military operations".

400. Annex A to the settlement letter confirmed that: "In general, the Ministry of Defence will have unlimited ability to move funds between separate resource and capital sub-programmes within its budget."[236]

401. Budgets allocated in the 2002 Spending Review reflected, for the first time, the implementation of full Resource Accounting and Budgeting (RAB).

Resource Accounting and Budgeting

Resource Accounting and Budgeting (RAB) has two key elements. First, costs are recorded when resources are consumed rather than when the cash is spent. Second, to provide a more accurate and transparent measure of the full economic costs, RAB incorporates non-cash costs including:

- depreciation – the consumption of capital assets over their useful economic life;
- impairments, such as stock write-offs; and
- a cost of capital charge – the opportunity and financing costs of holding capital.

The introduction of RAB by the Government was intended to create an incentive for departments to reduce non-cash costs, for example by reducing the amount and value of assets and stocks held.

Under RAB, the total Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL) comprised three elements: a resource budget (RDEL); a capital budget (CDEL); and adjustments to reflect non-cash costs.

402. While the 2002 settlement was presented in RAB terms, in order to allow reconciliation back to previous settlements and to aid public presentation, the letter also gave an estimate of the cash spending associated with the settlement. The table below presents that estimate.

403. The change from cash accounting to RAB presented an opportunity for the MOD significantly to increase its available cash by reducing its non-cash costs (depreciation and the cost of capital).

Table 5: 2002 Spending Review, MOD settlement, cash spending estimate, £bn

	2002/03 (Baseline)	2003/04 Plans	2004/05 Plans	2005/06 Plans

404. Mr Hoon replied to Mr Boateng's letter of 10 July on the same day, welcoming the proposed increase in defence spending but pointing out that, in terms of what the UK was expecting its Armed Forces to do, it was a "taut" settlement.[237]

[237] Letter Hoon to Boateng, 10 July 2002, 'SR2002: Ministry of Defence'.

405. Sir Nicholas Macpherson told the Inquiry that negotiations on the MOD's 2002 settlement had not appeared to be acrimonious:

> "… I didn't get the sense that the MOD was being starved of resource. Indeed, the 2002 settlement gave them small real increases …
> "… it is open to the Secretary of State, it is indeed open to the Chief of Defence Staff … to approach the Prime Minister and raise concerns. The Secretary of State could have taken it to Cabinet and he could have held out. They didn't …"[238]

406. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that the MOD had welcomed the 2002 settlement because it had been done on a resource accounting basis, rather than on a cash basis:

> "The problem … for the Treasury was that, whereas in most departments the transition from cash to accruals [RAB] didn't make very much difference, in the case of defence it made a huge difference, because our asset base was something between 70 and 90 billion pounds, a massive amount of money.
> "Now, the amount of … depreciation, capital charging, write-off allowance that was in [the MOD's] settlement, was a prudent figure …
> "But it did mean, as it transpired, that we had the headroom to achieve what I felt we had always failed to achieve before in my previous three years there, to actually fund the defence programme properly …"[239]

407. Mr Woolley told the Inquiry that Mr Boateng's letter of 10 July 2002 had:

> "… made no reference to there being a separate limit on the non-cash element of the overall resource budget …
> "So we made the assumption that there was no separate limit within our budget for non-cash, that we were to regard all resource budgets as available for whatever resource purpose it was required and … we planned on a full resource basis without making any distinction between non-cash and near cash spend."[240]

408. Mr Woolley agreed with the Inquiry that, in practice, the change to RAB meant that by bearing down on non-cash costs the MOD would be able to increase cash expenditure.

409. Mr Woolley also drew attention to the "volatility" of MOD non-cash costs, resulting from periodic revaluation of assets, the number of write-offs of assets and stocks in a particular year, and delays in bringing new equipment into service (which would reduce the charge for depreciation).

[238] Public hearing, 22 January 2010, page 37.
[239] Public hearing, 3 February 2010, pages 4-6.
[240] Public hearing, 2 July 2010, pages 59-61.

410. Mr Bruce Mann, MOD Director General Financial Management from May 2001 to February 2004, told the Inquiry that the MOD and the Treasury had worked together for many years before 2002, better to understand that volatility.[241]

411. By early April 2003, the Treasury had become concerned about the MOD's plans to transfer £1bn a year in 2003/04, 2004/05 and 2005/06 from non-cash to cash.[242] That would increase UK Public Sector Current Expenditure (PSCE) by the same amount, which the Treasury judged to be unaffordable.

412. The Treasury acknowledged that the MOD should be able to redeploy non-cash savings released through genuine efficiency gains to cash, but was concerned that:

- the size of the non-cash savings had come "as a bolt from the blue";
- the MOD had over-estimated its non-cash costs (making it easier subsequently to identify and claim savings); and
- some elements of the savings were due to "windfall gains or creative accounting", for example as the MOD changed the depreciation profiles on equipment and wrote down the value of equipment.

413. Sir Kevin Tebbit warned Mr Hoon on 14 April that Treasury officials had questioned the planned transfer of some £3bn from non-cash to cash over the next three years, which they regarded as undermining Mr Brown's fiscal projections.[243] Treasury officials had said that they could give no assurances that the MOD's budget would not be reduced, and had indicated that they would take account of the MOD's increased cash spending in deciding how to deal with "other issues in-year". Sir Kevin described that as "code for our claims on the Reserve" in respect of operations in Iraq.

414. Sir Kevin concluded that the MOD had acted in good faith within the terms of the 2002 settlement, which allowed "unlimited flexibility to move funds between separate resource and capital sub-programmes".

415. Discussions between MOD and Treasury officials continued through the summer, leading to a reduction in the MOD's planned transfer from £3bn to £2bn (£490m in 2003/04, £631m in 2004/05 and £948m in 2005/06).[244]

416. A Treasury official advised Mr Boateng on 19 August that he should "rebut" the MOD's entire £2bn transfer as neither legitimate nor affordable and against the "whole ethos of RAB":

> "The big picture is that the MOD have acted in bad faith. RAB sets out guidelines and principles, but cannot cover every eventuality … Treasury is ultimately responsible for refining the guidelines over this transitional phase [of RAB implementation]. Equally, we need to be able to trust departments to work within the spirit of RAB and check with us wherever clarification is obviously required. If we cannot trust departments to behave in a co-operative manner, we will have to consider tighter controls – undoubtedly a backward step."[245]

417. The official summarised the MOD's position:

- It was working within the RAB framework, which rewarded lower non-cash costs.
- It claimed that the Treasury had focused it on DEL totals, and had told it that cash management was irrelevant.
- The MOD's settlement letter in the 2002 Spending Review specified that it had unlimited flexibility to move funds between sub-programmes.

418. The official also set out the Treasury's arguments against the MOD position:

- These switches [from non-cash to cash] are not affordable …
- MOD have generated this improved cash flow from a mixture of accounting charges, exploitation of the transitional phase between RAB Stage I and II, and ineffective management of procurement contracts. Thus this cash windfall has nothing to do with the RAB principles of efficiency or improved asset utilisation …
- MOD has consistently reassured us … that non-cash forecasts in SR2002 were understated, not overstated. It would appear that they have misled us.
- … it was always understood (although admittedly not put in writing) that significant movements in cash/non-cash would have to be agreed with HMT [the Treasury].
- The quality of MOD's forecasting remains poor and does not instil confidence …
- It is not credible that MOD can really have believed that cash was not relevant …"

419. The Treasury's analysis of the MOD's planned £2bn transfer indicated that:

- 35 percent was the result of changes in accounting treatment which had been designed to produce non-cash savings.
- 23 percent was the result of delays in procurement.
- 33 percent was the result of exceptional write-offs.
- 10 percent could not be accounted for.[246]

420. The Treasury judged that only the second category (delays in procurement) represented legitimate non-cash savings.

[245] Minute Treasury [junior official] to Chief Secretary, 19 August 2003, 'c£2bn MOD Cash Increase over SR2002'.
[246] Figures sum to 101 percent due to rounding.

421. Mr Boateng wrote to Mr Hoon the following day, saying that he was unable to agree any transfer from non-cash to cash within the MOD's budget. Mr Boateng stated that, given the very tight fiscal position, the Government could not afford an unplanned increase to public sector net expenditure of the magnitude proposed by the MOD.[247] Copies of the letter were sent to Mr Blair and Mr Brown.

422. Mr Hoon replied to Mr Boateng on 3 September.[248] Mr Hoon argued that he had agreed the MOD's 2002 Spending Review settlement on a RAB basis, including that the MOD had unlimited flexibility to move funds between separate resource sub-programmes within its budget. The Treasury was now proposing "to move the goalposts". Mr Hoon challenged Mr Boateng's description of the transfers as resulting from "windfalls" and "transitional effects".

423. Mr Hoon stated that while it was not possible to say precisely where cuts would fall, cuts in training:

> "… would soon cut into long-term military capacity and our ability to continue to sustain our operations in Iraq …"

424. Mr Boateng and Mr Hoon met on 15 September to discuss the non-cash to cash transfers.[249] Mr Hoon told Mr Boateng that the MOD needed to transfer £870m from non-cash to cash in 2003/04 (rather than the £490m the MOD had previously estimated).

425. The following week, MOD officials told Treasury officials that their total additional cash requirement for 2003/04 had grown from £870m to £1,152m.

426. On 26 September, in advance of a meeting with Mr Brown, Mr Dodds produced a note summarising the exchanges between the Treasury and the MOD and reflecting on "how MOD had got into this position". On that question, he concluded:

> "MOD say they believed that under … RAB, cash was not a control. It is an open question whether this is stupidity or cunning."

427. Mr Brown wrote to Mr Blair later that day, reporting the exchanges between the MOD and the Treasury on the MOD's "legitimate questions" and highlighting his particular concern over the MOD's most recent requests:

> "Until a fortnight ago, Paul Boateng was discussing with Geoff Hoon whether it was acceptable for up to £490 million of non-cash … to be redeployed as cash spending …
> "However, it has now become clear that we are dealing with an issue of a completely different scale, which is being driven by a complete lack of budgetary control within the MOD. MOD's unforeseen requirement for £1,152 million of extra cash represents a very serious failure. This is not a RAB problem, it is a basic control problem.

"Given the gross loss of control by MOD, I must disallow immediately any flexibility for MOD to move resources between non-cash and cash … I must … also impose on MOD a fixed cash control total to ensure that it remains within the SR2002 settlement.

"… I require an urgent externally led review of MOD's financial control arrangements, and assurance that the MOD will immediately focus on cost control …"[250]

428. Mr Brown wrote that he was "anxious" that these changes would not affect the special arrangements that the Treasury had agreed with the MOD to fund operations in Iraq, and committed himself to ensuring that that funding continued.

429. Mr Boateng wrote to Mr Hoon the same day, reiterating Mr Brown's argument.[251]

430. Mr Brown told the Inquiry that he acted to impose additional controls on the MOD because:

"The purpose of resource accounting was to make sure that the assets of different departments were used more efficiently. So there had to be proof that the assets were being used more efficiently for that to be able to release cash …

"If we had allowed every department to do what the Ministry of Defence were doing, then we would have an extra cost of £12 billion …"

"I wrote to the Prime Minister about this because it was obviously an issue about the cash expenditure of the Government."[252]

431. Mr Hoon replied to Mr Boateng on 29 September.[253] He rejected the charge that the MOD had lost control of its budget and argued that the emergence earlier that month of additional costs was due to a lack of defined Treasury controls rather than a lack of control by the MOD.

432. Mr Hoon reported that in order to comply with Mr Brown's demand that the MOD reduce its cash expenditure by £1.1bn in the current year, there would have to be a moratorium on uncommitted expenditure. He had agreed measures that would reduce cash expenditure by up to £500m in the current year (which would have "serious and just manageable" consequences for defence), but would not agree any further measures until Mr Blair had had a chance to consider the issue.

[253] Letter Hoon to Boateng, 29 September 2003, 'Ministry of Defence Budget'.

433. Mr Hoon also challenged the assurances offered by Mr Brown and Mr Boateng that operations in Iraq would not be affected:

> "… to suggest that cuts to the core Defence Budget will have no impact on military capability or morale reveals a lack of understanding about how defence works. The net additional military costs are only one element, and a relatively small element, of what goes into creating the military capability deployed in Iraq. Cuts in core equipment, logistics and training programmes will inevitably affect operations in Iraq. The only question is how quickly. The effect on morale will be more or less immediate."

434. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair in similar terms on the same day.[254]

435. On 6 October, Mr Hoon's Private Secretary sent Mr Heywood a list of the main measures the MOD was taking to meet Mr Hoon's commitment to save up to £500m in the current financial year.[255] Those were:

- further reductions in activity, especially overseas exercises;
- paring back logistic support;
- deferring plans to buy a fifth C-17 strategic lift aircraft; and
- delaying or reducing spend on other future equipment programmes, including the Battlefield Light Utility Helicopter, the Nimrod MRA4 and the Watchkeeper Unmanned Aerial Vehicle (UAV).

436. Mr Hoon's Private Secretary wrote:

> "These measures would not directly impact on operations in Iraq, but would begin to cut into training and support needed for motivated Armed Forces capable of sustaining the operations there, especially if the situation on the ground escalates, or in responding to new crises."

437. The procurement of UAVs for Iraq is considered in Section 14.1.

438. Mr Heywood attempted to broker an agreement between the MOD and the Treasury. He advised Mr Blair on 7 October:

> "In brief, MOD are requesting an extra £650/1000/1275m over the next three years …
> "There is no plausible reason why MOD's non-Iraq spending should need to increase by 9 percent in the current year; and the Government's Chief Accounting Adviser, Sir Andrew Likierman, is absolutely clear that there has been an unacceptable breakdown in financial control in the department (with too much money allocated out to budget-holders and the central finance function too weak to control what they are doing). The MOD have been completely unable to explain what the additional £650m this year is to be spent on.

"I know your instinct will be to back the MOD on this. But frankly I do not think they have much of a case."[256]

439. Mr Heywood provided an update on negotiations to Mr Blair on 10 October.[257] Mr Brown had "grudgingly acquiesced" to provide an additional £250m in 2003/04 (and nothing for 2004/05 and 2005/06), "despite the rapidly deteriorating fiscal position".

440. Mr Heywood concluded that providing an additional £350m to £375m for 2003/04 would be a reasonable compromise, with additional funding for the following years to be considered after a review of the MOD's financial controls.

441. Mr Blair met Mr Brown and Mr Hoon separately in mid-October to discuss the issue.[258]

442. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 17 October, identifying the short- and medium-term consequences of the imposition of cash controls.[259] Those included a reduction in the preparedness of the military to conduct operations, cuts and delays in equipment programmes, delays to planned pay increases, cuts in force structure, and a freeze on recruitment in some areas. Mr Hoon argued that to avoid those consequences, he would need authority to transfer more than the £400m "which is being suggested" for 2003/04, and agreement now for similar levels of transfers in subsequent years.

443. Mr Heywood passed that letter to Mr Blair, advising that he had almost brokered a deal between the MOD and the Treasury which involved:

- an additional £385m to £400m for the MOD in 2003/04;
- an external review of the MOD's financial control systems; and
- a decision on funding in future years in the light of the findings of that review.[260]

444. Mr Heywood described that deal as "exceptionally generous", given that the Reserve was already fully spent and the UK was heading for a "massive fiscal overshoot". He concluded:

"I very much hope that you will endorse the compromise … This also means overruling GB [Mr Brown]. He is currently refusing to countenance an offer of more than £250m. But his officials know that that will not wash!"

[260] Minute Heywood to Prime Minister, 17 October 2003, 'Defence Budget'.

445. Mr Heywood wrote to Mr Hoon's Private Secretary on 23 October:

> "The Prime Minister shares the Chancellor's – and Sir Andrew Likierman's – concern about recent financial developments within MOD …
> "However, given the late stage of the financial year and so as to minimise the disruption to front line defence and morale at this critical time, the Prime Minister and Chancellor are prepared to agree a one-off cash uplift of £400m for 2003/04 …"[261]

446. That uplift was conditional on MOD agreement to an externally led review of its financial control arrangements, and an assurance it would make maximum use of savings generated by its efficiency programme to ensure that cash and resource spending were properly controlled. Once the review had made its recommendations and any changes to the MOD financial controls had been implemented, the Treasury would look again at Mr Hoon's request for extra cash for 2004/05 and 2005/06.

447. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that it was the MOD's normal practice to appeal to Mr Blair on funding issues:

> "… given the particular nature of the Blair Government, the MOD tended to look to … the Prime Minister for understanding and support in the budgetary context. Some other departments went direct to the Chancellor. We usually tried to operate through Number 10 because we were always coping with the problem of a policy ambition which the Prime Minister subscribed to, which was never quite matched by the financial attitude of the Chancellor."[262]

448. The external review of the MOD's cash management arrangements (the Likierman review), which was undertaken by Cap Gemini Ernst and Young, issued on 25 November.[263]

449. Mr Woolley forwarded the review to Mr Hoon and Sir Kevin Tebbit the following day.[264] He commented:

> "While not a report we would ourselves have written … [it] provides only very limited support to the criticisms levelled at the department [the MOD] by the Chancellor and the Chief Secretary."

450. Mr Woolley said that the review confirmed that RAB did not require departments to control net cash or near cash, which was "the kernel of our case".

[264] Minute Woolley to Hoon, 26 November 2003, 'PSX 26 November – CGEY Report'.

451. Mr Dodds forwarded the Likierman review to Mr Boateng on 28 November.[265] He summarised its main findings:

- Since the 2000 Spending Review, the MOD had had no systems that provided effective control over its net cash requirement (the actual cash required by the MOD to carry out its business).
- The MOD was not aware of its near cash position.
- Treasury guidance could have been clearer in defining the controls that departments needed to maintain. The MOD had set out its argument to the review team: that it had not controlled cash or near cash because it was not required to do so under full RAB.

452. Mr Dodds recommended that Treasury and MOD officials should develop a framework to control the transfer of non-cash savings into cash spending. The framework could allow transfers where they resulted from efficiency gains and subject to a cap. Decisions on the MOD's budget for 2004/05 and 2005/06 should await the conclusion of those discussions.

453. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Brown on 17 December, proposing that the Treasury allow the MOD to transfer £750m from non-cash to cash in both 2004/05 and 2005/06.[266] Mr Hoon stated that the cash controls imposed by the Treasury had required the MOD to reduce planned expenditure in the current financial year (2003/04) by £800m, and would require the MOD to reduce planned expenditure by £1bn a year in future years.

454. Mr Hoon cited the Likierman review in support of this request:

> "I was pleased, but not surprised, that the CAP Gemini Ernst and Young Report [the Likierman review] gave the MOD a clean bill of health. It confirmed that the Resource Accounting and Budgeting framework does not require control of net cash or near cash … the MOD was following the terms of the settlement letter and your rules."
> "Given the outcome of the … review, I can expect restoration of the freedom to flex more than £1bn per year from non-cash to cash – which is what is required to maintain the direction envisaged at the time of SR2002 and the SDR New Chapter. However, I do recognise … the fiscal position and our collective responsibilities in this area. I accordingly propose that we agree to flex £750 million in 2004/05 and £750 million in 2005/06."

455. Mr Hoon wrote again to Mr Brown on 25 February 2004, highlighting the implications of the cash controls imposed by the Treasury.[267] The £800m reduction in planned expenditure in 2003/04 had been achieved largely by reducing planned expenditure on new equipment and logistic support for the Armed Forces, "with obvious consequences for operational capability in future years". Retaining the cash controls in future years would cause huge damage to military capability, the loss of jobs in industry and damage to the Government's credibility.

456. Sir Kevin Tebbit provided advice to Mr Hoon on 5 March on the specific reductions in programmes and capability in 2004/05 and 2005/06 that would be required by the Treasury's cash controls.[268]

457. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 8 March, highlighting some of those reductions and stating that he could accept authority to transfer £500m (rather than £750m) from non-cash to cash each year.[269]

458. Mr Hoon submitted the MOD's bid for funding to the 2004 Spending Review on 26 April.

459. On 6 July, as negotiations on the outcome of the 2004 Spending Review reached a conclusion, and with the MOD's bid under pressure, Sir Michael Walker, Chief of the Defence Staff, wrote to Mr Brown:

> "Were the [MOD's] bid not to be met … I would be unable to present the outcome to the Armed Forces as being consistent with policy and other than the consequence of inadequate funding."[270]

460. Mr Hoon echoed that warning in a letter to Mr Blair on 9 July:

> "… a settlement around this level is essential for the Chiefs of Staff to support it. I could not rule out the Chiefs speaking out in public, not least because I would not expect them to be able to explain a poor settlement in positive terms to their people."[271]

461. On 11 July, in an accompanying letter to the MOD's 2004 Spending Review settlement, the Treasury agreed that the MOD could transfer £350m from non-cash to cash in both 2004/05 and 2005/06.[272] A new regime would be established from 2006/07, under which transfers would be at least in part conditional on efficiency improvements.

THE MOD REFLECTS ON THE REASONS FOR ITS INCREASED CASH REQUIREMENT

462. In June 2004, in response to a request from Sir Kevin Tebbit for an explanation of how the MOD's cash requirement had grown from £490m to £870m to £1,152m during the course of September 2003, Mr Lester sent him a chronology of the dispute which had been produced towards the end of 2003.[273] Mr Lester commented that the chronology had been produced to clarify the MOD's internal understanding, and was not to be handed over to the Treasury.

463. The chronology showed:

- In December 2001, the MOD estimated that it would have an Annually Managed Expenditure (AME) "surplus" of £500m a year (compared with its previous estimate).
- The MOD had "serious doubts" about that estimate (some of the figures were "clearly wrong"), so used its previous (higher) estimate as the basis for its 2002 Spending Review bid.
- Further estimates in April and June 2002 increased the MOD's confidence that it would have a £500m a year AME surplus, though it was still not certain. The MOD assumed that the Treasury would scrutinise its AME figures as part of the 2002 Spending Review; if it had, the MOD would probably have reduced its bid. But the Treasury did not scrutinise the figures.
- When the MOD agreed its 2002 Spending Review settlement in July 2002, while it still did not trust its exact AME figures, it was confident that "there would be scope to bear down on … costs … That was why we were able to recommend acceptance of the settlement."
- Prompted by continuing doubts about the accuracy of its AME figures, the MOD conducted a "detailed scrutiny" in December 2002. That exercise confirmed the AME surplus. The surplus was "reinvested" for cash expenditure the following month.
- MOD Top Level Budget-holders (TLBs) continued to refine their AME figures, revealing further significant reductions in their requirement. The forecast surpluses were reinvested for cash expenditure in February 2003.
- Analysis of the forecasts provided by MOD TLBs in late August revealed further reductions in their AME requirement.
- The MOD warned the Treasury on 12 September that the MOD's cash requirement had increased from £490m to £870m.
- The MOD warned the Treasury on 24 September that the MOD's cash requirement had increased to £1,152m.

464. Mr Lester's covering note advised:

> "PUS [Sir Kevin Tebbit] asked why we 'got it wrong' as the headline numbers rose from £490m to £870m to £1,152m during the course of September 2003. This is not easy to explain … the Treasury's key accusation – that we lost control of TLBs expenditure – is wrong. What did happen was that we found it very difficult to re-invent the non-cash and near-cash split in TLBs budgets, having made the transition to full RAB."[274]

[273] Email Lester to PS/PUS [MOD], 18 June 2004, 'Non-Cash Chronology' attaching Paper, [undated], 'Chronology of Non-Cash Debate with the Treasury in 2003'.

465. Mr Lester identified the main reasons behind the increase in the MOD's cash requirement from £490m to £870m:

- "late technical refinements" by MOD TLBs (£200m);
- a reassessment by FLEET (the Royal Navy's operational Command) of its requirements (£122m); and
- policy decisions (£40m).

466. The main reason behind the increase in the MOD's cash requirement from £870m to £1,152m was the discovery that the MOD had issued its TLBs with over £200m more near-cash than it had available. That error had been caused by the absence of a near-cash control total in the 2002 Spending Review settlement.

467. Lord Boateng told the Inquiry that he doubted that Mr Hoon and Sir Kevin Tebbit had been aware of the particular opportunities created by full RAB for the MOD when they had welcomed the MOD's 2002 settlement:

"I think this was an opportunity that became available later, and they saw the opportunity and they took it …

"A fair enough wheeze perhaps, if not one that could be tolerated."[275]

THE IMPACT OF THE TREASURY CONTROLS

468. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that the imposition of cash controls "caused quite a lot of problems", because the MOD had been spending at a rate which assumed an unlimited flexibility to transfer non-cash to cash, and had made plans which assumed this unlimited flexibility.[276]

469. Mr Hoon also told the Inquiry that although the MOD's forward equipment programmes, including its helicopter programmes, had been affected, he doubted whether this had "immediate consequences" for the UK's operations in Iraq:

"I don't believe that it was relevant to helicopters in Iraq … I suppose it is reasonable to assume that by now [January 2010], had that budget have been spent in the way that we thought we should spend it, then those helicopters would probably be coming into service any time now."[277]

470. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that Mr Brown's decision to impose cash controls meant that the MOD:

> "… had to go in for a very major savings exercise in order to cope with what was effectively a billion pound reduction in our finances."
> "… the way we went through this exercise was to preserve resources for Iraq, for the operational scenarios that we were currently engaged in, and to make cuts and savings in the areas which were least likely to be called upon …"[278]

471. In response to a question from the Inquiry, Sir Kevin said that it was "very difficult to say" that the reduction had had a long-term impact on UK operations in Iraq.[279]

472. Mr Brown told the Inquiry that the MOD had more funding available to it in 2002/03, 2003/04 and 2004/05 than it had secured in the 2002 Spending Review:

- the additional £500m for 2002/03, which had been confirmed by Mr Boateng in July 2002; and
- authority to transfer £400m from non-cash to cash in 2003/04 and 2004/05.[280]

473. Mr Brown also emphasised that the size of the MOD's core budget had "really not much to do with Iraq, because Iraq was being funded completely separately".[281]

474. Sir Kevin Tebbit agreed with that analysis:

> "I really do not believe that our activities in Iraq were constrained by the overall size of the MOD budget. My own view was that Afghanistan was – putting the two together was where the strain came subsequently."[282]

475. Sections 6.3 and 14 describe how the MOD prioritised key military capabilities.

MR BROWN'S EVIDENCE TO THE INQUIRY ON INCREASES IN THE MOD'S CORE BUDGET

476. In October 2009, the House of Commons Library published a note showing defence expenditure in near-cash terms between 1955/56 and 2008/09.[283] The use of near-cash terms allowed comparison between years before and after the transition from cash accounting to RAB. The table below shows those figures for the period from 2001/02 to 2008/09.

477. Mr Brown told the Inquiry on 5 March 2010 that the defence budget had risen in real terms (i.e. after adjusting for inflation) every year during the period covered by the Inquiry;[285] and that the budgets allocated in the 2002, 2004 and 2007 Spending Reviews had provided increases in "real terms spending" of 1.2 percent, 1.4 percent and 1.5 percent respectively.[286]

478. Mr Brown wrote to the Inquiry on 17 March 2010, to clarify that while defence expenditure had risen every year in cash terms, it had not risen every year in real terms.[287] Mr Brown provided figures for the MOD's core budget in near-cash and real terms, and total defence expenditure (including NACMO) for the period 2001/02 to 2009/10. Those figures are set out in the table below (the percentage variations between years have been added by the Inquiry).

479. The figures provided by Mr Brown show that:

- The MOD's core budget fell between 2001/02 and 2002/03 and between 2006/07 and 2007/08, and rose in all other years.
- Defence expenditure, which includes a number of significant additional factors, including NACMO, fell between 2003/04 and 2004/05 and between 2005/06 and 2006/07, and rose in all other years.

New arrangements for funding Urgent Operational Requirements, July 2007

480. The Inquiry concludes in Section 9.8 that, from July 2005 onwards, decisions in relation to resources for Iraq were made under the influence of the demands of the UK effort in Afghanistan. Although Iraq remained the stated UK Main Effort, the Government no longer had the option of a substantial reinforcement of its forces there.

481. The funding approved for Urgent Operational Requirements (UORs) increased significantly in 2006/07, as security in Iraq deteriorated, expenditure on Afghanistan increased, and the Government provided new equipment to protect deployed personnel (see Section 14.1).

482. The table below shows the funding approved by the Treasury for UORs relating to Iraq from 2002/03 to 2009/10.[289] Information on actual expenditure on UORs was not captured separately until 2008/09.

484. The arrangements for funding UORs which had been agreed between the MOD and the Treasury in September 2002 continued to operate until autumn 2006.

485. In autumn 2006, the UOR envelopes for Iraq and Afghanistan were combined, with a view to providing additional flexibility in managing UOR funding and to reduce bureaucracy in the MOD and the Treasury.[291]

486. Mr Des Browne, the Defence Secretary, was advised by an MOD official on 24 November 2006 that he should write to Mr Stephen Timms, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, to request an increase of £460m in the combined UOR envelope.[292] Despite tight controls, the requirements for UORs continued "at a rate higher than anticipated, and considerably above historical norms", because of:

- the intensity of operations in Afghanistan;
- the slow drawdown of forces from Iraq;
- the constantly evolving threat in both theatres; and
- "a decreased willingness, at all levels, to 'make do' with sub-optimal solutions and uncomfortable living and working conditions now that both operations [Afghanistan and Iraq] have become enduring".

487. The size of the request prompted Mr Browne's Assistant Private Secretary to do "a little digging" into the MOD's UOR system.[293] He reported to Mr Browne that:

> "The UOR system – the people who make bids on it and those who sanction bids within it – are changing their attitude. There is greater willingness to ask for technical solutions to reduce risk and discomfort and less inclination to block such bids. Partly this is because there is a perception (rightly or wrongly) that the political environment has changed, and money is no longer the constraint it was …

> "The other factor is that our aspirations are rising and the harder we fight the better we want to do it."

488. Mr Browne's Assistant Private Secretary suggested to Mr Browne that they should discuss the UOR culture that was forming, and "whether we need to re-steer a little or accept that this is the new price of doing business".

489. The MOD told the Inquiry that it has no record of a discussion between Mr Browne and his Assistant Private Secretary on that issue.[294]

490. Mr Browne wrote to Mr Timms on 4 December to request an increase of £460m in the combined UOR envelope for Iraq and Afghanistan.[295]

491. Mr Timms was advised by a Treasury official on 9 January 2007 that:

> "At official level, MOD have indicated that the underlying reason for the sustained high level of UORs is linked to a Ministerial judgement that soldiers must be provided with the optimum equipment, especially where force protection is at stake.
> "HMT [the Treasury] have never refused a request to fund a UOR. Once forces are deployed and commanders are generating requirements it is difficult to deny the resources … It follows that the mechanism for limiting the total cost of operations is to resist any expansion of troops committed to operations, rather than UORs to supply the troops already deployed in theatre."[296]

492. Mr Timms agreed Mr Browne's request in full on 15 January.[297]

493. Mr Browne wrote to Mr Timms on 29 March to request a further increase of £450m in the combined UOR envelope for Iraq and Afghanistan, to cover the first four months of the financial year 2007/08.[298]

494. Mr Paul Taylor, MOD Director General Equipment, met Mr James Quinault, Head of the Treasury's Defence, Diplomacy and Intelligence Team, on 19 April to discuss that request.[299]

[298] Letter Browne to Timms, 29 March 2007, [untitled].
[299] Minute Taylor to PS/SofS [MOD], 24 April 2007, 'Treasury Reaction to Requested Increase in UOR Funding'.

495. Reporting the Treasury's "emerging response" to Mr Browne, Mr Taylor said that Mr Quinault had made clear:

- The current, high level of UOR approvals was generating significant financial pressure on the Reserve, such that Treasury officials viewed the current UOR mechanism as "unsustainable".
- A key Treasury concern was that there was no incentive within the current UOR mechanism for the MOD to manage demand or reprioritise equipment plans.
- In the shorter term, Treasury officials were keen to modify the UOR mechanism so that the Treasury agreed a smaller envelope to cover smaller UORs, while larger UORs would be agreed individually with Treasury officials.
- In the longer term, a new UOR mechanism should be considered as part of the forthcoming Comprehensive Spending Review.

496. Mr Quinault had also told MOD officials that he would be recommending to Mr Timms that he should ask the MOD to find the resources for two UORs which he perceived as general capability enhancements.

497. Mr Taylor concluded:

> "All that said, Quinault accepted that Treasury Ministers may take a different view given the evident sensitivities, so we should not assume anything about the formal Treasury response until the Chief Secretary [Mr Timms] has written …"

498. A Treasury official advised Mr Timms on 20 April that the "step change" in the level of UOR funding made the current UOR arrangement "unsustainable".[300] The Treasury had provided £2.1bn to fund UORs relating to Iraq and Afghanistan since 2001, of which over half had been provided in the last two years:

> "We [the Treasury] do not question the military judgment that there is a current operational need – but we believe that many of these items seek to provide a general capability that could have been provided through the Equipment Programme. Many items appear to be kitting out the Army while the Equipment Programme has invested in ships and aircraft … As such we think the UOR scheme is becoming a straightforward supplement to the EP [Equipment Programme] in a way that it was never intended to be, bailing out MOD of the need to prioritise in the kit they purchase and compensating for bad decisions in the past."

[300] Minute Treasury [junior official] to Timms, 20 April 2007, 'Increase in the Urgent Operational Requirements Envelope'.

499. The official advised that the UOR regime was not ideal for the UK military either, as:

- Despite accelerated procurement, UORs were frequently not available until several months after a need had been identified. It would be better to plan to have the capability in advance.
- That would also enable soldiers to be trained on new equipment before their deployment to theatre, and for new equipment to be properly incorporated into military doctrine.
- After one year, the ongoing costs of UORs reverted to the core defence budget. Those unplanned costs could be difficult to accommodate.

500. The official recommended that Mr Timms agree a £200m increase in the combined UOR envelope, and signal a need for a new UOR regime to be negotiated within the forthcoming Comprehensive Spending Review.

501. Mr Timms replied to Mr Browne on 9 May:

> "We discussed that the UOR regime has drifted from its original intentions. We agreed we need a different arrangement for the funding for UORs in the future … I propose we seek to develop this as part of our discussions around the CSR [Comprehensive Spending Review]."[301]

502. As an "interim solution", Mr Timms agreed to increase the UOR ceiling by £200m. For expenditure above that ceiling, and (in line with existing arrangements) for all individual UORs above £10m, the MOD should seek Treasury approval on a case-by-case basis.

503. The MOD and Treasury have told the Inquiry that they have no record of that discussion between Mr Timms and Mr Browne.[302]

504. From June 2007, the Treasury cleared every UOR individually (rather than only those above £10m).[303]

505. The outline of a new UOR regime was agreed in late July, as part of the MOD's settlement in the 2007 Comprehensive Spending Review:

- The Reserve would pay for the "first element" of total UOR costs each year.

- The MOD and Treasury would share equally any costs in excess of this amount (with the Treasury meeting those excess costs up front, and then reclaiming them from the MOD on a rolling three-year basis).
- The MOD would receive £200m to assist with its first payments under this new arrangement.
- The MOD would review its equipment programme with the intention of "rebalancing spend towards … the current operating environment".[304]

506. Discussions continued between MOD and Treasury officials over the detail of the new arrangement, including the size of the "first element".

507. Mr Lester advised Mr Woolley on 30 October that:

> "The agreed aim is that the new arrangements should be cost neutral to Defence, albeit with changed incentives, and Quinault professes to mean this."[305]

508. Mr Lester continued:

> "The Treasury have indicated that their intention is to drive the lump sum [first element] as far down as possible in an attempt to change our UOR spending behaviour (they have indicated that they see this as a vehicle to shift our EP [equipment programme] towards current operations). Their prejudice is that MOD does not make real prioritisation decisions on UORs …"

509. Mr Lester also reported that the arrangements which had been in place since June, whereby the Treasury cleared each UOR individually, had not proved to be unduly constraining, though the Treasury was "increasingly pushing back".

510. Agreement on the size of the first element was reached in mid-December 2007, at £500m for 2008/09, based on the MOD's "central estimate" of UOR expenditure of £900m.[306]

511. Mr Woolley told the Inquiry that the change in the UOR regime:

> "… was intended to give a little bit greater certainty to the Treasury of what the UOR bill was likely to be and it was effectively an attempt to incentivise us [the MOD] to forecast in advance what the UOR spend in … the forthcoming year – would be."[307]

512. Mr Woolley said that the change had not affected operations in Iraq, which were by that time generating fewer demands for UORs.

Funding for civilian activities in the post-conflict period

Initial funding for reconstruction

513. At Prime Minister's Questions on 19 March 2003, Mr David Rendel asked for an assurance that sufficient funds for post-conflict reconstruction would be made available quickly.[308]

514. Mr Blair replied:

> " … we will ensure that funds are available – indeed, funds have already been earmarked for the purpose and the Secretary of State for International Development, the Ministry of Defence and the Treasury are doing all they can to make sure that we co-ordinate with American allies and also with other UN partners to ensure that the funds are available … so that in the post-conflict situation in Iraq the people of Iraq are given the future that they need."

515. The Coalition began military action against Iraq on the night of 19/20 March. At that time, the Government had made no provision for funding for reconstruction.

516. Ms Short wrote to Mr Boateng on 21 March, to request £120m from the Reserve for humanitarian relief in Iraq.[309] Ms Short advised that her bid did not include any funds for reconstruction:

> "In the longer term, we will need to consider reconstruction costs. We agree with you that there should be broad international burden sharing of any financing gap unmet by oil revenues, with a major role for the IFIs. But we will need to discuss these issues further at the appropriate time in the coming weeks, once the post-conflict situation is clearer and we have an IFI led needs assessment."

517. Mr Straw sent Mr Blair four FCO papers in advance of Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush at Camp David on 26 and 27 March, including one on post-conflict Iraq (see Section 10.1).[310] The FCO stated that Ms Short was considering where the UK might help with "reform and reconstruction"; however:

> "Public finances are tight. If we are to keep Armed Forces in Iraq, the scope for a major effort on reform and reconstruction will be limited."[311]

518. In his 9 April Budget statement to the House of Commons, Mr Brown announced that he had set aside "an additional US$100 million" to "back up the UN and the work of reconstruction and development".[312]

519. The Treasury told the Inquiry that it has no record of any department requesting that allocation.[313]

520. On the same day, a Treasury official advised Mr Boateng that, as DFID still had £95m available for humanitarian work, and given that the UN did not yet have a presence on the ground in Iraq and the reconstruction effort had not yet started, he should write to Ms Short "to impose some safeguards" on the additional US$100m.[314]

521. Mr Boateng wrote to Ms Short on 15 April to clarify how DFID could access those funds.[315] He understood that DFID did not need the additional funds immediately, given that humanitarian and reconstruction work was at a very early stage and that DFID had £95m of uncommitted resources. He fully expected DFID to bid for additional funding for Iraq "in the next few months". Mr Boateng asked that, before DFID looked to access the new funds, Ms Short should write to him setting out her proposals for how the additional funding would be spent.

522. Ms Short agreed on 23 April that other departments should be given access to the US$100m allocation, to pay for their secondments to the US-led Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance (ORHA).[316] That would mean that they, rather than DFID, would have to pass the Treasury's tests on value for money and effectiveness.

523. Mr Boateng wrote to Mr Straw on 2 May to endorse the "broad consensus" that £4.8m of the US$100m/£60m allocation should be ring-fenced for the inter-departmental Iraq Planning Unit (IPU), to cover the cost of UK secondees to ORHA.[317]

524. On 2 May, Ms Short's Private Secretary sent Mr Rycroft an "Interim DFID Strategy" for the next three to six months as Iraq transitioned from "relief/recovery to reconstruction".[318]

525. The strategy stated that the expected humanitarian crisis had not materialised, and set out the "immediate recovery tasks" and "broader [reconstruction] agenda" that now needed to be addressed.

526. The strategy stated that DFID had earmarked £210m for "relief, recovery and reconstruction activities" in the current financial year (2003/04). That allocation comprised the £90m provided by DFID from its own resources and the £120m provided from the Central Reserve on 27 March, for humanitarian assistance. The US$100m announced by Mr Brown on 9 April had been "earmarked" for DFID; it had subsequently been agreed that the costs of secondments to ORHA could be met from that allocation.

527. Based on contemporaneous sources and figures provided to the Inquiry, the Inquiry estimates that DFID had committed £117.8m to the humanitarian assistance effort by May 2003, of which £89m had been disbursed. That comprised:

- £78m to UN agencies (of which £64m had been disbursed);
- £32m to the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and the Iraqi Red Crescent (of which £18m had been disbursed);
- £6.2m to NGOs (of which £5.4m had been disbursed); and
- £1.6m for DFID's bilateral effort (all of which had been disbursed).[319]

528. The Inquiry estimates that £90m was therefore available to DFID for "recovery and reconstruction" or for further contributions to the humanitarian assistance effort.

529. The balance of the US$100m announced by Mr Brown on 9 April that would not be spent on secondments to ORHA was also available for reconstruction and development.

530. The Annotated Agenda for the 15 May meeting of the Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq Rehabilitation (AHMGIR) stated that the scale of the reconstruction challenge was "enormous".[320] Large projects would fall to ORHA and subsequently the Iraqi authorities. But there was a case now for "smaller refurbishment projects". Of the £10m available to the UK military for QIPs only £50,000 had been spent, and of the £30m available to the UK military for humanitarian relief operations in the UK's AO, only £3m had been committed and £1m spent. The remainder could be used for other purposes.

531. In discussion, Mr Boateng agreed that the MOD could spend the balance of the £10m allocated for QIPs, but said that "other funds for reconstruction" had been allocated to DFID.[321] The MOD and DFID needed to discuss the issue.

Initial funding for Security Sector Reform

532. Mr Straw, Ms Short, Mr Boateng and Mr Adam Ingram, Minister for the Armed Forces, agreed on 11 March 2003 that the Global Conflict Prevention Pool (GCPP) should retain a large reserve (of £10m) and a large Quick Response Fund (£5m) to "allow for" an Iraq Strategy focused on conflict prevention.[322]

533. On 10 April, Ms Philippa Drew, FCO Director Global Issues, informed Mr Dominick Chilcott, the Head of the IPU, that her Directorate – which managed the GCPP, the FCO's Environment Fund and the FCO's Global Opportunities Fund (GOF) – was now receiving requests for funding for Iraq.[323] It was difficult to assess those requests in the absence of an "agreed post-conflict strategy" for Iraq and "some idea of where other HMG funding might be going". Ms Drew asked whether there were plans to develop a strategy.

534. The FCO told the Inquiry that it could find no response from the IPU to Ms Drew's minute.[324]

535. The first Iraq project (on prison reform) was agreed for funding under the GCPP Quick Response Fund by the end of April.[325] An FCO official commented that the GCPP Fund was a global allocation, and there were already other calls on it. It would take some months to draw up a GCPP Strategy for Iraq that would allow officials to access the main GCPP budget.

536. Ms Drew chaired a meeting on 1 May to discuss how to handle funding requests relating to Iraq.[326] Officials from various FCO departments, the IPU, DFID and the MOD attended. The meeting identified several FCO funds that might provide funding for Iraq:

- The GOF Engaging with the Islamic World Programme. A "small amount" was available.
- The GOF Counter-Terrorism Programme. £4m was available in the current financial year.
- The GOF Climate Change and Energy Programme.
- The GCPP. Objectives for the current financial year had already been agreed and did not include Iraq.
- The GCPP Peacekeeping Budget. All funds were committed in the short term.
- The Human Rights Project Fund. A "very small sum" had been put aside for Iraq.
- The Public Diplomacy Challenge Fund. Funds should be available for Iraq.

537. The meeting agreed that all proposals should be passed through the IPU, to be assessed against wider UK priorities.

538. In a separate record of the meeting, an FCO official reported: "It was clear that within FCO little detailed thought has been given specifically to an Iraq programme and how it might be funded."[327]

539. FCO, DFID and MOD Ministers were invited to agree a GCPP Strategy for Iraq on 1 August.[328] The strategy aimed to provide a coherent framework for UK activities aimed at preventing conflict in Iraq. It comprised three elements:

- Security Sector Reform (SSR). This would be the "initial focus of activity". Ministers were invited to agree that expenditure on SSR activities could start immediately while work continued to define the other elements of the strategy.
- Assistance to "Iraqi Governorates and local administrations within the British AO [Area of Operations] as they develop to ensure that policy decisions are made strategically and with an understanding of conflict prevention issues".
- Further studies and analyses to assist in the development of UK conflict prevention strategies.

540. The estimated cost of the strategy was £7.5m in both 2003/04 and 2004/05. Of the £15m total, £9.5m was allocated for SSR, £4m for local governance and £1.5m for further studies and analyses.

Pressure for additional funding, autumn 2003

541. On 3 June 2003, following a visit to Iraq at the end of May, Mr Blair chaired a meeting attended by Mr Hoon, Baroness Amos (the International Development Secretary), Sir Michael Jay (in Mr Straw's absence) and No.10 officials.[329] Mr Blair said he had returned from Iraq convinced that "an enormous amount needed to be done". The Government should go back to "a war footing" for the next two to three months to avoid "losing the peace in Iraq".

542. Section 10.1 describes how, in July 2003, the Government took on the leadership of Coalition Provisional Authority (South) (CPA(South)) without considering the significant strategic, resource and reputational implications of such a decision.

PRESSURE FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDING FOR DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATION AND SECURITY

543. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Boateng on 18 July, seeking £30.4m from the Reserve to cover additional costs incurred by the FCO relating to Iraq for 2003/04.[330] Mr Straw stated that he had been reluctant to put in a Reserve claim, "not least because of Gordon's [Mr Brown's] strictures about the pressure on it". The FCO had, however, reached the limit of its ability to manage the constant new demands on its resources:

> "… the continuing need to fund Afghanistan operations in Kabul and London; Iraq costs; and the costs of increased security around the world in the light of the Al-Qaida threat, heightened by Britain's role in Iraq …

[330] Letter Straw to Chief Secretary to the Treasury, 18 July 2003, 'Iraq-Related Costs'.

"This has required cuts into the muscle of our operation – including the closure or localisation of nearly a dozen diplomatic posts."

544. The £30.4m bid comprised:

- £5.3m for costs associated with the British Office in Baghdad and the UK Special Representative in Baghdad;
- £2.1m to establish a British Office in Basra;
- £7.7m to improve security for FCO staff in Baghdad;
- £4m to improve security for FCO staff in Basra;
- £2.7m to improve the security of FCO posts outside Iraq;
- £8.5m to support and provide security for UK secondees to the CPA, including costs associated with Sir Hilary Synnott; and
- £138,000 to support Ms Ann Clwyd, the Prime Minister's Envoy on Human Rights in Iraq.

545. Mr Straw also requested that £28m be added to the FCO's budget for 2004/05 to cover the continuing costs of those activities.

546. Sir Hilary Synnott arrived in Basra on 30 July, to lead CPA(South).[331]

547. Sir Hilary wrote in his memoirs that his arrival established "some sort of British Fiefdom" in the South, but one which was "still entirely dependent on American resources for its lifeblood".[332]

548. In late August the FCO increased its bid for support and security for staff seconded to the CPA from £8.5m to £15.5m, bringing the total FCO bid to the Reserve for 2003/04 to £38m.[333]

549. Treasury officials advised Mr Boateng on 4 September that he should:

- Accept the bid relating to support and security for staff seconded to the CPA (£15.5m). That could be funded from the US$100m/£60m allocation announced by Mr Brown on 9 April.
- Provide £6m of the £7.7m requested to improve security for FCO staff in Baghdad.
- Reject the other bids (totalling some £15m), as those related to "costs that the FCO knew about but chose not to make contingency arrangements for".

551. Mr Boateng replied to Mr Straw on 9 September, in line with the advice provided by officials.[334]

552. Mr Simon Gass, FCO Director Finance, called on Mr Jonathan Stephens, the senior Treasury official dealing with the FCO, the following day.[335]

553. Mr Gass reported to Sir Michael Jay that he had rehearsed the FCO's arguments for additional funding and challenged Mr Stephens on whether the MOD and DFID were being asked to absorb costs arising from Iraq to the same extent as the FCO. He reported that:

> "He [Mr Stephens] was evasive and uncomfortable … He argued weakly that the decision was taken on the basis of capacity and ability to absorb … I pointed out that DFID and MOD both had much greater capacity to absorb not only because of the size of their budgets but also because of the strain on FCO expenditure …
> "They [the Treasury] are certainly stung by accusations that the FCO is being singled out for harsher treatment than other Government departments and this should be part of the Foreign Secretary's line with the Chief Secretary."

PRESSURE FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDING FOR RECONSTRUCTION

554. Security in Iraq deteriorated in August 2003. Concerns about progress on reconstruction in the South and the implications for the level of consent enjoyed by UK forces led the Government to seek rapid and visible improvements in essential services.

555. Section 10.1 describes the subsequent development of the US$127m Essential Services Plan, to improve delivery of essential services in the South.

556. Mr Hilary Benn, Minister for International Development, told the 4 September meeting of the AHMGIR that DFID would contribute £20m (US$30m) to the Essential Services Plan, to improve delivery of essential services in the South.[336] The UK should continue to seek the balance of the funding from the CPA, but must be prepared to act fast on its own if necessary.

557. Mr Benn wrote to Mr Blair later that day to confirm DFID's commitment.[337] Mr Benn advised that:

> "We [DFID] have held back from committing to meet the full cost [of the Essential Services Plan], to avoid giving the impression to the CPA that HMG wants to take [336] Minutes, 4 September 2003, Ad Hoc Group on Iraq Rehabilitation meeting.

[337] Letter Benn to Blair, 4 September 2003, 'Iraq: Restoring Essential Services in the South'.

> on full responsibility for the South of the country including the future funding of all infrastructure. Such a commitment would be financially and logistically enormous, and well beyond DFID's budget. We need to keep pressing [Ambassador] Bremer to make more effective use of CPA resources …"

558. Baroness Amos wrote to Mr Boateng on 10 September to request an additional £6.5m from the Reserve to cover immediate further needs in Iraq, and that a further £33.5m should be "ear-marked" within the Reserve for anticipated requirements later in the financial year.[338] Those anticipated requirements included £20m for a future contribution to the Essential Services Plan if CPA funding proved insufficient.

559. Baroness Amos advised that the £40m she was requesting represented the balance of the US$100m/£60m announced by Mr Brown in his 9 April statement to Parliament, to "back up the UN and the work of reconstruction and development".

560. The following day, in a letter to Mr Blair, Baroness Amos advised that:

> "… our overall approach has been predicated on CPA delivering more than it has, and we have had negligible influence on them, or the Pentagon, to try and turn it around. Immediate measures are now needed to maintain the Iraqi population's consent."[339]

561. The Essential Services Plan would help, but solving the underlying problems in infrastructure would require billions of dollars and an Iraqi government to set policy. Systemic problems within the CPA continued to delay the transfer of promised CPA resources to the South. Baroness Amos concluded:

> "If CPA HQ and [the] US Government fail to get its act together quickly, then we can only plug the gap if my earlier Reserve claim … is approved."

562. A Treasury official provided advice to Mr Boateng on 18 September on how the Treasury intended to deal with the expected surge in Iraq-related claims on the Reserve.[340]

563. Departments had seen Mr Blair's call for a step change in the UK effort in Iraq (on 3 June) as "a legitimate invitation" to bid for more resources. They were developing or considering seven bids. The largest of those was a bid being prepared by DFID for around £250m, as the UK's additional contribution to Iraq's reconstruction.

564. It was vitally important to maintain pressure on departments, both at Ministerial and official level, not to submit claims in the first place. The Treasury would also continue to push for greater co-ordination between departments in funding Iraq programmes.

565. Beyond that, the Treasury would continue to scrutinise claims on a case by case basis, in terms of value for money, impact, and robustness of the costing, and the robustness of the risk management. Departments would also have to provide "clear evidence" on the extent to which they had reprioritised their existing resources to accommodate Iraq:

> "The emphasis will be on satisfying ourselves over the degree of re-prioritisation that has taken place to accommodate Iraq-related pressure within existing baselines. DFID received an eight percent real terms budget increase over the SR2002 period, the FCO nearly three percent and the MOD received their most generous settlement for nearly 20 years. We are therefore far from convinced that further re-prioritisation within existing baselines is not possible."

566. The availability of CPA funding was key. Some officials in CPA(South) had stated that it was easier to secure funding from London than from CPA(Baghdad). The Treasury should therefore continue to push for CPA(Baghdad) to fund initiatives in the South, rather than providing a significant increase in UK funding.

567. Treasury officials had considered but rejected another approach – the creation of a "pooled arrangement" for future Iraq claims, with one pool for military activity and one for "reconstruction and related" activity. The idea had been raised by some (unnamed) departments. Such an arrangement might help ensure more effective prioritisation of activities and prevent a "piecemeal stream" of bids to the Reserve. Treasury officials had assessed, however, that creating a pooled arrangement now might encourage departments to allocate money "prematurely", before the outcome of the Madrid Donors Conference was known and before the effect of the anticipated increase in the flow of funding from CPA(Baghdad) to CPA(South) was clear. The potential demand for funds was so great that a pool could quickly be emptied, prompting further claims to the Reserve. The official commented that the Treasury might wish to revisit the idea of an Iraq pool in the future, if the situation changed.

568. Mr Boateng replied to Baroness Amos on 25 September, agreeing to provide an additional £6.5m from the Reserve to cover immediate further needs in Iraq, but rejecting the request to earmark £33.5m for DFID's anticipated future needs, citing "recent reports that … [US] sources of funding are now starting to be unblocked".[341]

569. Sir Nicholas Macpherson told the Inquiry that although it was "totally open" to Baroness Amos to challenge that response, she did not.[342] He pointed out that the US$100m announced by Mr Brown in his 9 April Budget statement was never fully claimed by departments.

570. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Sir Suma Chakrabarti suggested that this exchange had not occurred in isolation:

[341] Letter Boateng to Amos, 25 September 2003, 'Iraq: Reconstruction Funding: Reserve Claim'.
[342] Public hearing, 22 January 2010, page 22.

> "We had discussions [with] the Treasury but it was quite obvious to us that they weren't going to give any more than they already had … They had put some money in upfront [in March 2003, for humanitarian assistance], but, after that, they said it is time to reprioritise."[343]

571. The CPA allocated the balance of the funding for the Essential Services Plan the following month.

572. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Boateng on 6 October, requesting £13.9m from the Reserve to improve the content and professionalism of the Iraq Media Network, the CPA's main channel of communication with the Iraqi people.[344]

573. Mr Straw stated that the issue was a priority for Mr Blair. The FCO could not fund a new priority that had emerged halfway through the financial year from its existing, very small programme budgets: the FCO's Public Diplomacy Challenge Fund had an allocation of £2.5m in 2003/04, of which all but £50,000 had already been allocated.

574. A Treasury official advised Mr Boateng that he should reject the bid:

> "The FCO have not considered any other means to fund this strategy … They have not even conserved a partial contribution from their own DEL … they have not engaged the British Council, they have not looked to the Global Conflict Prevention Pool (GCPP), and have not sought to reconcile their media work with DFID's.
> "The Prime Minister views an effective CPA media strategy as vital, therefore the FCO believe we cannot resist a Reserve Claim and have abdicated responsibility for ensuring that this package represents VFM [value for money]."[345]

575. The official also advised Mr Boateng that the FCO was holding up agreement to a UK pledge at the Madrid Donors Conference until the bid was agreed.

576. Mr Boateng replied to Mr Straw on 16 October, rejecting the FCO's bid on the grounds that he was not convinced the proposal would deliver value for money, and that the FCO had not fully explored the use of its existing resources.[346]

577. Mr Straw responded on 20 October:

> "You repeat the mantra that we must look for existing resources within the FCO, the GCPP and other departments … But it is not clear to me whether the Treasury has a view as to how much the FCO can reprioritise without damaging the delivery of other Government priorities overseas in a way which is self-defeating. In the last two years, the FCO has entered three claims on the Reserve in respect of the events in Afghanistan and Iraq – none of which were predictable within the Spending Review cycle. The total FCO claims for these reserves were £105 million. The Treasury did not dispute the unforeseeable and emergency nature of these costs and yet the Reserve met only £54.5 million …

"… I have consistently rejected knee-jerk claims from officials that they need more resources when in fact they have done insufficient to reprioritise. But the FCO budget is now substantially overstretched … The Government needs to decide what priority it places on delivery of the Government's overseas agenda – including the direct costs to the Exchequer if we fail."[347]

578. When Mr Boateng's decision was discussed in the Iraq Senior Officials Group on 20 October, Sir Jeremy Greenstock commented that it would be difficult for him to return to the CPA without any UK funding, and that more generally "the absence of financial flexibility was making our work harder in Baghdad".[348]

579. Mr Boateng and Mr Straw discussed the bid after Cabinet on 23 October.[349]

580. The Treasury briefing for Mr Boateng rehearsed the reasons why the bid had been rejected, dismissed any suggestion that bids from the FCO were treated differently from those of other departments, and argued that the FCO had chosen not to reprioritise adequately to match the increasing demands of Iraq:

"At the end of last financial year and earlier this year, decisions could have been taken within the FCO to reallocate greater contingency funding to match this government priority [Iraq]. This never happened.

"Other departments, such as DFID, have shown themselves to be more flexible in re-prioritising to assist with the Iraq effort. FCO should be able to match this."[350]

581. After the meeting, Mr Boateng informed Treasury officials that he had received an assurance from Mr Straw that he would not pursue the bid further, and that they had agreed officials should continue to work to identify ways of funding media proposals from within existing resources.[351]

582. The FCO wrote to No.10 on 5 November, providing an update on its efforts to secure funding for the Iraqi Media Network.[352] The FCO had undertaken a "quick audit" of the UK Government's support for the Iraqi media and had, with Treasury colleagues, pressed other departments to do more. Funds available from FCO programme budgets, the British Council and possibly the World Service totalled between £1.5m and £2m.

583. In his statement to the Inquiry, Mr John Buck, FCO Director Iraq from September 2003 to July 2004, wrote:

> "… I remember spending a significant amount of time … trying to find several hundred thousand pounds to finance the purchase of a transmitter in southern Iraq for the Iraq Media Network … I tried the FCO finance people and was told that purchase of a transmitter wasn't really a proper call on FCO funds and that this should come from the Treasury's Reserve. I went to the Treasury and was told that this should really come out of the FCO's existing allocation, but perhaps it was worth trying DFID. I had a meeting with DFID, who took the view that they didn't really do media. I then went back to the FCO who did then find the money."[353]

584. The Inquiry asked Mr Buck why, for an initiative for which Mr Blair had expressed his support, and in a situation where Mr Straw was chairing the AHMGIR, the FCO had not been able to secure a relatively small amount of funding from the Treasury, and why the FCO had not tried to go "back up the chain" to Mr Straw or Mr Blair when funding was blocked.[354]

585. In response, Mr Buck highlighted the (in his view) favourable treatment enjoyed by the Treasury due to "broader politics within the Government".

586. Two further FCO bids to the Reserve during the CPA period, for £2m and £9.4m to improve security for staff seconded to the CPA, were agreed in full on 8 December 2003[355] and 30 January 2004 respectively.[356]

587. In May 2005, in the context of work to develop a new GCPP Iraq strategy for 2005/06, a DFID official involved in managing the GCPP Iraq strategy assessed the performance of that strategy in the previous year:

> "There was and is still no medium term [UK] roadmap … In this environment, it is not surprising that … the GCPP was used according to the priorities of the day, despite ministerial endorsement of its medium-term strategy. GCPP programming therefore lurched in tandem with evolving Iraqi and HMG priorities …

"Despite the political importance in the UK of the conflict in Iraq, very little funding has been made available to address … counter-insurgency and post-conflict nation-building. London and Post have both tended to turn towards GCPP as a primary funding source – in some cases to fund programmes that fit neither the GCPP strategy nor even its conflict prevention mandate (i.e. weapons for ISF [the Iraqi Security Forces], Basra poetry festival). Special Advisers and Ministers without budgets are also drawn to the Pool to fund activities in their areas of interest."[357]

Debt relief

The Treasury was the lead department within the UK Government on securing debt relief for Iraq.[358] It worked closely with the FCO and other departments to achieve that objective.

Paris Club creditors agreed on 21 November 2004 to reduce Iraq's official debt by 80 percent.[359] The deal would be delivered in three stages: 30 percent immediately; 30 percent on approval of a standard IMF programme; and 20 percent on completion of the standard IMF programme. The deal would write off US$31.1bn of the US$38.9bn owed to Paris Club creditors.

The UK's share of that write-off was approximately US$1.39bn,[360] or £954m (£337m in UK financial year 2004/05, £337m in UK financial year 2005/06 and £280m in UK financial year 2008/09).[361]

Section 10.3 describes the Government's role in the negotiations leading up to that agreement.

Funding military equipment for the Iraqi Security Forces

588. A DFID review of the GCPP and ACPP, published in March 2004, stated that the issue of funding military equipment and minor military operations had been controversial.[362] The position agreed in May 2003 was that:

- The supply of military equipment will only be funded if essential to the success of strategies. Weapons and ammunition will only be provided on an exceptional basis, subject to Ministerial agreement.
- Major military operations will not be funded from the Pools.
- Only peace-support-type minor military operations will be considered for Pool funding …"

589. FCO, DFID and MOD Ministers agreed in September 2004 to fund the provision of £2.5m of military equipment for the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) from the GCPP.[363] In a letter to Mr Benn, Mr Straw stated that although the purchase of the equipment "only just" met the published eligibility criteria for the supply of military equipment from the GCPP, it was "of broader importance to HMG".

590. Section 12.1 describes Prime Minister Ayad Allawi's requests to Mr Blair in September and October 2004 for increased support for the ISF.

591. In response, the MOD began to develop a proposal to provide US$107m (£70m) in additional support to the ISF, including the provision of armoured vehicles, transport vehicles, other equipment and weapons.[364] The MOD's proposal would become Project OSIRIS.

592. A Treasury official advised Mr Boateng's Private Secretary on 12 October that following Prime Minister Allawi's requests, No.10 was pushing for resources to be allocated "outside the traditional spending categories of the UK military operation (MOD) and reconstruction (DFID)".[365] The official continued:

> "Partly in light of tight spending controls within MOD centre, MOD theatre and FCO/DFID have been using No.10 interest as an opportunity to try and circumvent MOD Finance and HMT [Treasury] spending controls. They have managed to get some political buy-in to ideas which have not been properly costed, scrutinised or prioritised."

593. The resulting spending pressures were "significant, mounting and have critical mass". So far, the GCPP had filled the "growing gap", providing £22m of its £100m budget to fund such ad hoc priorities. However, with much of the GCPP contractually committed, it could not absorb many more demands.

594. As Mr Boateng would not be able to attend the forthcoming meeting of the Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq, the official recommended that he should write to Ministers, proposing the creation of a ring-fenced allocation for Iraq within the GCPP for 2004/05. That would comprise £10m of new money from the Reserve, and up to £15m in new money to match reprioritisation within the GCPP.

595. The Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq discussed the MOD proposal on 14 October.[366] Ministers agreed that the proposal should, in principle, be funded, and that the MOD should put a costed proposal to the Treasury "with a view to achieving swift agreement". Mr Straw and Mr Benn both commented that the GCPP had neither the budget nor the mandate to fund that type of assistance. Mr Hoon said that funding should come from the "Op TELIC reserve". Mr Stephens, representing the Treasury, said that some money could come from the Reserve but that the Treasury would also want to look at the GCPP.

596. Mr Boateng's Private Secretary wrote to Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary on 18 October, proposing the creation of a ring-fenced allocation for "ad hoc security proposals" within the GCPP.[367] Copies of the letter were sent to Mr Straw's and Mr Benn's Private Offices.

597. By 22 October, No.10, Mr Hoon's Private Office and Mr Benn's Private Office had all responded to that letter, rejecting the Treasury's proposal.[368] No.10 commented that it was imperative that the MOD proposal be funded in full as soon as possible.

598. Mr Boateng advised the 28 October meeting of the Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq that, of the US$107m worth of equipment requested by the MOD, US$29m would be funded by the US.[369] The remaining US$78m (some £40.6m) could be funded by the Treasury from the Reserve on a "one-off" basis.

599. A Treasury official advised Mr Boateng in mid-November that there had been three separate occasions where "Ministers and officials from FCO and No.10" had made promises of military equipment to various organisations "without proper analysis of the requirement or clarifying the availability of UK funding".[370] Normally effective MOD internal scrutiny processes had been bypassed. Treasury officials were working with the MOD to ensure that such proposals were scrutinised, but for this to be effective the FCO and No.10 needed to "work with the process".

600. A Treasury official advised Mr Boateng on 1 December that the Treasury had received the MOD's first request for funding in relation to the MOD proposal, totalling £15m.[371] The request was "basically a list of kit that £15m will buy", but it was not the right time to "dig our heels in". The MOD had promised that future requests for funding would meet UOR standards.

601. In a Note to President Bush on 10 January 2005, Mr Blair described the Iraqiisation of security forces as critical but said that he was not convinced that the plan to deliver this was robust enough.[372] Mr Blair confirmed that he had authorised "an extra $78m from our MOD for the Iraqi Forces in the South". Although he could not be sure that funding was essential, "I'll take the risk rather than find six months later it was."

602. In June 2005, PJHQ advised Dr John Reid, the Defence Secretary, that discussions were under way with the Treasury for an additional £38m to fund a successor programme to Project OSIRIS.[373] The Treasury had taken "a close interest" in the bid and was keen to ensure that there was "no duplication" with funding allocated to the FCO and DFID.

603. Mr Des Browne, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, wrote to Dr Reid on 23 August, approving £16m from the Reserve for the package of vehicles, infrastructure and communications equipment that had been presented by MOD officials.[374] Mr Browne continued:

> "Looking ahead, I hope that it will be possible for you to find other means of funding the remaining elements [of the £38m programme] – either by negotiating with Baghdad, for a larger share of what is available … or by encouraging our allies – most of whom are spending far less than we are in maintaining forces on the ground – to play a bigger role."

604. Dr Reid wrote to Mr Browne on 30 November, seeking a further £19.6m (for 734 Iraqi Police Service vehicles and 11 ISF infrastructure projects).[375] Dr Reid advised that the MOD had secured funding from the US, Australia, Italy and Japan, reducing the amount that the MOD needed to provide.

605. Mr Browne replied on 20 December, approving an additional £19.6m from the Reserve.[376]

606. Section 12.1 describes the equipment provided to the ISF under Project OSIRIS.

Better Basra Plan, July 2006

607. In June 2006, Mr Blair asked Mr Des Browne, the Defence Secretary from May 2006, to focus on the situation in Basra.[377]

608. Mr Browne sent Mr Blair an update on Basra, including details of the additional projects needed to deliver a "better Basra", on 4 July.[378] Mr Browne reported that departments had not yet found the £30.7m, "a relatively small sum given the strategic importance of Basra", required to fund the projects. Section 10.2 describes the development of the Better Basra Plan.

609. Discussions on funding the Better Basra Plan – the first of three Better Basra Plans – continued into August.

610. Mr Browne wrote to Mr Timms on 10 August to inform him that departments had agreed to provide a total of £20.4m from existing resources to fund the Plan, now costed at £26.5m because of the later start for some of the work.[379] A total of £7m would come from the GCPP Reserve and £1.4m from FCO-managed programmes. The MOD, the FCO and DFID would each contribute £4m. Mr Browne asked Mr Timms to agree a further £4m from the Reserve.

611. A Treasury official advised Mr Timms that Treasury officials had facilitated that deal.[380] Negotiations had been difficult, with the MOD offering "considerable resistance" to the need to find its contribution from the core defence budget.

612. The official concluded that the deal was a good one for the Treasury, because:

- It had held the line that the cost of the Better Basra Plan should not be an automatic call on the Reserve.
- It had succeeded in getting departments to reprioritise their existing resources to fund the project.

613. Mr Timms replied to Mr Browne on 15 August, welcoming the successful conclusion of negotiations and agreeing to provide an additional £4m for the Plan from the Reserve.[381]

614. The Better Basra Plan also attracted US$80m in US funding.[382]

615. Mr Dominic Asquith, British Ambassador to Iraq from 2006 to 2007, reflected on the UK's funding mechanisms in his evidence to the Inquiry:

> "I think in terms of being able to switch funds, or find extra funds that were required at short notice … it wasn't a particularly flexible or effective system. That came out rather visibly in 2006, when it was clear that we needed to put greater effort into building up the capabilities in Basra … The calculation … was somewhere in the region of £30 million, which … was required to come out of our current resources … which struck me at the time as being certainly a peculiar way of approaching what we were directed was a high priority, but we weren't being given the extra resources, to deliver it."[383]

New funding mechanisms for civilian operations

616. A cross-government review of the UK's approach to post-conflict reconstruction began in summer 2003 (see Section 10.3). Following that review, the inter-departmental Post-Conflict Reconstruction Unit (PCRU) was established in September 2004. It became operational during 2005.

617. The remit of the PCRU was to facilitate integrated planning for the military and civilian components of an intervention, including by identifying resources from existing government budgets.[384]

618. From June 2006, departments and in particular the FCO sought to develop new mechanisms to fund civilian stabilisation operations.

619. Sir Michael Jay and senior FCO officials, the Chiefs of Staff, Dr Nemat Shafik, DFID Director General Programmes, and Mr Jim Drummond, DFID Director UN Conflict and Humanitarian Division, agreed on 6 June 2006 that officials should work up a joint FCO/MOD/DFID proposal on how to ensure a comprehensive approach to funding for "stabilisation/reconstruction campaigns".[385] The FCO would lead that work.

620. During the meeting, officials agreed that as the Treasury would strongly oppose any bid to relax the rules on access to the Reserve, the focus of the proposal should probably be on increasing the size of the GCPP, for example by creating a new funding line for "quick impact development projects" in semi-permissive environments.

621. Air Chief Marshal Sir Jock Stirrup, Chief of the Defence Staff, suggested an allocation for that new line of £50m.

622. Sir Michael Jay commented that the Iraq and Afghanistan context might make the Treasury (and No.10) more receptive to a proposal.

623. Discussions continued between the FCO, the MOD, DFID and PCRU until mid-September, but did not produce a consensus on how any "QIP Fund" should be managed or delivered on the ground, or on the criteria that might be used to determine funding from it.[386] There was consensus that the £50m allocation proposed by ACM Stirrup at the 6 June meeting was too large, given the need and the difficulties of disbursing funds effectively.

624. The Inquiry has seen no indications that Treasury officials were aware of or engaged in those discussions.[387]

625. Mr Stephen Pattison, FCO Director International Security, wrote to Rear Admiral Tim Laurence, MOD Assistant Chief of the Defence Staff (Resources and Plans) on 18 September to provide a formal response to the tasking given at the 6 June meeting.[388]

626. Mr Pattison advised that for Afghanistan, departments had agreed to create a ring-fenced budget for QIPs within the GCPP Afghanistan Strategy, using existing funding from that strategy and an additional £3m from DFID.

627. In Iraq, UK commanders had been able to secure an "unusually generous" proportion of US CERPs funding since the 6 June meeting. The GCPP Iraq Strategy had also been boosted by additional funds from the GCPP Reserve and departments to support the Better Basra Plan. If additional funding for QIPs was required, departments had agreed to "follow the Afghanistan model". That would mean seeking additional funding first through the GCPP Iraq Strategy and from the GCPP Reserve, before approaching the Treasury for additional funds.

628. Rear Admiral Laurence had earlier advised the FCO, in response to sight of a draft of Mr Pattison's letter, that the first reaction of the Chiefs of Staff might be that departments had ducked a battle with the Treasury.[389]

629. Ministers agreed on 9 January 2007 that the UK needed a capability to intervene to prevent conflict and build capacity after conflicts.[390]

630. In response, on 15 February, the Cabinet Office produced a paper which considered how to improve the UK civilian contribution to conflict management and prevention.[391]

631. The Cabinet Office advised that funding "high priority and Ministerial endorsed policy objectives which cross the boundaries of existing responsibilities" had been a particular challenge. Funding for civilian activity in Iraq and Afghanistan, such as the Better Basra Plan:

> "… had to be negotiated across a range of departments and budget holders, with time consuming turf battles, diverting effort that would have been better deployed on developing effective policies, and delaying delivering."

632. Conflict prevention activities were currently resourced in an "ad-hoc fashion in and between departments", with limited transparency. There was no mechanism to "generate the analysis to support a process of setting strategic priorities or to inform balance of investment decisions". As a result, it was difficult to make decisions about the marginal utility of extra expenditure on one activity compared to another.

633. The Cabinet Office offered a number of recommendations to improve decision-making within Government and to increase civilian capability. On resources, the Cabinet Office recommended that the GCPP and the ACPP and possibly other funds which supported conflict prevention activities should be brought together and "managed as a single 'budget'".

634. The Inquiry has seen no indications that the paper was formally considered by Ministers or officials.

635. Mr Quinault provided advice to Mr Timms on 13 February 2007 on FCO and DFID bids to the Reserve in respect of Afghanistan.[392] In that context, Mr Quinault commented:

> "… we [the Treasury] have managed to hold the line that in keeping with the traditional approach to these things, while MOD do get access to the Reserve … the other departments have to reprioritise within their own budgets. Arguably this can lead to perverse outcomes on occasion if it incentivises decision-makers to prefer military responses to civilian ones. But it is a useful safety net for us [the Treasury] and not to be given up without careful thought."

636. The "lines to take" attached to the briefing set out the Treasury's response to the challenge that it was "perverse that MOD gets its operational costs paid … from the Reserve whereas essential civilian measures have to be paid for from FCO and DFID budgets":

- Arrangements on costs of military operations are of long standing and reflect the difficulty of planning for the large unplanned costs of operations;
- In any case [the] Reserve is spent, cannot consider more funding …;
- That is, unless MOD agree clearly that what you [FCO and DFID] are proposing is sufficiently vital to rank above more troops in the pecking order?"

637. Mrs Margaret Beckett, the Foreign Secretary, wrote to Mr Timms on 1 March to present the FCO's bid to the 2007 Spending Review.[393] She confirmed her interest in working with the Treasury to identify a better mechanism for funding civilian deployments in "hot" post-conflict situations such as Afghanistan and Iraq. She proposed that, ideally, bids to the Reserve should include both military and civilian costs. If that was not possible, she suggested establishing a "ring-fenced, multi-year contingency fund" from which the FCO could draw.

638. The Treasury told the Inquiry that it has no record of a response to Mrs Beckett on that point.[394]

639. Mr Pattison commented to FCO colleagues on 11 July that Mrs Beckett's proposal "didn't get past first base" with the Treasury.[395]

640. Mr Mark Lyall-Grant, FCO Political Director, advised Mr David Miliband, the new Foreign Secretary, on 9 July that he should try to secure the support of Mr Browne and Mr Douglas Alexander, the new Development Secretary, for a new funding mechanism to support the civilian elements of the UK's comprehensive approach in Afghanistan and Iraq.[396]

641. Mr Lyall-Grant described the problem:

> "There is no satisfactory Whitehall method to resource high priority, non-military work in conflict areas, in support of Ministerially-agreed policy objectives. Afghanistan and Iraq are cases in point. Ministers have long agreed that a comprehensive approach is required … But there is no mechanism to fund in-year priorities for this. The MOD can call on the Reserve for additional military expenditure. HMT [the Treasury] tell other departments that their expenditure … must be funded from re-prioritisation. At best this significantly slows down our ability to respond. In real terms it often means the non-military elements of the campaign are under-funded, with a direct impact on the length of time the military need to remain."

642. Mr Lyall-Grant identified two main possible solutions: allowing bids to the Reserve to include both military and civilian costs; or establishing a ring-fenced, multi-year contingency fund from which DFID, the FCO and others could draw.

643. On 23 July, a Treasury official invited Mr Andy Burnham, the new Chief Secretary to the Treasury, to agree to establish:

- A single Conflict Pool, combining the GCPP and the ACPP. The Conflict Pool would be managed by DFID, with advice from the MOD and FCO. A single Pool would "drive a more consistent and coherent approach to conflict prevention and poverty reduction, and … improve the management of the Pools overall".
- A Stabilisation Fund, which would be "owned by the MOD but managed jointly with DFID and FCO". Experience in Iraq and Afghanistan had highlighted the need for resources to be available for "immediate civilian support to military operations (QIPs, shorter-term development issues etc)". Mrs Beckett (the previous Foreign Secretary) and military commanders had repeatedly highlighted that need. Funding for such activities had typically been found from the GCPP, crowding out other planned spending. The allocation for the Stabilisation Fund would be £65m in 2008/09, £65m in 2009/10 and £115m in 2010/11. In total, £50m/£50m/£100m of that allocation would be ring-fenced within the MOD's 2007 Spending Review settlement. The balance (£15m in each year) would be transferred from the GCPP. Any unspent funds could be switched to core defence spending.[397]

644. The Treasury told the Inquiry that it had no record of a response to that advice.[398]

645. Mr Burnham wrote to Mr Browne the following day (24 July), to record the outcome of the 2007 Spending Review for the MOD.[399] Mr Burnham stated that the MOD's settlement included £50m in 2008/09, £50m in 2009/10 and £100m in 2010/11 for a "Reconstruction Fund". Mr Burnham described the Reconstruction Fund as "one step in a planned re-ordering of the way the Government handles planning and expenditure on the prevention and stabilisation of conflict".

646. Following a conversation between Mr Miliband and Mr Alexander, Mr Miliband's Private Secretary wrote to Mr Alexander's Private Secretary on 26 July setting out the challenges faced by the FCO in securing funding for its work in Iraq and Afghanistan, and expressing the hope that DFID and the FCO could work together to develop a mechanism which would more effectively support the comprehensive approach.[400] In the letter, which was not copied to any other department, Mr Miliband's Private Secretary rehearsed the arguments made in Mr Lyall-Grant's submission of 9 July.

647. DFID has told the Inquiry that it does not have any record of replying to that letter.[401]

648. Mr Burnham wrote to Mr Miliband in October, to record the outcome of the 2007 Spending Review as it affected the Conflict Prevention Pools.[402] Mr Burnham stated that the Review provided a "healthy increase" in the funds available for conflict prevention and stabilisation, and set out key reforms in the way that conflict issues were handled within Government:

- From 2008/09, the GCPP and ACPP would be merged into a single Conflict Prevention Pool.
